A similar case that is breaking just at the time of this writing is that of the Haut de la Garenne, a youth hostel in Saint Martin, Jersey, in the Channel Islands that from 1867 to 1998 had been a home for orphaned and/or wayward children. In 2006 Haut de la Garenne became the center of an investigation into an alleged child abuse and pedophilia network operating on the isle of Jersey. Over 150 people claim to have been abused, in many cases by respected members of the Jersey establishment, and say that Haut de la Garenne was one of the main locations where abuse took place. Some claim to have been taken there specifically for abuse by their abusers. However, most of the victims were actual residents of the children's home and claim to have been abused by the staff there.

Victims describe the abuse as systematic and part of the institution, occurring on an almost nightly basis. It often took place in a “secret basement” beneath the school.

It was this basement that was of special interest during the investigation, for when police visited the building with sniffer dogs, they found the secret basement, beneath a set of stairs. In there they discovered the remains of a very young child, still unidentified as I write this. They believe the child died in the 1980s and do not yet have an explanation as to why the body was hidden there. Shackles were also discovered there that had once been fastened to the wall. Police subsequently discovered another secret chamber, where the sniffer dogs indicated the presence of even more remains, but nothing tangible has been discovered as of yet.

Even if the child’s death was somehow natural or accidental, why was it hidden in this manner? How could the staff of a children’s home get away with something like that? Articles in the UK’s Guardian newspaper describe a “culture of secrecy” on the island, where respected members of society all stick up for each other, while police and courts systematically ignore any accusations made against them, and obstruct any investigations made by outsiders. Even those former residents of Haut de la Garenne who do not have tales of sex abuse to tell still say that there was non-stop physical and psychological abuse against all of the child residents, even through the 1980s. Nobody who knows the place finds it hard to believe that children were raped and murdered there.

During the recent investigation an even more disturbing connection was found. It was discovered that the Haut de la Garenne was connected to one of the UK’s most notorious serial rapists: Edward Paisnel, also known as “the Beast of Jersey.” From 1957 to 1971, Jersey was terrorized by an unknown assailant who broke into homes and raped children at night. He wore a bizarre costume that included a jacket studded with nails, a wig, and a bizarre rubber mask that made him look like a zombie. Police finally arrested him in 1971, still in this costume, fresh from the latest attack. When asked by the arresting officer why he was wearing such unusual attire, he replied, “I belong to a secret religious society. I’m on my way to a sex orgy.”

This indeed would be Paisnel’s defense. He claimed he had no connection to the rapes. He was merely a member of a black magic society where the membership was anonymous, and that they all wore masks to the meetings so that they couldn’t recognize each other during normal life. When police searched his home they found a secret room, and altar covered with ritual items, as well as a number of books on occultism. During the trial it came out that he believed himself to be a reincarnation of Gilles de Rais, a notorious serial rapist and murderer from the 15th century who had once fought alongside Joan of Arc. He was convicted of raping, murdering and dismembering over 200 children, all as part of Devil worship rituals intended to bring forth the “Philosopher’s Stone” that would allow him to turn lead into gold. However, Paisnel still maintained his innocence. But he was convicted, and died in prison in 1994.

The connection to Haut de la Garenne is a bizarre one. Until his arrest, Paisnel had actually visited the children’s home every year at Christmas time … dressed as Santa Claus!

Since I wrote the “Stepford Whores” article for Hustler in 2001, there have been a few developments in the cases I discussed therein, most notably with that of the missing paper boy Johnny Gosch. In January 2005 a scandal broke out when a reporter working in the White House press room was found to be using a fake name. Calling himself “Jeff Gannon," the name on his driver's license was actually James Guckert. He was investigated in the first place because other White House reporters felt that he had been asking the President preferential questions, and thought it odd that they did not recognize him at all. The news outfit he worked for turned out to be Talon News, an internet operation, which caused many "real" print journalists resentment. Furthermore, upon researching his background it was learned that prior to his work for Talon News, Gannon/Guckert had been self-employed as a male prostitute who advertised his services online. Gannon lost his White House press pass, and Bush claimed to know nothing about him, while Democrats accused Gannon of being a White House plant meant to set up the President with softball questions at press conferences. They also took great joy in pointing out Gannon's prostitute past, mainly expressing shock that a gay man could be a Republican. Gannon continued his work in conservative journalism with his blog.

Had it not been for Noreen Gosch, the whole incident would have been forgotten. But in April 2005, Ms. Gosch did an interview with an alternative newsweekly in Des Moines, Iowa named Pointblank in which she stated that she believed Jeff Gannon was none other than her own missing son, Johnny Gosch. You will recall that Ms. Gosch claims to have been visited by Johnny as an adult in 1997, for one night only, in which he told her that he had been kidnapped by a Satanic child prostitution ring, and was now on the run from them. He left the next morning and continued running, never to be seen again. But now Ms. Gosch was saying that Gannon looked like the adult Johnny who had come to visit her. Furthermore, certain theories proffered by her friends John DeCamp and Ted Gunderson tended to back up this idea, she said. Within 24 hours of running the article, Pointblank was put out of business, and all the employees were put out of a job.

The owners started a new paper that they began publishing the following week. Of course, many believe that Pointblank was killed because they ran the Gosch/Gannon story.

The “evidence” linking Gannon and Gosch is circumstantial at best, or at worst, the product of a fruitful imagination. First, some of Ted Gunderson’s informants claim to know for sure that Gannon is Gosch: one is a confidential informant, the other is photographer Rusty Nelson, discussed in the interview with Gunderson in this book. Secondly, Johnny Gosch, Jeff Gannon, and the name on Jeff Gannon’s driver’s license, “James Guckert,” all have the same initials: JG. Nothing is known about what happened to Johnny Gosch after he disappeared. Little can be established about the early life of Jeff Gannon, mainly because he chooses to keep it private. Gannon claims to be in his forties, about ten years older than Johnny Gosch would be today. But his prostitute websites claimed that he was ten years younger. Also, if you think about it, a boy who had been repeatedly raped and brainwashed by powerful Satanist pedophile politicians as part of a military/intelligence mind control program might conceivably grow up to be a gay prostitute with a flair for military clothing and a sympathy for Republican politics (he was supposedly brainwashed, remember?) As an adult, then, he might still be serving his handlers, making himself useful and thus keeping himself alive.

Another Gunderson informant, Paul Bonacci says that as a child victim of Project MONARCH (where he supposedly got to know Johnny Gosch very well), he was forced to participate in the production of a snuff film in which another boy was killed. He says that the man who filmed it was none other than gonzo journalist Hunter S. Thompson! This ties in, says Gunderson, because Thompson killed himself on February 21, 2005.

Gunderson and others think Thompson was either murdered or killed himself because it was feared that with Jeff Gannon (possibly Johnny Gosch) now in the media spotlight, it was only a matter of time before Thompson's (alleged) involvement with child porn and snuff films was exposed. A few days later Rusty Nelson, who had been out of prison for many years, was suddenly arrested for failing to register as a sex offender in a town in which he no longer lived. Gunderson believes this was a warning from the evil cabal, warning to Nelson to keep his mouth shut about Gannon, Gosch and Hunter S. Thompson. Another person who got arrested for child sex abuse right around this time was Paul Bishop, the self-proclaimed "CIA agent" who, according to her testimony, pretended to help Noreen Gosch search for her son in the early years before vanishing without a trace in 1985. Noreen didn't hear anything about him again until twenty years later, when she found out about his arrest.

While his White House press room scandal was rocking Washington that February, Jeff Gannon published a couple of articles with interesting titles. One was "Hiding in Plain Sight." While the article was about something else entirely, Gunderson and others think the title was a wink and nod by Gannon to those who were beginning to catch on to his true identity. Another article by Gannon on his blog, titled "Fear and Loathing in the Press Room," is believed to be a covert acknowledgement of the connection to Hunter S. Thompson, who famously wrote Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas.

However, to the contrary, in public Gannon's only acknowledgement of the allegations connecting him to Johnny Gosch has been complete denial. He has sent legal threats to Noreen Gosch and anyone else professing the theory. He has called in to radio talk shows where the theory was being discussed, issuing the same threats and denials. Then most recently in early 2007, he did the rounds of several cable television news programs denying any connection, and offering to take a DNA test to prove it. As of this writing, this has not actually happened yet, for reasons unknown.

This most recent wave of media activity happened just after another such wave also connected to the Johnny Gosch story. Noreen Gosch had gone on several television news shows asking for information from the public after she received a bunch of photographs from an anonymous source showing boys bound and gagged. She said that one of the boys in the photo was Johnny, and that it had been taken around the time that he was kidnapped. She wanted help identifying the other boys, and, if possible, the location in which the picture had been taken. A few weeks later, the boys in the photograph (now adults) came forward, and none of them were Johnny. The photographer also came forward, and he said that the pictures had been taken many years ago, when he and some younger friends were horsing around. They were not photos of kidnapped children, in other words. If Jeff Gannon does take a DNA test and proves that he is not Johnny Gosch, then that means that Noreen has twice now claimed that someone was her son when they in fact were not.

In February 2008, just as this book was about to go to press, Noreen Gosch published yet another photo on her website of a boy bound and gagged, which she claimed was her son, and which she claimed to have received from an anonymous source. She asked for the public’s help in identifying the camp advertised on a camp bag sitting on the floor in the photograph. The bag says “Camp Caribou” quite clearly, and it is uncertain why she would need the public’s help identifying it. A simple web search reveals that Camp Caribou is a Roman Catholic summer camp for boys in Maine. This photo has of course fueled internet speculation that the camp is a playground for pedophiles, with no other evidence surfacing as yet at the time of this writing.

As this book is being published, the topic of Project MONARCH is experiencing a popular resurgence on the internet, making the rounds on various left wing blogs and discussion forums, where supporters of Barack Obama are circulating the stories in an effort to connect Hillary Clinton to various evil deeds. New mind control and Satanic Ritual Abuse stories are popping up all the time. The latest headline turned up on The Drudge Report in early March 2008, although it was actually a story from November 2007. The mayor of the town of Centerton, Arkansas, known to his constituents as Ken Williams, suddenly resigned, announcing that his real name was “Don LaRose.” He said that thirty years earlier, he had been kidnapped and brainwashed by Satanists. When he escaped from their clutches, he disappeared, leaving his wife and family, and taking on the name of another man who had died in an auto accident. He chose to resign his position as mayor when he was discovered by his abandoned family, although he did not choose to return to them, or to again take up his former name.

Truly, reality is stranger than fiction, and a lot scarier.

Introduction

When I was younger, I was subjected to Satanic Ritual Abuse. There were some people who helped me to get away from the cult. And there was a husband and wife team of therapists who helped to deprogram me and to heal me. I never knew their real names, but in this book I will call them the Fabians. They were members of the secret society known as the Illuminati, but they had come to reject its philosophy. They had been involved with some parts of the MK Ultra research project, but they also had become disillusioned with that experimental mind-control program.

So they used what they knew of the human mind to create a therapeutic system for healing the victims of MK Ultra type mind control.

MK Ultra was the CIA’s mind-control research for the behavior engineering of human beings. It officially began in 1953 and officially ended in 1973, but actually it continues on in secret. During the twenty-year period when it was called MK Ultra, it involved at least 80 institution and more than 180 researchers. The CIA hid its involvement behind front organizations. Universities, hospitals, prisons and pharmaceutical companies were involved. The research into mind control used mind-altering chemicals, hypnosis, sensory deprivation, isolation, psychological manipulation, sexual abuse and other forms of torture. Many illegal activities were engaged in. There was a great deal of variation in how the research was done by differing groups. Some groups were highly effective and drew little attention to themselves.

However, some of the research groups were disastrous and left behind dozens of victims with ruined lives. When public awareness of the MK Ultra program became too great, the government pretended to close down the research in 1973. This mind control system continues on today with greater secrecy as Project Monarch.

When these Fabian therapists saw the damage that was caused by the trauma of MK Ultra, they felt bad about the part they had played in this research. So they secretly dedicated themselves to healing the victims of that type of mind control. These Fabian therapists were very politically connected, and they were well educated. They were considered to be geniuses in their field. They had access to advanced research that has never been publicly revealed. And they had a point of view about therapy and about human potential development which was largely unique. I think that their approach to understanding the mind is one that would be useful to anyone. I call their approach Fabian Therapy.

This type of therapy avoids direct contact with painful memories. It’s based on the idea that the human mind is an energy field which interacts with the brain and body. It’s designed to allow the client to discharge the negative energy contained in painful memories through a cathartic process. It rehabilitates the memory system which has been damaged by trauma-containing memories. And it makes the client feel happier about life and more socially functional.

Unfortunately, the Fabian Therapy system was suppressed for political reasons. Without going into all the politics of this, I think you can understand that the CIA, who funded MK Ultra, might not have been happy about some of its former researchers coming up with methods for deprogramming MK Ultra victims. I didn’t create this Fabian system, but I am one of the few people who understands how this system works, and I am the only one willing to talk about it publicly.

In recent years I’ve put out some internet articles on how Fabian Therapy works. And I’ve gotten some email responses back from people who are integrating ideas from what I’ve written about Fabian Therapy into their own healing process. These are survivors who are trying to recover from various types of mind control. Also I’ve had contact with therapists who are using Fabian Therapy techniques to help others.

One of the persons who have responded to my articles stands out for me.

This woman had been in a cult that subjected her to the traumatic form of brainwashing called Monarch mind control. This created many problems for her. She had multiple personalities and periods of missing time.

After she disconnected from the cult she tried to use conventional talk therapy from a psychologist to help herself. This gave her moral support at a critical time, but she still couldn’t remember things that had happened to her and she still experienced periods of missing time. She tried taking psychiatric drugs but those made her feel suicidal, so she stopped. She found a hypnotist and tried hypnotherapy. With his help, she was able to recover some memories and gain some control over her life, but she still had problems. Her hypnotist discovered some articles that I had been writing about Fabian Therapy, and he tried using some of the Fabian techniques that I’d described, and she improved greatly as a result. She felt happier and more stable. She gained a much needed control over her life. So although I'm not giving advice on how to do therapy with this book, I can say that some therapists and their clients have already found this information useful.

Different people come to mental liberation in different ways. And every person has to find his or her own path. But there can be tools which can help you in the process of achieving liberation. And that's what this book is about. Mental Liberation in the Age of Thought Control is a collection of stories, lessons and descriptions of techniques, all of which relate to deprogramming brainwashing and propaganda.

I want to make it clear that I'm not giving advice for mental health treatment. My only purpose here is to share information. What you choose to do with this information is your responsibility.

My hope is that some of this information might somehow be used to help the victims of harmful brainwashing techniques. However, it isn't just the victims of mind control and their therapists who will find this book useful. Anyone interested in psychology and the realization of human potential will find this information of interest. The more you understand how the human mind works, the more empowered you become. So this information isn't just about healing mind control; it's also about how you can increase your personal abilities.

This book reveals insider information as to how the Illuminati mind control methodology actually works. Some of this information may already be familiar to you, however this book also discusses the Fabian system for the healing and deprogramming of mind control. And this system has never been described by any other source. This book is a modest but unique revelation.

As well as this, I have known some persons who were the victims of various forms of Satanic Ritual mind control, and I am going to describe some of the things that were done to them. I think that it's important that the public knows the extent of depravity into which this mind-control system indulges.
This book may contain information that could be upsetting to anyone who has been subjected to traumatic mind control. Yet in reading this they may be able to better process their feelings about their abuse. My intention is that this book will give hope to those who seek recovery.

Whether they realize it or not, everybody in our present day culture has been subjected to thought-control technology. The experience of contemporary hospital birth is traumatic for many infants and mothers, and it has been designed to be that way. Circumcision is intentionally traumatic to infant boys. The educational system has been designed to be emotionally traumatic to the students. The No Child Left Behind and Common Core State Standards programs have been intentionally designed to be psychological torture for children. And there are many other ways that ordinary persons are traumatized by life. And much of this trauma is intentional. It has been engineered by those in power.

The mass media propaganda and the entertainment business with its dark agenda are all part of a mind-control matrix. In a sense, the entire world culture has been subjected to Illuminati mind control. This book describes a path to mental liberation in this age of thought control.

Therefore, this is a book for everyone.

Monarch Mind Control & The Culture of Celebrity

The internet and tabloids are filled with stories about how celebrities

are subjected to Monarch mind control. Whether it’s true or not, certain celebrities have been promoted in the media as having been subjected to Monarch mind control – celebrities like Lady Gaga, Rihanna, Beyonce, Madonna, Angelina Jolie, Johnny Depp, Miley Cyrus, Katy Perry and others. The naive young people who look up to such entertainers are being sold on the idea that being in the Illuminati is hip. The idea of Illuminati mind control is sold to them as the path to wealth and fame.

Monarch mind control is presented as being glamorous. But of course nothing could be further from the truth.

Consider the case of Katy Perry. I have no idea if she's actually been subjected to Monarch mind control, but her carefully crafted public image implies that she has been. And this implication is deliberate.

She was raised in a Christian family, but now she's Lucifer's poster "Gurl". Every video featuring her promotes the Illuminati's agenda and is filled with Satanic imagery. She produced a video called Wide Awake in which she hints that she's still a good Christian and has overcome her mind control. But the video is filled with Illuminati symbolism, and it ends with a Monarch butterfly flying over her, implying that she's still brainwashed. The videos and public performances that she's done since the release of Wide Awake all indicate that her celebrity status is still being used to promote the Illuminati's agenda.

And you should know that the phrase "wide awake" is a control command for waking up alter personalities. The alter personality is the personality that has been programmed into the mind control victim by the Illuminati brainwashers. So the Wide Awake video itself is being used to reinforce the programming of victims of Monarch mind control.

I don't wish to demonize Katy Perry. Most Christians are clueless about the nature of Satanism and many Christians work for wealthy Satanists without really fully understanding the true nature of their employers.

And this may be the case for Katy Perry. I have no idea if Katy Perry even understands the Luciferian symbolism that is found throughout all of her videos. She may be the perfectly nice Christian that she says she is. She might not even understand the meaning of the Illuminati hand signals that she sometimes flashes. I think we should give her the benefit of any doubts we might have about her personal faith. But there is no doubt that she has made a "deal with the devil", as she has publicly admitted. The Illuminati manages her career, her videos and her performances. And they use her and the other celebrities to promote the idea that the life of a Monarch mind control slave is glamorous.

Monarch mind control is a system of brainwashing that was developed out of the MK Ultra mind-control research project funded through the CIA. After World War II, MK Ultra combined American intelligence on mind control with captured Nazi intelligence. As a child, I was subjected to some MK Ultra techniques, and I've known others who have been the victims of it. What I hope to convince you of is the fact that there is nothing glamorous about this type of mind control. And you should know that the persons who promote the use of mind control are among the most depraved individuals imaginable.

The Non-Glamorous Life of an MK-Ultra Sex Slave

The reality of mind control used to brainwash someone into sex work can be brutal. There is nothing glamorous about it. Tabloids and Hollywood movies may tease the public with the idea that mind-controlled sex workers are enjoying themselves. But the actuality of this phenomenon is tragic.

I could give you many examples of persons I've known whose lives were scarred by the mind control they were subjected to and the sex work they were forced to perform. But there is one MK Ultra mind-control victim that stands out. She was called Daisy. I only saw her up close and in person one time, and that was when I saw her ravaged corpse on the floor of a garage. She had committed suicide at the home of a wealthy Satanist, a man we called the Baron. Her corpse was dressed in a dirty rag of a dress, and her legs and arms had bruises and track marks from shooting up heroin. She looked completely ruined. I would learn of her life from photographs and stories told to me.

Originally her name was Veronica, but after she was subjected to MK

Ultra mind control, her personality was completely erased, and she was programmed with a new personality named Daisy. All this was done under the authority of that powerful Satanic leader whose nickname was the Baron.

I never knew the Baron's real name. I was told that he had two homes. In one home he lived a normal life with his wife and children. He went to church on Sunday and was a respected member of his community. But he would be gone away on business for weeks at a time.

The Baron also owned a mansion of which his real family had no knowledge. In the basement of that mansion was a large black room containing a Satanic temple. He would conduct upscale orgies with his fellow Luciferians in the sex rooms located on the upper floors of this mansion. His staff were dedicated to him. He had many followers. He was called the Baron because he was like the robber barons of old. He was a ruthless businessman and he ran a criminal empire.

One day when he was driving down the road, he noticed Veronica walking along the street. He immediately felt lust for her. He got out of his car and quietly stalked her. He observed where she was headed.

When she walked into a small eatery and sat at the counter, the Baron followed her in and sat next to her. They started up a conversation and there was a mutual attraction.

Veronica was a beautiful young woman. She was well educated. She had a good job and was independent. She was known for her intelligence and wit. Slowly, over a period of weeks and months, the Baron seduced her.

Their relationship was very romantic. They took trips together to Europe and upscale resorts. He led Veronica to believe that he was unmarried.

He revealed the fact that he was very wealthy. He hinted that someday he might marry her. He bought a small home for her by a lake near his mansion. Sometimes he would bring her to his mansion to show off how wealthy he was. But he never let her see the basement, the upstairs sex rooms, or his office.

I was only in his of fice one time. I knew that he always kept it locked.

This was because his office was very revealing. The Baron was sexually perverse, and he had photos with sexual content plastered over all the walls of his office. He had a photo of himself standing nude in an English pond with his friend Aleister Crowley, the famous English occultist.

This was an indication of the Baron's belief in sex magick, which is a type of psycho-sexual philosophy promoted by Crowley. The Baron was very proud of his own psycho-sexual obsessions. He had many photos of himself having sex with many different men and women of different ages. He had a photo of me dressed in women's lingerie when I was eleven years old kneeling before him performing fellatio while he sat in a throne-like chair dressed in a devil's outfit. This photo was in an elaborate frame that had a small light over it, illuminating the photo.

And all of these photos were a reflection of the Baron's real personality.

But his social persona was that of a dignified and Christian gentleman.

He fanatically guarded his public persona and concealed his true nature.

So he was very careful about who he let into his office.

But one day, back when he was still courting Veronica, he happened to leave his office door unlocked while she was visiting his home. Veronica knew nothing of the Baron's sexual perversity or his Satanism. She was only allowed to see his Christian gentlemanly persona. But all that changed in an instant.

The Baron had horses which he raised and sometimes sold. A mare was giving birth to the offspring of an expensive race horse, and the Baron wanted to observe the birth. After he left in a hurry, Veronica used this opportunity to sneak into the Baron's temporarily unlocked office.

She knew that he was a man of many mysteries. She wanted to find out something about this wealthy man who she hoped would someday marry her. But it turned out that there were many things in his office which shocked her. The sexually explicit photos covering the walls were perhaps less offensive than the revelations that followed. On his desk the Baron kept photos of his wife and children which would have demonstrated to Veronica that the Baron had been misleading her all along. Apparently she also started going through his files and realized that he was a criminal and a Satanist. She must have felt betrayed as she realized the depth of his deception. Angry and upset, she took some of the incriminating photos and files with her as she ran away from the estate.

She knew a newspaper man who was an old friend of hers. She took these materials to this reporter and told him that she wanted him to write and publish an exposé on the Baron. Initially he agreed. But when this reporter took the photos and files to his newspaper's chief editor, he was yelled at and told that it was all a fraud. The editor took possession of all the files and photos. He told the reporter if he ever tried to write such a story he would be fired. What the reporter didn't know was that the editor was a Luciferian and the Baron's friend. The editor returned the files and photos to the Baron and told him what Veronica had tried to do.

The Baron was not only angry with her, he was also afraid of her. One rule that the Illuminati demands from its initiated members is invisibility.

They must never allow themselves to be exposed, and they can never reveal what they know of the Illuminati. Every initiated member takes sacred oaths to this effect. The penalty for breaking the rule of invisibility is death. So the Baron had to take immediate action. He had his men abduct Veronica. They locked her up in a windowless room that was out in his barn.

The Baron had several persons working for him at that time who were experts on MK Ultra mind control, and so he made use of them. The first thing they did was to use some mind-control techniques on the reporter.

Although he had been discouraged by his editor from writing an exposé on the Baron, this reporter, on his own, had started to research Satanism and the Illuminati. However, that night, when he was at his favorite bar, one of the Baron's men secretly put a drug into his drink. When he walked out of the bar in a drowsy state, he was whisked off to some place where the MK Ultra experts could work on him. Commands were implanted into his mind compelling him to forget about Veronica and to never write about Satanism. When the mind controllers were done with him, they parked his car in front of his home and left him asleep in the back seat. This reporter never realized that he had been the victim of mind control. The next day when he woke up on the back seat of his car, the reporter probably thought that he had gone on a bender the night before and had simply blacked out for a while. And it did turn out that this mind control was successful. This reporter never again investigated the Baron and he dropped all of his research into Satanism.

But what was done to Veronica was far more extreme.

First the Baron arranged so that it would appear that she had died. He made some bribes, and from a medical school or some such place he purchased a corpse that was the approximate height of Veronica. The Baron also knew a dental technician who could be bribed. The dental technician made up a dental chart for the corpse. The Baron’s men broke into the office of Veronica’s dentist. They filed the phony dental chart in her dentist’s office under her name. Then the medical corpse was placed in Veronica’s sports car. The car was set on fire and rolled down a hill. The body that was recovered was so badly burnt that it had to be identified with dental charts. In this way, Veronica was officially declared dead. Her family and friends buried the wrong corpse and mourned her death.

Secondly, the Baron didn’t trust Veronica, so he had his MK Ultra experts completely erase her personality. They used an extreme form of sensory deprivation over a long period of time. She was so traumatized by this that her personality completely disassociated. Veronica never came back. Complete tabula rasa – a total blank slate. So this wasn’t multiple personalities. This was personality erasure.

They renamed her Daisy, after the Baron’s favorite mare, and began to reprogram her with a new personality. This was systematic psychic driving. At first she couldn’t speak or eat on her own. She couldn’t even use the toilet. They kept her in diapers and hand fed her. They talked baby talk to her. Eventually her ability to speak came back. After several weeks, she began to talk, walk and eat on her own. But she was like a child. And she had no memory of the past. She didn’t know her name, what country she was in or anything about her past.

They began to train her to be the perfect sex slave. They had her look at TV shows and mimic the speech and behavior of sexy female characters.

They showed her porno movies and had her mimic the behavior of the prostitutes starring in these films. Daisy became a shallow, obedient sex worker.

She was quite beautiful, and at first the Baron used her to make porno films with high production values to be sold to wealthy Luciferians in America and Europe. In these films she had sex with other young attractive men and women. With training she became something like a sexual athlete. She could perform any sex act in any position with multiple partners.

But a principle of mind control is that you never really erase the original personality with trauma-based mind control. The original core personality only becomes subconscious. So Veronica was still in there, although totally repressed and disconnected from the conscious mind.

And this sex work went completely against her morals and personality.

The more sex work she did, the more depressed she became. The only way they could motivate her to perform as a sex worker was to give her alcohol, so she became an alcoholic.

As her looks diminished, the Baron stopped using her in the high class porno films and started having her perform in films involving extreme deviant sex. One thing that fascinated the Baron was bestiality. He forced Daisy to have sex with horses, mules, sheep, dogs and goats. If she tried to refuse, the Baron would torture her until she obeyed. He especially liked having her filmed while she had sexual intercourse with goats.

In the Baron’s office, I once saw a photo of him, Daisy and a horse. The horse was saddled and the Baron, naked, was standing up straight with his feet in the stirrups. He had a big smile on his face and an erection. In one hand he held a dog leash which went down to the dog collar around the neck of Daisy. She was naked and kneeling in a pile of manure next to the horse, which also had an erection. In the photo she was clearly seen to be sexually servicing the horse. Next to this photo was a different photo that had been taken shortly after the Baron had first met Veronica. In it, the two of them looked attractive and in love with each other. In that photo Veronica looked beautiful, intelligent and dignified.

In his own twisted way, the Baron was proud of what he had done to this beautiful woman with whom he had once been in love. One thing that Satanists believe is that revenge is a religious duty. And the more insanely a Satanist pursues revenge, the more worldly power is given to him by Satan.

Over time, Daisy could only be motivated to perform degrading sex acts by being rewarded with heroin or cocaine. She became a heroin addict.

And eventually her looks diminished to the point that she was of no value to the Baron as a sex worker. He set her up in a room in a poor part of town and sent her small amounts of money so she wouldn't starve.

She became a cheap streetwalker so she could get enough money for alcohol and drugs. But eventually she was so beat up and ravaged that she couldn't even turn tricks for winos.

So she asked the Baron to send her more money. He refused. In response to this, she went to his estate and snuck in the back way. She found a rope and ladder. She hung herself to death on a tree in his backyard. This turned out to be most inconvenient for the Baron because he happened to be having a party at that time and everyone saw the corpse. But the Baron pretended that it was one of his famous practical jokes. And everyone at the party went along with this explanation whether they believed it or not. They were all Luciferians, so the Baron really had nothing to worry about. Nobody who really knew the Baron was likely to betray him. I happened to be one of the guests that night, so I saw the whole thing.

Daisy's corpse was cut down from the tree by the Baron's butlers. Her body was placed on the floor of his garage. He had his men dispose of her body elsewhere. They decided to try to have her body hung back up in another location with a suicide note which would not connect her to the Baron. In order to forge the suicide note they needed a sample of her handwriting. So the Baron had his butlers bring down some boxes containing memorabilia that he kept on Veronica and Daisy. In it he found a letter from Daisy. They put Daisy's corpse in the back of a van, and two of the Baron's men drove off with it.

The Baron left the garage and went back to his party. This left me alone in the garage with Bob, another man who worked for the Baron and whose story is told in my other books. Although I didn't know it at the time, Bob had become disillusioned with the Baron and with Satanism.

I noticed some photos in the boxes. When I looked at them they shocked me. Bob began to tell me about Daisy and Veronica. Then he decided to take all the boxes that had been set out. We loaded them into the trunk of Bob's car. Then we went to say our goodbyes to the Baron.

We found him in the mansion and Bob thanked him for inviting us to the party. The Baron told us to come up to his office. This was the only time I was let in there. In a sense this was supposed to be an honor, because the Baron was very careful about who he let into his office. He made a big deal out of showing us the photo of me performing fellatio for his benefit while he was dressed as the devil. This was his way of telling me that he valued me as a possession. Looking at that photo of me in his office made me feel angry and ashamed, but out of fear I said nothing. It was also there in his office that I saw the two photos of Daisy and Veronica which I have described. I think the Baron was trying to make a point to us. He once had loved Veronica. But he felt that she had betrayed him. So he had avenged himself upon her in a way that was worse than if he had killed her. The once dignified and intelligent Veronica had been reduced to a cheap whore who entertained the Baron by performing acts of bestiality. Letting us see those photos was the Baron's way of warning us to never betray him. But, unbeknownst to the Baron, we had just stolen some of his boxes of Veronica memorabilia without his permission, and I wondered what Bob was up to, risking the wrath of a man who was insanely committed to revenge.

We said our goodbyes and left the party. Back at his house, Bob showed me some films and photos of Veronica/Daisy and told me the whole story. I had thought of Bob as being completely loyal to the Baron, but that night I began to realize that he wasn't.

I had been subjected to Satanic Ritual Abuse at various times throughout my childhood. I had been forced against my will to do sex work as a child. When I was with my mundane Christian family, I was Kerth.

When I was with Luciferians, I was Kathy. I had two personalities, but they had become integrated over time. I have told this story in my book, Angelic Defenders & Demonic Abusers. Kathy was the name of my Luciferian sex worker personality. But the sex work I had done hadn't been anything like the intensely degrading experiences that Veronica/

Daisy had been put through.

Sometimes young men from generational Satanist families are forced to do sex work during childhood as part of their training. The sex work tends to force them to emotionally bond with other Luciferians while at the same time giving them a sociopathic outlook on life. The sex work I did was as much for mind control purposes as anything else. The Baron had other child prostitutes he could have used instead of me. The sex work was a way of conditioning me. He wanted me to grow up to be a Satanist. The Baron had done sex work when he was a child. Many of the people in this world who you might think of as having great power were actually systematically abused as children. So in reality these powerful men are actually just brainwashed slaves themselves.

There was a great deal of pressure on me to join the Church of Satan.

But after I learned what had been done to Veronica, I knew I had to resist the pressure to join the Church no matter what. I didn't want to become just another slave of Satan. So her death was not in vain. In spite of all her suffering, she helped to motivate me to do what I needed to do to escape Satanism.

Later on I heard the story of the two men whose job it was to dispose of Daisy's corpse. One of the men entrusted with this chore was called Ole Jack. Eventually he and I would become friends. He was a very unsympathetic person, but at times he could be righteous. He knew that Veronica had been horribly mistreated. However, although he understood the wrongness of what was done to her when she was alive, he never felt sympathy for the dead. He often told the story of that night when they tried to dispose of Daisy’s corpse. Apparently everything imaginable had gone wrong. It was described to me as a comedy of errors. Finally, because of circumstances, they wound up burying her corpse in an unmarked grave in a garbage dump. So much for the glamorous life of an MK Ultra mind-control sex worker.

The Use of Spirituality & “Truther” Materials for Deprogramming

The entertainment industry has hinted at the idea that Monarch mind control somehow is glamorous and that it may even give its recipients enhanced abilities. But the reality is that the Illuminati is run by deceptive and decadent aristocrats. Once you accept the fact that Monarch mind control is not a system of therapy or of self-improvement and that it is a degrading process, then you can appreciate the need to heal and deprogram the victims of this type of brainwashing.

I have been in communication with some survivors of Monarch mind control and the therapists who try to help them. These are people who have been subjected to Monarch mind control and who are attempting to recover from its effects. I myself am a survivor of Satanic Ritual Abuse and some MK Ultra techniques. What I know of Monarch mind control is that it’s based on MK Ultra research and that it is a very precise technology. The programing of Monarch is based not just on spoken language but also on the projection of images into the mind. Drugs and suggestions are used in a very exacting way. It’s a sophisticated process. Treatment for recover from this can take a great deal of time and can be very difficult. I have been involved with survivors of mind control abuse at various times in my life and in various ways. However, in recent months, my only contact with such survivors has been through emails and letters. Over the last few years I have put some articles on the internet describing some recovery methods for mind control. So some people interested in these methods have communicated with me. And some of these discussions have also gone into related subjects.

One thing that many deprogrammers have found useful is to approach this subject of deprogramming on an intellectual level. There are a number of well known “Truthers” such as Ellen Hodgson Brown, Alex Jones, David Icke and others. They have talked about how this global system of corruption operates. This type of analysis is called Deep Politics. This is where a researcher goes into the root causes of what’s going on, rather than getting hung up on the superficiality of partisan politics. Materials on deep politics and truther issues, such as 9/11 Truth, can awaken a brainwashed person, at least on an intellectual level. Rather than going directly into their personal experience of abuse, they intellectually comprehend how the entire world culture has been abused. So this can be the first step in a process of mental liberation.

Some people wrongly assume that Christianity is the cure for Satanic Ritual Abuse. I’m a Christian, and I’ve found this faith useful to me. I have personally found that simple Christian prayer is very important to my recovery and ongoing well-being. Heart-centered and loving prayer can be very powerful. But I have to acknowledge that some Christian Churches are themselves founded on a type of mind control. And the use of mind control in other religions is common. In fact, the CIA deliberately created mind-control cults in the US during the 1950s and 1960s, and some of those cults were religions. To exchange the mindcontrol system of Satanism for some other type of religious mind control is not an improvement. For a person who has been subjected to Satanic Ritual Abuse to enter into another system of mental abuse can create problems for that person. Some Christian ministers are very narrowminded, invalidating and judgmental. If you are drawn to the spiritual path of Christianity, you need to find a fellowship that is open-minded, life-affirming and heart-centered. So you have to be very careful if you are seeking to liberate yourself from mind control or if you are trying to help somebody else. You need to find an approach to mental liberation which does only good and doesn’t do more harm.

This book that you are now reading –

Mental Liberation in the Age of Thought Control – contains in it what I know of the process for deprograming MK Ultra and Satanic Ritual Abuse. I gained this information as a survivor who escaped a Satanic cult, and as someone who has worked therapeutically with other survivors at various times in my life. Also, over the years I've received some insider information about Monarch mind control. So I've included these insights in this book. The information contained in this book is the same information that I have been privately sharing with recovering survivors and the therapists who are working with them.

The problem with some of the techniques that I've taught, and with methods which other deprogrammers have developed, is that they work slowly over a long period of time. In some cases this takes years of difficult work. So we always look for something that can accelerate the process.

One thing that I've found personally helpful is the Reiki holistic healing practice. I am myself a Reiki master. Let me explain about Reiki just in case you are unfamiliar with it. The word Reiki translates from Japanese to mean Universal Life Force. Rei means universal and ki means life force. It's pronounced "ray key". Reiki is a field of invisible energy which permeates the entire Cosmos. It does only good and brings all living things into health and harmony. You could say that Reiki only operates at the higher vibrational level of unconditional love. A Reiki healer accepts this Universal Life Force through the crown of the head and projects it outward through the palms of the hands. This may be a hands-on healing practice, or it may be done remotely, at a distance.

This is done to heal someone spiritually, mentally and physically. It's a subtle but tangible healing practice.

Then they began laying their hands on them, and they were receiving the Holy Spirit. – Acts 8:17

Some Reiki healers are Christians who think of Reiki as a Christian practice. The Japanese word rei can also be translated as divine or holy, and the word ki can be translated as spirit. So Reiki could be thought of as a word for the Holy Spirit. Reiki was developed in the 1920s by a Japanese Buddhist named Mikao Usui. However some of the early practitioners and promoters of Reiki practice were Japanese Christians.

Some have tried to define Reiki practice as a Christo-Buddhist practice.

However I think that Reiki healing practice it most accurately thought of as a non-religious spiritual practice which promotes holistic health.

The way that Mikao Usui came into his healing practice is this: he had gone on a pilgrimage to Mt. Kurama in Japan, a home to temples, shrines and sacred traditions. During a period of fasting and prayer, Mikao Usui had what some might call a “shamanic” experience. During this experience a powerful flow of spiritual energy came into the crown of his head. Apparently he had visions and saw certain sacred symbols.

After this he found that he could heal people with Reiki energy which he projected from his palms. Some call this practice palm healing.

Eventually Mikao Usui began to teach this practice to others. They in turn taught others, and so forth. Through a succession of teachers, every Reiki palm healer inherits this ability. So every Reiki palm healer, myself included, is personally connected to Mikao Usui and the experience he had on Mt. Kurama.

As a Christian, I feel no con flict with my Reiki practice and Christianity.

However my personal relationship with Jesus Christ and Mary the Mother of Christ still represents, for me, my most important source of spirituality. Whatever your religious or non-religious philosophy, it’s very important to find a spiritual practice which centers you in heartfelt goodwill for humanity and all life.

Also there is the study of truther books and videos. These would be well-researched books which challenge the lies and propaganda put out by the corporate-owned mass media. David Icke’s Perception Deception would be an example of a truther book. Alex Jones sells truther books on his website. Some therapists who treat victims of Monarch mind control have used truther materials as a tool for deprogramming. One technique is that a therapist will show a truther video to a mind-control victim, and then watch the recovering victim as he or she watches the video. If the recovering victim shows signs of confusion or anxiety, the therapist stops the video and talks with his or her client. This allows the opportunity for explanations or the processing of negative emotions.

When it comes to written materials, some recovering victims have studied them in a very specific and intensive way. In recent years I've worked with a group of psychics who oppose the Illuminati. They've taught me a reading technique that I've taught to others. This technique is called scan-subvocalize-cognize. This reading technique subtlety evokes psychic power in the act of study to enhance comprehension. In a sense this is really a spiritual practice.

Scan-subvocalize-cognize is a reading technique that encourages a higher level of comprehension. It works like this: scan a section of written material quickly by moving your finger or a pointer across each line starting from the beginning and moving sequentially to the end. This is not speed reading because you aren't trying to actually read the text at this point. You are simply scanning line after line in the text, searching for words that you might wish to look up in a dictionary. This is an intuitive action. In a sense it doesn't even matter why you might want to look up a particular word. Maybe the word is unfamiliar, maybe you just feel like looking up that particular word in a dictionary.

Scan

You

The real reason for scanning for words to look up in the dictionary is to give your conscious/analytical mind something to do while you perform the physical action of scanning. Most people think of psychic ability as being a purely mental activity. But I have known some very powerful psychics, and they all believe that psychic ability is a mind-body practice that involves physical behavior and a physical sensitivity. That is to say, you evoke the projection of your psychic powers with your physical actions and you receive psychic insights with a sensitivity to feelings in your physical body.

So psychic ability is a physical discipline which results in a mental or emotional realization. This is because psychic powers arise through the subconscious mind from the superconscious psychic mind. The subconscious mind has a neurological/mental barrier between it and the conscious mind. Some call this barrier the limen. The limen is the threshold that defines the limits of the analytical conscious mind as well as the limits of the intuitive subconscious mind. The conscious mind is associated with the logic and language activities of the brain's left hemisphere. The subconscious mind is associated with the intuitive and imaginative activities of the brain's right hemisphere.

What separates the left and right hemispheres is what might be called a lack of wiring in the brain. What connects the conscious mind and the subconscious mind together is the nervous system of the physical body.

So all valid psychic practices involve physical actions and a sensitivity to physical feelings.

And that's what this scanning practice is. You physically move the pointer or your finger along the lines of the text while at the same time moving your eyes along with the pointer. You should do this is a slow, even manner. You don't even try to comprehend the written text at this point. You are really just hunting for those words which feel unfamiliar.

These would be words whose meanings are uncertain to you. While you are scanning like this, you will sometimes find that you have a feeling of discomfort in your body. You may yawn, you may feel drowsy, you may suddenly feel bored, you may suddenly feel angry for no reason or it may just be a feeling of something being wrong. When you have such a feeling, look back at the text you've just scanned and see if any word pops out at you. When you notice such a word, that feels like you should look it up, write it down on a list. After you have scanned the section of text, you then look up all those words in a dictionary and see how they apply to the text. But if you don't feel that you need to look up any words, that's fine also. This is because the physical act of scanning opens up the subconscious mind to a deep psychic decoding of the meaning of the text.

In his book

Perception Deception, David Icke says, “The universe is a tapestry of resonating waveform information fields… from which we decode information and to which we also ‘post’ information… I call this waveform construct the Metaphysical Universe or the Cosmic Internet.”

What David Icke is referring to as the Metaphysical Universe is what some advanced psychics would call the Universal Mind. Some Remote Viewers call this the Great Unknown. Edgar Cayce once said that the subconscious mind is the doorway to the superconscious mind which is the source of your psychic powers. Whatever you choose to call this Metaphysical Universe, all information already exists there, and anything that is coded into written language is only a partial reflection of this universal knowledge. So with the combination of your analytical mind with your psychic powers you can both comprehend and transcend the knowledge in a written text.

So the scanning process is a step toward intensively decoding information that is represented by written words. First you intuitively sense the information before you analytically think about it. And that’s all you’re doing with the scanning process; you’re intuitively getting a feeling for the material.

Another thing which connects the left and right hemispheres, and thus the conscious and subconscious minds, is the visual cortex. When you close your eyes, you invite imagination into your consciousness.

The sleep dreams that you remember when you wake up are visualbased because they are messages from your subconscious mind to your conscious mind. When your eyes are open, and you are engaged in visual activity, you are evoking the powers of your subconscious mind, and that in turn brings into play your superconscious psychic powers. So as strange as this may seem to you, when you quickly glance at the words, without trying to read them in a traditional sense, that actually invites psychic ability into your reading process. You have to experience this to understand it.

Subvocalize

The next step in this decoding process is subvocalization. Again this is a physical process. Subvocalization is the process of reading a text out loud in a barely audible whispered voice. The psychics I've worked with have done a great deal of scientific research, and they've told me that when a person is scanning, a different part of the brain is activated than when a person is subvocalizing.

Again you want to give the conscious/analytical mind a chore to do to keep it busy while you perform the subvocalization process. So while you subvocalize the section of the text, hunt for words to look up in a dictionary. During the subvocalization process you quietly read the words out loud in a slow, even, whispered voice. While subvocalizing you might notice that your voice falters or that you mispronounce a word. You might feel the urge to cough suddenly or you may have some similar physical response. When you feel this, check back in the text you have just read and look for any words that pop up into your attention.

When you find such words, write them down in a list. When you've finished subvocalizing the section, look up those words in a dictionary and check what their meanings would be in the context of the the written text. If you don't come across any words to look up, again that is OK.

This is because the process of subvocalization is another step in the process of deeply decoding information.

During the subvocalization process, don't try to fully comprehend what you are reading. It's enough to just begin to have a feeling what what the author is conveying. Don't really think about what you are reading as you subvocalize, just go through the physical process of subvocalization and pay attention to what you what you physically feel.

Cognize

Once you've scanned and subvocalized, as well as looked up words in a dictionary (when necessary), then you actually read the text as you would normally do. To cognize is to understand or know something.

Scanning and subvocalization are physical/psychic processes. When you finally cognize the text, the reading of it is a mental process rather than a physical/psychic discipline. So you are not really physically involving yourself so much in this final reading. Your full attention is on understanding the text. But by preceding the final reading of the text with the physical/psychic processes of scanning and subvocalizing, you have prepared your conscious mind to cognize this information deeply.

It’s best to apply the scan-subvocalize-cognize reading method to sections of an overall text which are only a few pages long. You scan a few pages, then you subvocalize those pages and then you finally read those pages for comprehension.

I’ve heard various theories as to why scan-subvocalize-cognize works.

The group of researchers who developed this technique were highly educated. One theory is that scan-subvocalize-cognize balances the activities of the intuitive right hemisphere of the brain with the analytical left hemisphere of the brain. Most reading of a text is a purely left-brain activity, so people become bogged down when they read too much.

And that’s what scan-subvocalize-cognize does.

I don’t know for certain why it works, but I do know that it does work.

It’s worked for other people to whom I’ve taught this process, and it’s worked for me. Anybody who knows me knows that I don’t get along well with computers and other machines. But we all need to use these devices, so it’s necessary to study technical materials. When I do need to read a technical paper, I always use scan-subvocalize-cognize, and this technique makes it possible for me to comprehend those subjects which were once incomprehensible to me.

If you are trying to figure out what truther materials to use in the deprogramming of yourself or others, consider the works of Ellen Hodgson Brown, Alex Jones, David Icke as well as the websites that I've listed above.

Illuminati Brainwashing, Basic Principles

There is a basic theory for Illuminati mind control. There are four basic concepts involved in all its mind control methods. These concepts can be applied in different ways, and they can be used with different levels of intensity. Outside the Illuminati these terms are sometimes intentionally defined differently to conceal this information from the general public.

So I'm describing these concepts here as the Illuminati mind controllers would understand them. They are depatterning, tabula rasa, psychic driving and disassociation.

Depatterning

Depatterning is the act of changing someone's pattern of thinking. This may be a temporary phenomena or a permanent one. Depatterning can be used for creative purposes or for harmful ones. Forms of depatterning can be very harsh and cruel, such as shock treatment. But there are other applications of this concept. For example, the singing that goes on in a church tends to put people into a slight state of relaxation which makes them open to the sermon that will follow. So the ordinary pattern of secular thought that goes on outside of Church is depatterned by the hymns and spiritual music being performed. I'm not saying that Christian hymns are a form of Illuminati mind control. I'm just pointing out that the concept of depatterning has many applications, not just in brainwashing.

Another example of depatterning can have to do with wearing clothing different from what is normally worn. The clothing you wear defines your role in society. A soldier going to war wears a military uniform – depatterning his civilian way of thinking. If a gay man, who normally dresses and acts masculine, puts on a drag costume at a gay bar, he's depatterning his normal way of thought and behavior to give himself permission to behave in an overtly sexual way.

Depatterning is not necessarily mind control, it’s just something that is done to allow a different pattern of thinking and behavior to emerge. If it’s done consciously and rationally, depatterning can be an expression of individual free will. It would be any practice or ritual that allows you to shift the pattern of your thoughts and behavior.

There is an interesting story that is often told about the Satanist Aleister Crowley. One night, he demonstrated depatterning to a friend. He walked behind a stranger on the street, exactly mimicking the stranger’s footsteps so that the sound of his own footsteps would be subliminally entrained into the mind of the stranger. (Entrainment is when you establish a pattern into a person’s mind through rhythm and repetition.) Once Crowley had subliminally entrained the stranger’s pattern of walking through the sound of his own footsteps, he deliberately made a series of loud missteps. This caused the stranger in front of him to instantly stumble without understanding why.

However, brainwashing takes depatterning to an extreme as a way of attacking the personality of the victim. Here depatterning is used as a form of abuse. This might come about as any activity that overwhelms and disorients the individual. This turns off the reasoning mind and opens the subconscious mind to programming. And always such programming goes against the welfare and free will of the individual.

One common approach to depatterning is to shame a person through the confession of sins or mistakes. There are many common systems of indoctrination which start out with this process. I’m not saying that the Illuminati are the only ones who use mind control. They are just the most extreme. Actually the entire culture of our world is obsessed with mind control, and many forms of organized religion use it. Through the confession of sins, the person is beaten down emotionally through a process of self-invalidation. Depatterning is the deconstruction of the ego by systematically attacking the self-esteem of the individual. Of course people do make mistakes in life, and it’s important to recognize mistakes so that change can take place, but to begin a therapy process by having the subjects list their mistakes or sins is an attack upon the ego.

Individuals need strong, healthy egos. This type of sin confessing is a way to manipulate people with guilt. It depatterns the person's normal self-esteem.

When depatterning is taken to an extreme, it invalidates and erases the individual's natural core personality.

Tabula rasa

Tabula rasa is from Latin. It literally means tablet erasure or an erased tablet. This is where the mind of the individual is turned into a blank slate. It's the complete or partial erasure of the individual's personality.

This is the goal of the mind controllers.

Tabula rasa can be done on the level of an individual or of a culture.

When tyrants burn books, they are erasing the cultural memory of a people. They want to turn the culture into a blank slate so they can program the people with a new culture.

The New World Order that the globalists are trying to promote is based on the concept of tabula rasa. They want to erase all existing governments in order to create a new, all powerful, global government. They want to erase all religions, languages, currencies and cultures. Then they will be able to impose a single new religion, language, currency and culture upon all of their slaves.

Psychic driving

The psyche is the mind of the individual.

Psychic driving is the motivations which are programmed into people's minds to compel their behaviors. Once the mind controller has achieved tabula rasa in the mind of the victim, psychic driving is the writing of a new program onto that blank slate. Psychic driving is the creation of a new personality once the brainwasher has achieved the erasure of the old personality.

Psychic driving can take place on the level of a single individual or on the level of an entire culture. The mass media in modern America is very involved in the psychic driving of the entire culture.

Psychic driving can take many different forms. One unsuccessful method was experimented with by the Canadian MK Ultra researcher Donald Ewen Cameron. His form of psychic driving was to put people on LSD and make them listen to tape-recorded messages over and over again.

Those tape-recorded messages failed to shape or influence the victims’ behavior in any way, but this process did drive the victims completely insane and ruined their lives.

I don’t want to describe the psychic driving methods which do work, because I don’t want to teach people how to brainwash. I’m only interested in teaching how to deprogram and heal the mind. To do that, it’s enough to understand the basic concept of psychic driving.

And I want to point out also that the ultimate form of psychic driving is actually done through psychic abilities. This is also sometimes referred to as remote influencing, and it is a very precise technology. This type of psychic driving can be done to a single individual, but powerful psychic adepts can also do it on a cultural level involving the minds of untold numbers of people. For example, when the 9/11 false flag operation was being executed, Satanists performed occult rituals to psychically influence the minds of hundreds of millions of U.S. citizens.

Dissociation

Dissociation is the detachment of the mind from emotions and physical feelings. Dissociation is essential to the process of mind control. People express their individual will power because of their emotions and physical feelings. You are free to the extent that you can feel and act upon what you feel. Those who lose their ability to connect with their authentic emotions and physical feelings have lost their freedom.

A brainwashed sex slave will feel ashamed of being forced to perform deviant sex acts, but that feeling of shame is detached from the mental processes that control speech and behavior. So the sex slave will talk and behave as if she is enjoying a sex act which she actually finds repulsive. She will pretend to feel pleasure during a sex act which is actually painful.

Dissociation is the disconnection of the individual's willpower so that the will of a controller can override it. When someone is completely dissociated, a new personality will emerge. This new personality is a projection of the desires or intentions of the programmer. Dissociation is achieved with physical and/or emotional torture, and this is the basis of the multiple personality phenomena.

The cult of celebrity is promoted as a way of encouraging this type of mind control. Hollywood actors and music entertainers make it seem glamorous to originate different characters. Celebrities dramatize multiple characters in their entertainment acts. Hollywood and music industry leaders secretly intend this as a dramatization of multiple personality syndrome. Pretending to be different persons and having different looks might seem like harmless fun – and I'm sure that it is sometimes – but the worship of these celebrities is actually a form of social mind control. The public is being taught that it's empowering to have many different personalities. The public is being convinced that genuine authenticity is boring and mundane. But the truth is that centering yourself in your authentic personality is your greatest point of power.

Kerth & Kathy

I wasn't subjected to the ultra-extreme type of torture that was used to erase the personality of Veronica. But I was subjected to some MK Ultra techniques, as well as some traditional techniques of Satanic Ritual Abuse, so I did develop two distinct personalities. These were Kerth and Kathy.

Kerth lived with his mundane Christian family and was an ordinary little boy. Kathy dressed in girl's clothing, witnessed Satanic rituals, socialized with adult members of Luciferian secret societies, and was sometimes coerced into doing sex work – usually with adult men.

Most of the sex work I did as a child basically consisted of some sexual role-playing to help get the client's penis hard, then I would put a condom on his erection and perform a method of fellatio. The idea was to lick the head of the penis in the same fashion as I might lick an ice cream cone.

A lubricant would be used on the shaft of his penis and I would stroke the shaft of the penis with my hands until it ejaculated. If the penis was uncircumcised, this chore tended to be easier. It was more difficult to use this technique effectively with a circumcised penis. And often it was more difficult to bring a circumcised penis to erection. While I was performing fellatio, two or more other sex workers would be massaging the man's body. The idea was to overwhelm him with pleasure so that he wouldn't try to take control of the session.

For one thing, some of the sex work I did was for the purpose of blackmail.

And the hidden movie cameras that were used to secretly film the sex act were in fixed positions on the other side of a two-way mirror. So the sex workers had to direct the man onto a bed or chair that was in the focus of the camera. It was necessary for the purposes of blackmail that the man's face be clearly seen in the film and the fact that he was having sex with a male child had to be clear as well. If he tried to take control of the session, he might wander outside the focus of the camera. Also there was the threat that the client might anally rape me which was incredibly painful, especially if he had a large penis. As a child, I personally felt threatened by men's penises. I tended to think of them as potential objects of torture. But if the penis was managed appropriately with fellatio then the man would have an orgasm before his erect penis could be turned into a weapon. Some of the more skilled sex workers tried to prolong the pleasure of sex by delaying the orgasm while sustaining the erection. The other sex workers I knew considered this to be the art of fellatio. If the man was a regular client, I had to concentrate on the art of fellatio. But if the sex work was just for blackmail, I didn't care about that. In such cases I wanted the penis to ejaculate as soon as possible so I could run out of the room before the subject recovered. That way I could avoid further molestation. After all, the whole point of this chore was to acquire a blackmail film for the Baron.

man, but that was rare. The real objective was to obligate the man to do something which the Baron wanted done. This might be corporate espionage, insider information on stock market trends or some type of political intrigue. Also this was a way to compel a man to become entangled with Satanic secret societies. If the Baron wanted to ask a man to join his secret society, he needed to have something he could use to blackmail him. That way the man wouldn’t have the option of going public with the knowledge of the secret society once he was asked to join it. So the ability to blackmail men in this way was essential to the Baron’s work.

The person who managed my sex work, my pimp, was the man we called Bob, the man who worked for the Baron. The way that Bob trained me, and the basic technique of sex work that we used to make blackmail films, was not some random process. The CIA had done a classified study on how to train children to be pedophiliac sex workers, and how to use their sex work for blackmail purposes. This study had involved sexologists, doctors and psychiatrists. They had concluded that the fellatio technique described above did the least physical damage to the child. And the child could service more clients if he or she used that method. The study described methods for training children, in the most efficient manner, to become sex workers. Bob had a copy of a book that contained this CIA report. And one day, when I had grown to be a teenager, I found a copy of this book by chance and read it. The practice of using children for sex work to create blackmail movies isn’t some rare phenomena. The practice of highly organized child sex rings is woven into the institutions of government and finance around the world. The science and a technology of pedophilia was created by the CIA.

Although some mind control slaves are used merely for sex work like Daisy was, that’s not really the only thing that this mind control is used for. Most of the time when I was being Kathy, I was socializing with adult Luciferian members of secret societies. The purpose of having me dress in girl’s clothing and act feminine wasn’t just sexual. It was for depatterning purposes. It was a way to have me break the behavior pattern of ordinary society so that I could be socialized into the Society of Lucifer. It was a way of training me to be a member of a secret society.

It wasn’t lost on me that people in ordinary society would ridicule any boy who dressed in girl’s clothing. And as Kathy, I usually dressed in girl’s clothing. But the Luciferians never ridiculed me for dressing in girl’s clothing; they complimented me. So I knew that Kathy had to be kept secret and that Kathy’s friends had to be kept secret. I was being conditioned to be the faithful keeper of secrets.

The real power of a secret society arises from its ability to remain invisible. Because of its invisibility, it’s able to covertly attack people without reprisal. The Illuminati cloak of invisibility makes its criminal actions possible. Much of the sex work I performed on adult men was filmed so they could be blackmailed later. Blackmail, political corruption, financial fraud, bribery and assassination are all methods used by secret societies to achieve power. Secrecy is essential to all of that. Pedophiliac sex work is just one aspect of this criminal matrix.

Even as Kathy I didn’t like to do the sex work. It was always scary.

Sometimes it was painful. It always made me feel bad. And it was always humiliating. No child enjoys doing sex work. I had been trained to pretend to enjoy it – but even as Kathy, I hated it. I also disliked the Satanic blood rituals. I felt threatened by the ritual torture and killing of animals. All the chanting and spell casting made me feel creepy.

At

first I felt uncomfortable dressing up like a girl and acting feminine, but eventually I got used to it. It was a game I played when I was around my Luciferian friends. Children need attention, and this was a way for me to get attention from adults. Most of the time when I socialized with Luciferians I enjoyed talking with them. They were nice to me, mostly.

They tutored me in reading and writing. They told me stories. We played card games and ate meals together. They taught me about the philosophy of Luciferianism. And they knew that I would keep secret the fact that they were Luciferians because they would keep secret the fact that I was a boy who sometimes dressed like a girl.

I have talked with other persons recovering from this type of phenomena whereupon your personality becomes bifurcated – that is, a split personality. There is a philosophical question there. Where did this other personality come from? In the case of many people subjected to Satanic Ritual Abuse, the answer is that the other personality is a demon. The question is then, what is a demon? So this is a type of demonic possession, but what is the nature of the demon that is doing the possessing? Is it psychological? Is it religious? Or perhaps does it have something to do with extraterrestrials? I don't know for certain what the answer is to that question concerning the nature of demons. But it is undeniably true that in some sense, demons do in fact exist. And in some cases, the alter personalities involved in the multiple personality phenomena are demons. However demonic possession is not the only explanation for where the alter personalities come from.

I don't believe that I myself became demonically possessed. But certainly there were attempts made to implant me with a demon. Another possible answer to the question of where the alter personality may come from is that it may arise from past-life memories. Many early Christians believed in a form of reincarnation. The name for this phenomena was gilgul. They believed that there were certain circumstances where a soul might reincarnate into the world to serve some spiritual purpose.

The soul might come back to make atonement for mistakes made in an earlier lifetime. Or a soul might come back on a type of spiritual mission to help humanity at a critical time. I believe that the Kathy personality initially arose from memories of a previous lifetime when I was a woman named Susan the Poisoner. In that incarnation I was a Satanic witch in old Europe who eventually converted to Christianity.

And the personality from that lifetime became reactivated when I was subjected to Satanic Ritual Abuse in my present incarnation.

The Kathy personality was always more mature and emotionally stronger than the Kerth personality. The Kathy personality was more physically athletic and more intelligent than the Kerth personality. And perhaps most importantly, the Kathy personality had a much higher tolerance for physical and emotional pain. Kerth could be easily broken, but nobody could break Kathy.

But the Kathy personality was only periodically in control of the body.

As Kerth, I was running things most of the time. As Kathy, I could be aware of my life as Kerth – but as Kerth I didn't – couldn't – have any awareness of my life as Kathy. The mind control had created a barrier.

This mental barrier protected my normal life as Kerth. But sometimes things came through anyway. I had nightmares and flashbacks. But for a number of years, there was a clear mental barrier between Kathy and Kerth. The trauma-containing memories created a barrier in the memory system. This caused certain memories to be compartmentalized and associated with a certain personality. I was really always only one person. The Kathy personality was one compartment in the memory system, and the Kerth personality was a different compartment. And trauma-containing memories were the bricks used to build the wall that kept these compartments separate.

Trauma-Based Mind Control

I am assuming here that you have heard of mind-control techniques such as MK Ultra, Monarch and Satanic Ritual Abuse. These types of mind control are used by Luciferian secret societies. All of these techniques are really forms of brainwashing which I am going to refer to as traumabased mind control. The trauma that makes such mind control work is caused by emotional and physical torture. Sometimes it involves drugs.

This torture becomes so overwhelming that the experience becomes blocked out of memory. The people who practice this type of traumabased mind control are very sadistic.

Luciferianism is an occult belief system. Forms of Luciferianism are practiced by the wealthy elite around the globe. These wealthy Luciferians use their secret societies to covertly impose their plans upon the world at large. Trauma-based mind control is one method they use to maintain control over mainstream society.

My goal here is to share enough information that you might have some notion as to what it takes to heal someone suffering from Illuminati mind control. However, I do not intend to share enough information for an unscrupulous amateur, acting alone, to be able to figure out how to use this information to brainwash someone. Nevertheless, covert brainwashing that is highly organized is already being done on a massive scale in society. The Luciferian elite presently have many mind-control technicians with psychiatric training who know perfectly well how to use trauma-based mind control with disturbing skill.

To give an example of how chilling this is, I will describe a film I was once shown. It was a film of the wife of a Senator who had been subjected to trauma-based mind control. The Illuminati's psychiatrists had created an alter personality which could be turned on for the purposes of kinky sex work. In this film of this Senator's wife, I remember that first I could see her normal personality talking with people, and then toward the end of the film, I could see her perform a sex act while she was in her alter personality. This film was in black and white and had sound. It was of reasonable quality for a film shot by an amateur with a handheld camera.

In the first part of the film the Senator's wife is seen visiting the home of a wealthy campaign supporter. He was a man who had donated a great deal of money to her husband's senate campaign. The film had been recorded by the wife of this wealthy supporter using a handheld camera. At the beginning of the film the voice of the camerawoman could be heard more loudly than the voice of the Senator's wife. She was explaining to the Senator’s wife that it was an honor to have her there, and they wanted to document the visit in film. The rest of the film was focused on the wealthy contributor himself and the Senator’s wife, as he showed her around his estate.

Most of the film was boring. It consisted of the host showing the Senator’s wife his big, expensive home with its gardens and such.

The Senator’s wife politely compliments him on his home. Then they get out to the stables where this wealthy man keeps his horses. He goes through the expansive stables showing off his horses. Then he takes her outside to a fenced-in area where he shows her his prize stud. She politely admires the horse for a while.

Then this wealthy man says some control phrase to the Senator’s wife.

Her expression and tone of voice change. He asks her what is her name.

She gives a name other than her real name. He orders her to take off all of her clothes and to carefully fold them up and place them on a nearby bench. She systematically strips and carefully places her clothes on the bench. She does this in a very robotic way. So she’s standing there naked and showing no emotion. But the wealthy man and his hired hand are sneering at her nude body.

Then he has his hired hand take the bridle of the horse and he orders the Senator’s wife to kneel down next to the horse. Then he orders her to start masturbating the horse. The camerawoman, the wealthy contributor and the hired hand all laugh as she robotically does as she’s ordered. The horse becomes aroused and eventually ejaculates.

Then the man orders the Senator’s to wife redress herself. He has her wash her hands with a hand wipe. Then he brings her back to herself. She rocks back and forth and complains that she blacked out for a second.

She complains of a headache. He pretends to be sympathetic. But it’s clear that she has no memory of what she’s just been forced to do.

The thing is, that everything we experience in life is recorded in the subconscious mind. So the Senator’s wife on some level of consciousness did understand what she had been forced to do and could be forced to do at any time. It’s also a fact that this Senator’s wife was known to develop problems with alcoholism and an addiction to medical drugs. So this manipulation of her personality was not some harmless prank. On some level of consciousness she could feel the humiliation and helplessness of what was done to her.

film made of her could be used for blackmail purposes.

It was a way to guarantee the cooperation of the Senator. It’s through such techniques that the government has become so corrupted so that it no longer serves the will of the people. At the present time, the governments in the USA, Israel and Europe only serve a small, wealthy minority of the population. Less than one percent of the population controls the Illuminati-controlled governments. The film of a Senator’s wife robotically masturbating a horse was a political event, and she was an innocent mind-control victim.

This type of absolute power appeals to certain types of personalities.

It isn’t just the perverted sex that appeals to them; it’s the power itself.

They want to take power from others in order to have that power for themselves. They want to treat people like puppets. They want to program human beings as if they are robots. The eventual goal of these control freaks is world domination.

The Illuminati

In order to understand how mind control works, you have to understand the organization that created the advanced mind-control systems that we now find around the world. You cannot understand the mind-control methodology until you understand the nature of the mind controllers.

The Illuminati is a Luciferian cult – secretive in its organization and dedicated to globalism. I would say that the Bavarian Illuminati that was founded in 1776 is only one of many Luciferian secret societies. In my opinion the Illuminati organization is not all powerful, and there are Luciferian cults that are not under its complete control. But the word Illuminati has also become synonymous with all Satanic activity; it just depends on how the word is used in a sentence. So I believe that it's appropriate to use the word Illuminati to either refer to a specific organization called the Bavarian Illuminati or to refer to all Luciferian secret societies.

I believe that many people in positions of institutional power in society are actually operatives who work for Luciferian secret societies. But of course, not everyone in a position of wealth and power is a secret society member. Yet most wealthy and powerful persons do know that the Illuminati exists. At the present time, the Illuminati is tolerated by wealthy non-members because it seems to operate for the ultimate benefit of all the wealthiest persons in the world.

This consolidation of power and wealth into the hands of a small group of people is not really a conspiracy theory. For example, in October 2011, the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology conducted a complex study.

The scientists who researched the economy detailed how a “Financial Super Entity” was controlling the global economy. The study pointed out how 1% of the companies around the world are controlling 40% of the income. It pointed out how five US banks control half the economy and things have only gotten worse since then. The fact that so much wealth is consolidated into the hands of so few people cannot be a coincidence.

The New World Order is a global plutocracy. This global plutocracy was intentionally created and is deliberately maintained. In order to create and maintain such a global plutocracy, a criminal network is required.

One way to think about the Illuminati is as the secretive, criminal aspect of this global plutocracy.

Not all of the generationally wealthy families practice Luciferianism.

At the elite level of wealth, the most common belief is in some form of Social Darwinism. This means that they think of themselves as genetically superior to those less wealthy than themselves. This is the most popular belief system of those families who have inherited great wealth over numerous generations. They imagine that their so-called superior breeding justifies their wealth. Such beliefs are ridiculous, and the truth is that these people are economic parasites who feed on society without really doing any meaningful work. Yet in spite of their irrational justifications for their own greed, they are not all Satanists.

However, knowingly or unknowingly, all super-wealthy individuals are connected in some way to the Luciferian cults that exist among the generationally wealthy. The Luciferian cults manipulate the most powerful persons in society. You find Luciferian puppets at the top of all important international organizations and governments. Such puppets may not openly refer to themselves as Illuminati; however, whether they call themselves the New World Order or simply the global elite – they are all slaves to Lucifer.

As a discrete organization the Bavarian Illuminati is not all powerful.

But it does wield overwhelming power. This official Illuminati organization was originated by Adam Weishaupt on May 1, 1776. This aristocratic Luciferian cult is presently served by a network of criminal organizations, made up of violent Satanists. Almost all organized crime in the USA and Europe is linked to the Illuminati. And they control the governments in the USA, Israel and European Union. They also have relationships with secret societies around the world.

They are presently operating on a schedule for world takeover. They plan to completely collapse the economy of the USA by the end of 2015.

They plan to dismantle the federal government of the USA in 2017 to make it a part of a “superstate” that includes Canada and Mexico. They plan to announce their global government in 2020. And they plan to have control of all the resources on the planet Earth by 2050. And thus far, they are on schedule. So the Illuminati members think of themselves as being very powerful.

However, the ultimate puppet-masters are not the Illuminati members.

They too are puppets. The ultimate puppet-masters are something more demonic. I have known some very well-educated and well-informed Luciferians who have said that the Illuminati is really being run by some type of hostile extraterrestrial intelligence. I can recall that when I was younger and was involved with the Society of Lucifer. I recall conversations that I had with some Luciferians who believed that they actually were extraterrestrials who were just operating human bodies. They told me this in a very matter-of-fact way. One word for this phenomena is overshadowing. The human personality disappears, and the alien/demonic personality overshadows the body and takes it over. Some researchers believe that some aliens are shape-shifters who can take human form. I don't claim to understand everything about these demonic alien overlords. But I do know that the real leaders of the Illuminati aren't really human. Whether or not their DNA is human I don't really know. But I do know that the Illuminati's leaders don't think or behave like human beings, and they don't believe themselves to be human. They actually believe that they are some type of nonhuman entities. They think and act as if they are some type of intelligent Reptilian creatures.

Some Christian ministers also have become aware of what is going on and are using prayer as a spiritual weapon to challenge these demonic forces. But not all Christian ministries are the same. Some Christians are naive about how the Illuminati works. Some Christian ministers are very narrow-minded and intolerant of those who don't agree with them.

But some Christian ministers are very awakened to what is happening with Satanism around the world. And the rise of a global Satanic empire was predicted in Bible prophecy. I have found Christianity and Bible teachings to be personally useful. But I know that not everyone responds to Christianity. In whatever way that you seek to develop your spirituality, you need to have a spiritual awakening. Full spiritual awakening is not just a nice idea, it’s a necessity for survival.

Everyone on the planet is interconnected and everyone is psychically influenced by the Illuminati to varying degrees. The victims of Monarch mind control are extreme examples, but the whole of humanity is being influenced by Luciferian psychic driving. So the development of spiritual and psychic awareness is essential to deprogramming Luciferian mind control. Those who are naive about how they are being manipulated fail to realize that they are being driven like sheep to their slaughter.

The wealthy people who know that the Illuminati exists and do nothing to resist it are not really being very smart. They may temporarily have advantages from their wealth, but the Illuminati intends to soon betray those wealthy persons who aren’t in the Illuminati. The present plan of the Illuminati is to collapse the economy in the USA completely by the end of 2015. And if the Illuminati continue to get their way, the USA will cease to exist as a sovereign nation by the end of 2017. Although the American people have become naive and decadent, there are still strong cultural memories in the American people of democracy and human rights. So this is why the Illuminati intends to start off their final global depopulation campaign by killing off most Americans. Once the USA is in ruins, the Illuminati plans to attack most of the wealthy families around the world. First they will seize the assets of all wealthy nonIlluminati members and then kill all of them and their families.

Also the Illuminati leaders intend to kill off all loyal Illuminati members and their families as they become non-essential to the Illuminati’s plans.

So being a loyal Illuminati member is no guarantee of safety. Right now the Illuminati leaders need many loyal members in order to move their plans forward. And so they treat their members well and give them advantages. But they don’t trust anyone and they hate all human beings.

The Illuminati leaders plan to kill off every human being on the planet except for a few slaves which they intend to severely brainwash. So the Illuminati leaders have policies which will go into effect once they’ve achieved absolute power and their plan is to kill off anyone in their organization as soon as that member becomes non-essential.

I know a man who is called James the Just by his followers. When I was younger I was involved in a type of resistance movement against the Illuminati, and I sometimes worked with James. One function that he performed was to help Illuminati members escape the cult. In some extreme cases, the members would fake their deaths and assume completely new identities. That was the only way they could leave. So it’s very difficult for someone to leave the Illuminati once they have joined.
When I was younger, and also in recent years, I have talked with former members who have escaped the Illuminati. Also I’ve talked with persons still in the Illuminati but who are disillusioned with it. When members are first recruited they are told that the Illuminati is going to create a utopian world society. But it often becomes obvious to the members when they’ve been in the group for a while that this utopia is never going to be created. The Illuminati only intends to create a living hell.

The Illuminati is really a prison. Its members are prisoners to a cruel and inhuman leadership. And the goal of the Illuminati is to turn the entire world into a never-ending hell-like prison.

Emotional Trauma, Violence & Guilt

It isn’t just physical torture that causes people to become traumatized, it’s also the emotional trauma that can come from observing the torture of others or being forced to do intensely humiliating things in order to avoid torture. Also most victims feel intense guilt because of their involvement with Satanism even when that involvement is involuntary.

Trauma-based repressed memories tend to fall into one of three categories:

Trauma imposed on oneself by an abuser.
2.

Witnessing trauma imposed on another by an abuser.
3.

Being forced by a controller to impose trauma on someone else.

No matter what category the trauma-containing memories fall into, they tend to create feelings of fear, depression and guilt. Even when the victims of mind control are completely innocent, they tend to feel guilty.

And the Satanists like to involve other people in their criminal acts. For example, some victims of mind control are forced to perform animal sacrifice as a way of training them to become Satanists.

The blood rituals performed by some satanic cults are designed to intimidate the cult members. Animal or human sacrifices are performed as a way to psychologically intimidate members of the coven. Those who are forced to observe these rituals always feel intimidated by the displays of violence. Even when these violent rituals are done to animals, observing such rituals can be so emotionally disturbing that the experiences become blocked out of memory.

Also, persons in such cults are sometimes tricked into performing acts of violence. For example, one trick is to torture an animal to death very slowly and then another member who dislikes violence will finally kill the animal in order to stop its suffering. Sometimes victims with multiple personalities will have an alter personality which can be programmed to commit acts of violence.

I once saw a series of movies that showed a man being trained to have multiple personalities, one of which was a trained killer. This man had joined a Satanic criminal cult, but he disliked the violence. Apparently he had joined because he wanted the wealth that came from being involved with it. But a problem arose when his wife found out about the cult. She acquired evidence of their animal and human sacrifices and documented some of their criminal activities. She went to the police, but it turned out that the police officer she reported to was also a Luciferian who was a member of a related coven. So the cult found out what she had done.

They abducted her and tortured her to death in front of her husband.

They restrained him and made him watch as they raped her and then slowly skinned her alive. Finally she begged them to kill her. At that point, they allowed her husband to kill her. He was weeping as he slit her throat. This experience became the basis for an alter personality which was trained to be a violent enforcer. This alter personality was first trained to torture animals to death and then he was trained to kill people. Eventually this alter personality came to enjoy the violence. It was as if the man was demon possessed and this possession began at the moment when he killed his wife.

In the Illuminati system, those who are in the Satanic criminal cults are trained for violence at a young age. I think I was about ten years old when I was forced to kill a dog. Really it was a puppy. There was a farm that I was sometimes taken to visit with an older relative who was a Satanist.

There was a puppy there that I was allowed to play with and feed. After a number of visits, whereupon I had emotionally bonded with the puppy, I was then forced to kill it by drowning it. I didn’t want to, but I was told that if I didn’t drown it, I would be tortured by being locked in a box. So I killed the puppy. This was considered to be training. Eventually I did escape the cult, but if I had stayed in, I would have been trained to kill people by first being trained to ritualistically kill animals.

Although I’ve seen movies of human sacrifice, I’ve never personally witnessed one. But I have personally witnessed quite a few animal sacrifices. The most bizarre and terrifying animal sacrifice I ever saw was the time that the Baron ritualistically killed a chimpanzee. He had the chimp dressed up like a minister. The chimp wore a cross around his neck. Apparently the chimp cost the Baron a lot of money. So it was unusual to see a chimp used in animal sacrifice. The Baron had this whole ritual filmed as some type of Satanic training film.

This took place in the basement of his mansion that had been set up as a Satanic temple. He had a large basement underneath his mansion. It had all been painted black. It was lit with gas lights, no electric lights.

This gave it a weird glow. There were strange mystical markings on the floor that were painted in red. And there was an altar at one end of the basement. For this ritual he had gathered some of his followers there.

Most of them were dressed in black robes with hoods. They were naked underneath the robes.

Although I was a boy, the Baron liked to make me dress up in girl’s clothing. For this ritual, I was dressed up all in red. I had on a red dress, red stockings, red boots and red hair. I had on plastic red horns that came up out of my head. I held a plastic red trident. The makeup that had been put on my face made it look reddish. When I looked in the mirror I looked like a devil. And this scared me. When we went down to the Baron’s basement temple I was the only person dressed like this, everyone else had on black robes.

Then this whole ritual was filmed with multiple cameras. The Baron brought the unsuspecting chimp into the room and walked him around, introducing him to his coven members as Mr. Christian Minister. The chimp was dressed in a minister’s shirt and collar with a cross symbol hanging from a cord around his neck. The chimp looked old and seemed weakened somehow. But he had been trained to interact with people. The chimp shook hands with people and they chuckled. But then the humor of the situation ended abruptly when the Baron had the Chimp tied down to a table. It took four men to do this and it was quite an accomplishment.

The chimp bit the men and was screaming and chattering the whole time. Once this was accomplished, the Baron put on a mask that made him look like a demon. He stuck a ritual knife into one corner of the table and told his audience that anyone who wanted to could slit the throat of “Mr. Christian Minister” at any time. Then the Baron slowly tortured the chimp in different ways. It was agonizing to watch this. It was the worse animal sacrifice I’d ever seen. And the chimp screeched and chattered in overwhelming pain the whole time. Finally I took the knife and slit his throat just to stop his pain. I just couldn't stand to see this innocent animal in so much pain.

After I killed the chimp, the Baron had me stand up on his altar holding the bloody knife in one hand. The Baron began to bow down and worship me. Then everyone else joined him.

They chanted, "Blessed is the anti-Christ who shall destroy the doomed Christian Church."

I looked down at them and then over at the dead Chimp. Suddenly everything in the room took on an orange glow. I suddenly felt an intense pain in my solar plexus, and I felt that there was a powerful evil presence in the room. I began to cry. Without thinking about it I cut my left arm three times. The cuts weren't so deep that I bled to death, but they were bad cuts and I still have faint scars from them. The Baron immediately stopped the filming of me. I climbed off the altar and went into a catatonic state for a while. I was aware of what was happening around me but I was completely non-responsive.

A few hours later I came out of it. By then I had been cleaned up and put back into my boy's clothing. My left arm had been bandaged. Apparently I hadn't lost so much blood that I needed to go to the hospital. I was on a couch in the Baron's downstairs library. Bob's sister Betsy had one arm around me and was holding a Bible that she had gotten from the Baron's reference library. She was reading out loud from the Bible. She had multiple personalities and she had gone from her Satanist sex worker personality into an alter Christian personality.

Somebody later explained to me that the Baron had gone on with his film using a different boy who they had dressed up as I had been. Different men and women had sex with the boy and then worshiped him as if he were the anti-Christ. The Baron apparently intended that the spirit of the anti-Christ would possess me, to speak through me to the coven. The Baron was upset because I had wrecked his magickal working when I cut myself. But he could still sell the movie of this event to other wealthy Satanists because of the entertainment value of the torture and the sexual content.

I don’t ever recall that the Baron himself performed human sacrifices or allowed others in his coven to do so. For some reason he drew the line at performing human ritual sacrifice, although he seemed to have committed every other sin of which he could possibly conceive.

Apparently the Baron got the idea for this odd ritual in which he tortured the chimp from something that was done in England. The story was that a ritual like the one I’ve described was performed by some members of British royalty, only they used an actual Christian minister instead of a chimp. And after the boy in the red dress killed the minister, he became possessed by a demon. He stood up on the altar and started speaking to his coven in different languages, describing a plan to destroy all Christianity.

The thing that’s odd about all this was that the Baron was a Christian.

When he wasn’t being a Satanist, he lived his life as a Christian. Someone who knew him better than me said that he took his Christianity very seriously. The Baron didn’t have multiple personalities. His Christian personality could remember everything that his Satanist personality did.

I don’t think that the Baron believed what most Christians believe, but he did believe in the power of ceremonial rituals. The Baron apparently actually believed that being a Christian and performing Christian rituals meant that all his sins would be forgiven when he died. So the idea was that he could use his Satanism to make himself wealthy in the world and still go to Heaven when he died – as unlikely as that sounds.

I’ve known a number of Satanists who were also Christians. They believed that the sins that they committed as Satanists could be forgiven by Christ, so they took Christian beliefs and practices seriously. Satanism is like a drug to which a person becomes addicted. This addiction is to the worldly power and wealth that can come from satanic practices.

Also some Satanists claim that they get feelings of glee when they worship Satan. Some practitioners feel that they can’t stop. But some Satanists also feel bad about what they’ve done and pray to Christ for forgiveness.

Personally I don’t think that it’s enough to just perform some type of religious ritual and assume that this will make up for all wrongdoings.

I don’t believe in the authority of any religion. But I am aware of the existence of God the Creator, and I do believe in the authority of God.

I do believe that the true nature of God is forgiveness. I have known some Satanists and former Satanists who have made acts of atonement to prepare themselves spiritually to accept God’s grace. The greatest act of atonement that one can make is to do something significant to oppose the Illuminati and to undermine its plans.

There is a spiritual entity I identify as Christ. I think that there can be other names for this redeeming spirit, but the name I personally use is Christ. I believe that all of my transgressions have been forgiven by Christ. I am grateful that Christ has healed me.

And for the record, I’m not really the anti-Christ, it was just some stupid film the Baron made. I say this because I know that some Illuminati members have seen the Baron’s film of me being worshipped as the antiChrist. But I didn’t accept the demonic presence during that ritual – I just went catatonic for a while. And I do completely renounce Satan, Lucifer and the anti-Christ.

There is a divine supreme being. There have been many different names for this divine source of creation. Whatever name you use for this Divine Grace, you must allow yourself to be filled with it. A demon can only possess you if you have a spiritual emptiness in your heart. Allowing yourself to be filled with Divine Grace frees you from the vulnerability of demonic possession.

I point this out because I feel that a developed spirituality is necessary to mental health and to deprogramming mind control. A developed spirituality heals emotional trauma. And a spiritual relationship with the Divine Source can free you from the feelings of guilt that may come from being involved with a satanic group. Different people approach spirituality in different ways, and everyone has to find their own path.

For me, Christianity has been an important part of my personal path.

But it’s important to distinguish the difference between spirituality and religion. Some people are religious without being spiritual, and a person can be spiritual without being religious. Nonetheless, it’s the spirituality that really matters. And religious dogma can be a terrible barrier to authentic spirituality.

Exorcism & Catholicism

I don’t claim to understand exactly how every branch of the Illuminati is structured. But some of my experiences as a child prostitute seem to indicate that there is a branch of the Illuminati which controls the Catholic Church. Also there seems to be a branch of the Illuminati that influences other Christian institutions. And there are branches of the Illuminati which control some Islamic sects as well as the Zionists.

However, from what I’ve been told by insiders, Satanism goes back in the Catholic Church for centuries. A Catholic priest, with whom I had a sexual relationship for a while when I was a boy, once explained to me that there are actually two Catholic churches woven together into one institution.

There is the openly known Catholic Church and the Shadow Church.

A priest may be a Christian priest, but he may also be a Satanic priest as well. Only a minority of priests and nuns in the Catholic Church are in this Shadow Church. Most Catholics are clueless when it comes to this Shadow Church. But the Shadow Church is what really runs the Catholic Church. I’m not saying that all Catholics are really Satanists.

The Illuminati system is really controlling all branches of society in Western Civilization. The control of the Illuminati is top down. So the Catholic Church is not an exception to that control. The leaders of the United States federal government are Illuminati puppets just like the leaders of the Catholic Church are Illuminati puppets. But the average American isn’t a Satanist and the average Catholic isn’t one either. Yet the Catholic Church seems to be more under the thumb of Satanists than other forms of Christianity. The Catholic Church isn't unique in this, at this time Israel is also very much under the thumb of Satanists.

I'm not trying to put down anyone's spirituality, but certain religious institutions are very much obsessed with using mind control on their members, and the Catholic Church is one of them. I've attended mass a number of times with Catholic friends, and I believe that it can be a very spiritual experience. For some people, the spirituality of Catholicism is a meaningful experience, but as a theocratic institution, the Catholic Church is very much controlled by secretive Satanists.

I don't know if this is true of all priests in the Shadow Church, but the ones I've known seemed very obsessed with anilingus. This is a sex act where one person kisses and licks the anus of another person. I was forced to perform this dozens of times when I was a child, and it always felt shaming to do this. This might be the point of the ritual: that this is not so much a sexual ritual as it is a ritual which is supposed to make the participants feel ashamed. The anilingus ritual, as I was taught it, was always performed in this way. First, the man's anus was carefully cleaned with two dishrags using two bowls of warm water. First the the anus would be cleaned out with warm soapy water, then with warm water which had no soap in it. The cleaning out of the anus had to be done slowly and very carefully. Then a clear plastic sheet of the type of wrapping paper that is used to preserve food would be utilized. Saran wrap or that type of thing. This would be fitted into the butt crack and spread across the man's buttock. Anilingus would then be performed by sticking ones tongue into the anus as far as possible and kissing the anus repeatedly. My pimp, Bob, was obsessed with avoiding sexually transmitted diseases, so this method of anilingus may have been more hygienic than what was typical. I point this out because according to what I've been told, in the Shadow Church, rituals involving anilingus are considered to be very important. And I can tell you from personal experience that such rituals are demeaning and grotesque. So this speaks to the nature of the Shadow Church.

The Shadow Church which runs the Catholic Church is older than the Illuminati. I've been told that the Satanic Shadow Church first infiltrated the Catholic Church leadership in the eighth or ninth century. However, this Shadow Church was never all powerful. In order to maintain its invisibility, it had to maintain a low profile and work in subtle ways to manipulate the Church. However, over the centuries, this Shadow Church has become increasing influential. But as the Illuminati grew in power, this Shadow Church was eventually absorbed into it. Now the Satanic Shadow Church which runs Vatican City is merely another branch of the Illuminati. Vatican City isn’t really Christian anymore, it’s now just another center of Illuminati power like Washington DC, Las Vegas and the Financial District in the City of London.

This point needs to be made because the Catholic Church has promoted completely misleading ideas about demonic exorcism. If you can accept that demons do exist, and that they can be exorcised, then you should know Catholic exorcism is totally ineffective. The movies which glorify the Catholic Church’s way of exorcism always depict a priest doing war with a demon. This is done by tying up the demon-possessed person after which the priest recites verses in Latin. In the movies, supernatural horrors are depicted before the demon is finally sent back to hell and the demon-possessed person is freed. But the truth is that tying up a person and chanting verses in Latin or any other language would actually only be another form of mind control. This is not true exorcism, it’s just more brainwashing.

The stories in the Bible of Jesus freeing people from demons never involve him tying anyone up or chanting verses in Latin. So I have to say that Catholic exorcism likely doesn’t work and may be harmful.

However things like simple faith in the Divine and sincere prayer work miracles. And there have been reports of some Catholic priests who have some success with persons who appeared to be demon possessed.

However, this doesn’t verify the power of the Catholic exorcism rituals.

It only confirms that faith and prayer in general can be very powerful.

So there is no excuse for tying people up as part of an exorcism ritual.

And there is nothing particularly spiritual about Latin. The historical Christ never spoke it, and it's not a sacred language. Ancient Rome may have been the most Satanic empire in the history of the world, the idea that its language is sacred or has spiritual power is absurd. If anything, Latin is the language of demons, not the language of angels.

Demons are the spirits of hostile entities. These demons overshadow human beings who have been subjected to trauma-based mind control.

Personally I like to read and reread the stories in the Bible of Jesus expelling demons. The use of trauma-causing mind control was very common in the regions controlled by the Roman Empire during the time of the historical Jesus. This practice of trauma-causing mind control was common in the cults known as Mystery Schools. The Mystery Schools were for the aristocrats, but other cults found among the common people used the same techniques. What the Bible refers to as a demon is what a psychologist would refer to as an alter personality. This is a symptom of a person suffering with multiple personality disorder (MPD). So when the Bible tells stories of Jesus releasing people from demons, realize that this may not just be a mythological story. The historical man, upon whom the story of Jesus was based, was someone who was releasing people from the effects of ancient brainwashing cults. Christ, the historical Jesus, was a deprogrammer.

Toxic Therapy Systems

Before I go further into how this Fabian system works, I want to contrast it to what is going on with the therapy systems presently available in society. It may be difficult to convey this point but many of these therapeutic institutions are covertly designed to do harm to their patients.

Psychiatry is intentionally designed to make people insane and keep them that way. Psychology in general is designed to not cure anyone but to make people dependent upon psychologists. Medical practice is designed to occasionally heal people, but to also do things which make them sick and dependent upon the medical system. All of the therapy systems available in society are intentionally designed to be somewhat toxic.

When I was young I knew that there were Satanic secret societies among the wealthy. And some of the people I knew who were involved with these would say that someday the Luciferians were going to take over the world. Back in those days, I found that idea unlikely. But now that I understand more about how the institutions in society are organized, I realize that this was not an idle boast.

After World War Two the United States tried to take possession of the intellectual resources of Nazi Germany. The CIA created Project Paperclip, brought former Nazi scientists into the United States and made them into citizens. This fact of history has been sold to the American public as a wonderful thing. The apologists for Project Paperclip point out that Warner Von Braun was one of these Nazi Paperclip heros, and that he created the space program which allowed us to go to the Moon.

But none of these Ex-Nazis were heros, and the reality of what Project Paperclip really did was hideously destructive.

The MK Ultra program for mind control was driven in a large part by Nazi scientists. The MK stands for Mind Kontrolle, the English word for mind and the German word for control. Think about this. Who’s really in Kontrolle? Obviously the Nazis are. The Nazis were a creation of the Illuminati. The Nazi Party was a project run by the Bavarian Illuminati. The German people were defeated by the Allied Forces at the end of World War Two. But the Nazis were never defeated. They were transferred from Germany into positions of power in the United States and elsewhere.

In the United States former Nazis and other Illuminati stooges were put in positions of power to undermine the use of certain institutions. The medical profession and other so called institutions of therapy have been engineered to do harm instead of healing. I’m not saying that all doctors and psychologists are evil. They have been educated and deceived like everyone else. Doctors and psychologists take up their professions hoping to become healers. But they are subtlety mislead during their educational process. The institutions of medicine, psychology and psychiatry have all been engineered to have some healing potential but to also do some harm. In some cases, such as psychiatry, hospital birth and circumcision, the harm done is very great. And it is intentionally evil.

But Fabian Therapy was never designed like that. The therapists who designed this system were disillusioned Illuminati insiders. They rejected the Illuminati plan to create a toxic therapy system. The Fabians actually designed their therapy system to do no harm and to heal their clients as quickly as possible. They intended that their clients be independent and empowered.

Fabian Technique

I should warn you that if you have been subjected to Illuminati mind control, my message here may trigger negative feelings in you. You may feel lightheaded, or you may even feel angry or afraid. I would encourage you to remain sensitive to your feelings as you consider what I am communicating.

What I am describing here is an approach to therapy that is probably different than what you’ve heard of before. Over the years I have had access to certain insider information which I am sharing with you. I was subjected to Satanic Ritual Abuse as a child, and some of my abusers had psychiatric training and were experimenting with the beginnings of what would lead to Monarch-type mind control. I never completely fell under the complete influence of this type of mind control, but it created many problems for me. I had many personal problems and emotional health issues that arose from having been subjected to this abuse against my will. Later on, I was helped by some people who had backgrounds in psychology, people who had developed a technique for healing this type of mind control. I received help from this type of therapy and I have known others who were helped by it.

The scientists who actually developed this system had a rather technical name for it, but I simply call this technique, Fabian Therapy. This is because the scientists who developed this therapy system believed that persons who have been brutalized with trauma-based mind control are best treated with what may be thought of as a Fabian-type strategy for therapy. This type of strategy is named for a Roman General. In Fabian Strategy you avoid a direct, frontal, military assault and instead you gradually wear down your opponent over time by using indirect attacks.

This type of military strategy was used by General Washington to defeat the British, by the Russians to defeat Napoleon and by Sam Houston to defeat Santa Anna. This strategy works only in situations where you have time on your side and the discipline to maintain a continual attack which slowly weakens your opponent. It has also been used in non-military situations. Corporations sometimes use this approach to defeat competitors. The British Fabian Society is attempting to use this type of strategy to promote its socialist agenda. The Illuminati itself is attempting to use a Fabian Strategy to conquer the world. Although the Illuminati's intentions are evil, a Fabian Strategy in itself is morally neutral – what you choose to do with it determines whether it is good or evil.

The scientists and psychologists who developed this Fabian Therapy system were Illuminati insiders who had become disillusioned with the Illuminati. The Illuminati likes to recruit persons who are idealistic and well-educated. It does this by telling them that when it takes over the world the Illuminati will create a utopian world government. Most who join the secretive Illuminati start off believing that they are going to change the world for the better. However as they learn what is really going on, some Illuminati members figure out that the leaders of their movement are really only interested in making themselves wealthier and more powerful. The disillusioned Illuminati members, who helped me, had come to realize that trauma-based mind control methods are insanely cruel and destructive. So they used their insider information to come up with a system for deprogramming trauma-based mind control.

The victims of trauma-based mind control are programmed with commands that are implanted into their subconscious minds. These implanted commands are designed to keep the victims under control.

These commands are precisely worded statements that are given to the victim when he or she is in an altered state of mind. This altered state makes the victim highly receptive to suggestion.

Implanted commands instruct the victim that he or she is unable to consciously remember having been programmed. Sometimes implanted commands are given which instruct these mind control victims to attack anyone who tries to deprogram them. Implanted commands are also sometimes given which instruct them to commit suicide if they start to remember what happened. And even without implanted commands, the depressing nature of this type of abuse can make the victims feel suicidal when they start to recall the abuse. All of this makes therapy for such victims very difficult.

Psychologists have long recognized the phenomenon of repressed memory. This is a type of selective amnesia. A painful experience which threatens the ego of the individual becomes repressed from normal recall. Implanted commands are contained in a type of repressed memory, but trauma-based repressed memories are harder to deal with than the repressed memories the average therapist encounters.

The human mind has a type of defense mechanism. If an experience is too painful or upsetting, the individual represses it from conscious memory so that he can go on with life. This natural defense system allows the individual to continue to function in society even in the wake of an upsetting experience. Traditional therapy methods often try to confront such repressed memories by using hypnosis or other methods which encourage the patient to remember. This is like a direct, or frontal attack on repressed memories. Fabian Therapy is different.

Fabian Therapy avoids direct contact with painful memories. It does not try to expose repressed memories which might trigger implanted commands. It uses an indirect approach that works gradually over a long period of time. It’s based on an advanced scientific understanding of the human mind.

But in a sense, Fabian Therapy is more than just a technique; it’s an attitude for life. The idea is that instead of trying to confront and reexperience traumatic events, you teach yourself to focus on the present time and environment. You develop an attitude of love and serenity which you express in your present-time environment. When negative feelings or compulsions arise from the past – you have techniques for processing them. That way, you don’t get drawn into the trauma from the past.

Fabian Lifestyle & Attitude

The Fabian therapists didn't just develop a technique for healing traumabased mind control. They had a philosophy for life and an attitude for living which they promoted to their clients. There were two well-known reference books that they encouraged their clients to read. These were Games People Play by Eric Berne and I'm OK, You're OK by Thomas Anthony Harris.

Both books are based in part on the research of a brain surgeon named Wilder Penfield. He sometimes stimulated small areas of the brain and in doing so he would evoke clear and random memories in his patients.

They would find themselves reliving experiences from years earlier.

This recall would be vivid. These experiments led Penfield and other researchers to the conclusion that everything we experience is recorded in memory, whether or not we can easily recall such experiences.

Gestalt psychologists analyze social transactions as having three basic viewpoints: parent, adult and child. The parental point of view is controlling and judgmental. The child point of view rejects personal responsibility. But the adult point of view is that of self responsibility and mutual respect. The contention is that within all memories of social interactions these viewpoints can be perceived. And the idea is to overcome the temptation to assume a parental or childlike viewpoint so that you can center your life in the adult viewpoint.

The Fabian therapists had a similar but somewhat different way of analyzing the memories contained in trauma-based experiences. In every trauma-based memory there are four viewpoints: abuser, enabler, victim and survivor. The abuser is the person or persons causing the abuse to happen. The enabler is anyone who cooperates with the abuser.

The victim is the person who receives the abuse. And the survivor is the recovered victim who was able to process the abuse and is no longer influenced by it. Also the survivor is the point of view a victim needs to assume so that the abuse can be survived. Of course, depending upon the incident, there may be many abusers and many victims. What the Fabian therapists were concerned with was the perception of abuse and victimhood.

Capture bonding is a phenomena recognized by psychologists. This takes place when prisoners begin to admire, worship or identify with their abusive captors. This same thing can happen when victims begin to admire and identify with their abusers. The Fabian therapists would have their clients avoid direct contact with trauma-containing memories.

But they were aware that these memories still had a subconscious influence on their clients. So they knew that their clients might have a subconscious identification with abusive personalities. So the victims of trauma-based mind control might act out abusively in various ways.

When the therapists saw that a client was becoming abusive in some way in his life, they would know that this might represent an identification with an abusive personality.

As a teenager and in my early twenties, I could be very verbally abusive and I would also sometimes shoplift and things like that. So I was what they called a juvenile offender. My therapists helped me to understand why I was acting out in these destructive ways.

The point of Fabian Therapy is to overcome any temptation to identify with the abuser or the enabler. Rather than going into the painful memories and figure which abusive personality I was identifying with, the Fabian therapist looked at what they called the transactions between other people and me. These transactions are the social interactions of ordinary communication. The therapists would analyze how I communicated with them in the therapy sessions. But we would also talk about how I communicated with friends and girlfriends in situations outside of therapy. The therapists would use books like Games People Play to educate their clients on the difference between healthy transactions and unhealthy ones.

Even without trying to directly recall trauma-containing memories, the behavior of abusive personalities would sometimes subtlety surface in the behavior of a client. For example, the Baron had the habit of snapping his fingers when he was ordering people around. He apparently had gone to a boarding school out East or in England, and at times he affected a type of aristocratic and snobbish manner of speaking. In therapy, if I started snapping my fingers, ordering people around or talking in an affected voice, it was an indication that I was identifying with the Baron.

If I started doing that when I was talking with them, they had several ways of dealing with that. One was to do a deliberate “mirroring” of speech and behavior. First the therapist would indicate that he was going to imitate what I had just said. Then he would mimic what I had just said in the manner I had just said it, using my exact words. This way I could see that I was identifying myself with a personality not my own.

The therapists also often tape-recorded sessions and would play back recordings at times for that purpose. Toward the end of the time I was working with them, they began to film sessions and sometimes playback conversations. Also they would sometimes get me to reconnect with my primary personality by asking me about my basic values. For example, if I described a situation where I was verbally abusive with my girlfriend, they might ask me how I would feel if somebody talked to me in that way. And they would ask whether or not I felt that it was OK for people to deliberately hurt the feelings of others. Usually such conversations would move my attention away from the point of view of an abusive personality and back to that of my non-abusive, natural core personality.

The other dynamic of Fabian Therapy is to transcend the attitude of victimhood in order to achieve the attitude of survivorship. That means that you have to focus in on the positive experiences in life and create a positive life for yourself. You don’t want to dwell just on the unhappy experiences and the wrongness of having been abused. This is not an approach to therapy where you dwell on every little thing that ever went wrong with your life. You focus on the happy experiences and you bring them fully into your consciousness.

The Fabian therapists were empathetic without being sympathetic. They would acknowledge the abuse and the wrongness of such abuse, but they wouldn’t let you dwell on it. This is particularly important for traumabased mind control victims. Once you go into the pain and humiliation of the abuse, it’s a deep pit of despair. And if you fall into deep despair, suicide or drug addiction can be the result. So you have to deal with the negative memories of trauma-based mind control appropriately – as if the memories are no more than garbage to be thrown out. The Fabian therapists taught me a cathartic methods by which negative emotions can be processed and released. For example, if I felt anger for no rational reason, it probably had a source in repressed memories of trauma.

Instead of going into the repressed memory, the Fabian therapists might have me beat on a drum in a way that expressed my anger as a way of releasing it energetically.

But these Fabian therapists didn’t want their clients to dwell on anything negative. Instead, they encouraged their clients to create positive experiences and to fully embrace these positive experiences.

Exceptions to the Fabian Therapy Approach

I’ve said that the Fabian therapists tended to avoid having the client go into painful memories from the past and instead encouraged a rehabilitation of the memory system. However, there were always exceptions. They were experts on the use of hypnosis. They knew how to use hypnosis to place a client in a trance state where he or she would be receptive to suggestion. And they knew how to use hypnotic suggestions to protect the client from the pain contained in trauma-related memories. But they only did this in emergency situations. Sometimes a crisis in a client’s life required that the therapists find information which could only be acquired through hypnosis.

However, they used hypnosis as seldom as possible. Because they could stabilize my life and help me without using hypnotherapy, I never experienced the use of hypnotherapy to recover suppressed memories of traumatic experiences. But they did sometimes use hypnotherapy with other clients. They might use it to find out critical information, or they might make posthypnotic suggestions to the effect that a client’s life would become more stable. They might use hypnosis to help a client withdraw from dangerous recreational drugs that were making the client’s life unstable. They might use hypnosis to help a client with a health crisis. But their basic rule of thumb was to use hypnosis as little as possible and only when necessary.

I suppose their reasoning for this attitude was that their clients had already been manipulated through harsh mind-control methods. They wanted their clients to regain self determinism. For the client to become dependent upon the therapists through hypnosis would go against that goal. So they were very thoughtful about when and how they used hypnotic techniques.

I have known some persons who used hypnotherapy to help themselves recover lost memories which were due to trauma-based mind control.

And I have known some persons to have gotten positive results from hypnotherapy. But there are certain warnings that must be given if you, or someone you know, is thinking about employing a hypnotherapist.

Some hypnotherapists are very unethical and can cause harm. Others are skillful, ethical and trustworthy. Here are some guidelines: Any therapist who will not tell you up front how he works should not be trusted. Therapists with secret methods which they don’t share publicly should not be trusted. Any therapy group that wants to get you alone into a remote environment which they control is not to be trusted. However, ethical therapists will be happy to openly explain how they work. An ethical therapist will not object to you having someone you trust be with you during the session. And you should bring a trusted friend with you if you decide to pursue hypnotherapy. They can sit quietly in the room with you and observe while the session is going on. An ethical therapist will not object to the hypnotherapy session being recorded.

Ethical therapists will have offices in relatively public areas where an abduction would not be easy. You really can’t be too careful.

One problem is that the Illuminati has set up front organizations which claim to be opposed to the Illuminati but which are actually looking for Illuminati defectors and others who might cause problems for the Illuminati. Some of these Illuminati front groups claim to be Christians.

Some of these Illuminati front groups claim to be anti-cult groups. If you have been the victim of Illuminati mind control, and you get involved with one of these groups, they will create problems for you at the very least. So developing a sense of discernment is important.

But if you are looking for help, there are those who will help you. There is a quiet industry that is emerging which is made up of psychologists and hypnotherapists who treat the victims of trauma-based mind control.

This is sometimes dangerous for the therapists. So usually they don't advertise the fact that they do this. You will need to study hypnotherapy and interview anyone you hire to help you if you choose this path of using hypnotherapy to recover lost memories. One thing is for certain: it is very difficult to face these painful memories if you are completely alone. So you have to think carefully about whom you are going to turn to in order to seek help.

Unfortunately, at this time, those who seek to heal the victims of trauma-based mind control face a great deal of opposition as they try to organize themselves. But those who inflict trauma-based mind control on innocent victims are highly organized, and they have roots that go back into ancient times.

A Brief History of Trauma-Based Mind Control

Before I describe the details of Fabian Therapy I want to go over some other information related to Luciferian mind control. At the time of my birth, Satanic Ritual Abuse was really more of an art form than a science.

The roots of this form of mind control go back to the Mystery Schools which existed in ancient Greece and Rome. The goal of the Mystery Schools was to train each student to accept the guidance of a daemon, which was conceived of as a type of a supernatural spirit. But these daemons were really just demons. And these Mystery Schools would turn their students into arrogant aristocrats who manipulated their subjects.

Although this movement has ancient roots, the contemporary forms of Luciferianism were first developed in Medieval Europe; and they were based on occultism and demonology. Demonic possession is the goal of traditional Satanic Ritual Abuse. The idea of these rituals is that the ordinary personality of a child is to be replaced with a demonic personality that has occultic powers. Sometimes the word magick, spelt deliberately with a “k”, is used as a reference to occult ceremonial rituals. Satanists believe that they are magickally empowering a child by subjecting him to demonic possession.

The Luciferians I knew when I was young would sometimes refer to non-Luciferians as being mundane. According to this special Luciferian definition of the word, a person who is mundane has no occultic power.

Also a mundane person has no access to secret Luciferian knowledge.

In this sense, although I am not a Luciferian, I am not entirely mundane because I do have some understanding of hidden Luciferian knowledge.

On a personal note, the woman who first subjected me to Satanic Ritual

Abuse was named Shotzy. She spoke with a German accent and had long black hair that she wore in a bun on top of her head. She had psychiatric training and practiced a form of Satanism. I have reason to believe that she had once been a member of the Vril Society, that she had once dabbled in Theosophy, but eventually she graduated to a form of hard core Satanism influenced by the writings of Aleister Crowley.

In Satanic Ritual Abuse a child is traumatized with rape and torture until the mundane personality disappears and a demonic personality takes over. Programs such as MK Ultra were developed to turn Satanic Ritual Abuse from an intuitive craft into an exacting technology.

The CIA is managed by the Skull and Bones Society – and the Skull and Bones Society is a branch of the Illuminati. After the second World War the CIA recruited Nazi psychiatrists – war criminals – and brought them to the U.S. with Operation Paperclip. It was Satanists in the CIA who funded the early scientific studies of mind control. Although it was eventually disbanded, many MK Ultra-type mind control methods are still in use. These contemporary mind control systems are sometimes administered by psychiatrists in hospital settings. They are much more effective than the earlier experimental programs such as the ones done by Donald Ewen Cameron and the early LSD researchers. Monarch mind control is one such contemporary program. It’s known to have been used on some Hollywood celebrities and music stars, as well as many other victims. The Illuminati has psychiatrists specially trained in mind control, and their techniques are very successful in brainwashing people.

The Process of Trauma-Based Mind Control

The victim of Monarch programming may be called a slave. He or she is controlled by a person who may be known as an owner, handler or master.

The core personality is the authentic personality that the victim had before being subjected to mind control. Monarch programming attacks this core personality so that a new personality can be programmed in.

The slave is subjected to trauma which causes the core personality to disassociate.

Disassociation takes place when a person becomes disconnected from reality. In such a state the person can be reeducated with new values and motivations. The processes that Illuminati psychiatrists use to do this are very exact. A mischievous amateur experimenting with brainwashing would probably not be able to duplicate their results in some simple way.

If you simply render someone unconscious and repeat commands in his presence, it’s probable that those commands would never be obeyed. The procedure for implanting commands has other dynamics of psychology which I don’t feel comfortable sharing with the general public. I can tell you that the contemporary forms of Illuminati mind control are very sophisticated. The procedures used by these Illuminati psychiatrists are an exacting form of psychic surgery where the individual’s psyche is dissected. This creates a new personality that is compartmentalized from the core personality. And it is trauma-based disassociation which builds the walls of this compartmentalization.

Some forms of torture that are used to create this trauma necessary to disassociation are sensory deprivation, confinement, restraints, near drowning, hot and cold extremes, spinning, being hung upside down and being psychologically tormented. Most of these techniques are designed to avoid leaving physical bruises or scars. Shotzy was an expert at torturing children with techniques that didn't leave physical bruises. I remember a technique that Shotzy used on me and other children which simulated drowning. With the help of her assistants, she would wrap her victim up in a sheet and to repeatedly dunk his or her head into a bathtub filled with water. This was like an awkward form of waterboarding. In trauma-based mind control, often family and friends are threatened as a form of psychological torment. As a child I was frequently told that my mother would be killed if I ever talked. That certainly gave me a motivation to keep my abusers' secrets.

It's common in Satanic abuse that bizarre visual elements are included in the sessions to give them a surrealistic feeling. This makes any disclosure by the victim seem non-credible. For example, when I was a child, one of my programmers would always wear a Halloween Frankenstein mask. One morning, after a night of witnessing Satanic rituals, I told my mother that my nanny, Shotzy, had taken me away to see the Frankenstein monster. My mother convinced me that it had all just been a nightmare and that I should forget it. It was because of this type of deceptive techniques that my parents, who were not themselves in the Illuminati, were never aware of the fact that me and my siblings were being subjected to abuse.

As well as this, control symbols are used to keep victimized children in line. Mind control commands are associated with a visual symbol so that when the victim sees this symbol, the implanted command with which it is associated will be reinforced. These elaborate methods of psychological manipulation keep anyone victimized by Illuminati mind control from disclosing or even remembering the traumatic experiences.

For example, when I was a child, to keep me from telling others about the abuse I was receiving, one thing that was done to me was that Shotzy took me to a remote location where she performed a Satanic ritual with a live cat and two teddy bears. All three were trussed up in exactly the same fashion on three crosses. The live cat was systematically tortured to death. Every thing that was done to the cat was subsequently done to one of the teddy bears. After a needle was stuck into the cat’s arm, a needle was stuck into the arm of the teddy bear next to him. But the other teddy bear was always left alone. When Shotzy finally got around to tearing out the intestines of the living cat, she then in turn tore out some of the stuffing from in the stomach of the teddy bear. And Shotzy went on like this, going back and forth until the cat was dead. But the other teddy bear was left completely unharmed. After I endured this intimidating demonstration of torture techniques, suggestions were made to me that I would not remember this experience. Then when my nanny, Shotzy, brought me back home after our field trip (which my parents believed was a trip to the zoo) she made a point of giving me the unharmed teddy bear as a present. She did this in front of my unsuspecting parents who insisted that I thank her for the gift. The idea was that the teddy bear would act as a subconscious symbolic trigger to condition me so that I could not tell anyone what was being done to me.

My parents were very please to see that Shotzy, my nanny, had given me a teddy bear as a gift. They were very surprised when two days later I burnt it up in the fireplace. Although I didn’t ever find a way to tell my parents what was being done to me, I did find ways to rebel against Shotzy.

In many respects my own Satanic Ritual mind control was botched because this was back in the early 1960s when the Illuminati were still experimenting with new methodologies, and my Illuminati programers disagreed about how to program me – sometimes they would even argue about this in front of me. Some aristocratic Illuminati members were interested in my bloodlines. Some of these aristocrats thought I might have the potential to become a leader in their organization, and they didn’t want me overly damaged. They ultimately decided that Shotzy’s techniques were too experimental and not traditional enough – and so she was dismissed as my controller. This meant that some of these processes of mind control that had been used on me were left incomplete. Most victims of mind control come to believe that resistance is futile, and they give up trying. But I never completely gave up resisting because sometimes I was able to do so successfully.

In those days, Illuminati mind control was half occultic art and half science, but contemporary Monarch mind control is really more like a precise technology. It's unlikely that a Monarch slave will come out of the mind control on his or her own. Monarch slaves are often used for prostitution, assassination, and as message couriers. They are also used in the Illuminati-controlled mass media as celebrities or news personalities.

The sexual orientation of the slave can be changed from straight to gay, or gay to straight, or whatever. The slave's owner or master has certain phrases by which he can trigger his slave's programming to control that person. The ultimate goal of Illuminati mind control is to develop a psychiatric technology for destroying free will in humans. Free will is a God-given gift, and as Satanists, they desire to rebel against God in all ways.
A lightheadedness is associated with Monarch mind control, which is one reason that it is named for a butterfly. This process of mind control results in the deliberate creation of Multiple Personality Disorder (MPD) also known as Dissociative Identity Disorder (DID).

I knew a woman with this disorder who was successfully treated with Fabian Therapy. She had five distinct personalities – a bisexual sex worker, a violent Illuminati enforcer, a Satanic Ritual priestess, a personality for managing all these other sub-personalities and there was also the primary personality. Each one of these personalities had a different name. Her primary personality was the one she assumed most of the time. Her core personality had been destroyed in her childhood through ritual abuse. Her primary personality was a constructed one that was designed to conceal her other personalities from Christian society. Through her primary personality, she fulfilled her role in life as an ordinary wife, mom, and part-time worker at a mundane job.

Her primary personality was a Christian who had no awareness of her alter-ego personality as a Satanic priestess. Her brother, who was in the Illuminati, purchased her back from another Illuminati member and turned her over to Fabian therapists. These therapists no longer allowed her sub-personalities to be triggered and worked only with her primary personality. After a long period in therapy she was able to recover enough of her memories so that she could no longer be triggered or controlled by anyone.

However, in the course of her treatment her primary personality was systematically transformed. As her sub-personalities became inactive, her primary personality began to take on some of the traits of these sub-personalities. For example, one sub-personality had been trained to fire a handgun and use techniques of karate. One day, to her surprise and the surprise of her husband, the primary personality discovered that she was an skilled marksman and martial arts expert. The story she told me was that her husband took her to a firing range to give her some basic self-defense training and was shocked when it turned out that she knew more than him. Another change in her personality had to do with her religious beliefs. Her primary personality had been a very narrow-minded Christian with intolerant views of other faiths. But as her Satanic priestess personality memories became integrated into her primary personality, she became more open-minded in her beliefs and spiritual practices. Another thing that she had to deal with as she recovered from MPD was her feeling of guilt. Under the influence of Illuminati mind control she had been forced to do things which went against the values of her primary personality. This woman was a success story for Fabian Therapy; she was able to disconnect from the Illuminati and live a normal life. However, I know that she never completely got over all the deep emotional scars created from her abuse.

Although she was someone who suffered from MPD, not all persons who are subjected to Illuminati mind control have multiple personalities.

Sometimes less extreme forms of mind control are used to make small adjustments in the personality of someone who’s creating problems for the Illuminati. For example, earlier in this book I tell the story of a reporter who was going to expose the truth about the Illuminati.

However, before he could do that, he was given a knockout drug in a drink at a bar then taken to a house where he was given suggestions in a structured way. This was done so that he would automatically dismiss anything he heard about the Illuminati as a conspiracy theory. He was given implanted commands so that he would not be able to remember having been programmed. He didn’t develop multiple personalities, but he did drop his story and never investigated the Illuminati again. Many persons in our contemporary society have been “adjusted” in this way to make them conform to the Illuminati plans in some way. Such persons usually don’t have any idea that they’ve been tampered with.

A Visit to a Luciferian Temple

I think it might be useful to understand how mind control is abused by those who understand it. This culture of mind control is very well organized and is very well funded. Many of the mind control experts have sadistic personalities. These are persons who take pleasure in humiliating others. In order to free yourself from the grips of such persons, you must see them for the depraved persons they really are.

Consider the saying, “All power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.”

There is a personal story from when I was thirteen years old that I can tell you which demonstrates this. The Baron needed a favor from an powerful man in another city. So I was taken on a four-day trip. Basically I was supposed to sexually service this man in exchange for a business favor that was to be done for the Baron. And the Baron was going to do a business favor for my clueless nuclear family. In some Luciferian secret societies, pedophiliac sex is a kind of currency. Although in my case, because of my age, this was really hebephilia, which is an attraction for children that are in early puberty. This comes from a Greek root word for youthful beauty. Generally it involves children between 11 to 14 years old.

I wasn’t allowed to know what city we were going to. We rode there in a Winnebago Minnie Winnie. I stayed in the back during almost the entire trip. Two other men, Bob and one of the Baron’s servants drove the vehicle and stayed in motels at night. For some reason the Baron refused to let me bring any boy’s clothing and at thirteen I didn’t really pass as a girl so easily anymore. My voice was changing and I was getting taller and my shoulders wider. So I spent most of the trip hiding in the back of the little Winnebago in my girl’s clothing. I killed time by reading Nancy Drew detective stories which had been left there by Bob’s sister.

I had been told that I was going to visit a Luciferian temple and do some sex work for a powerful man who was a fan of the child pornography films and photos that had been made of me. I didn’t like doing this type of sex work but by that age I was resigned to it.

When we reached the temple, the Winnie was pulled inside into a large garage area that was underneath it. We went up an elevator to an upper floor. The building was very upscale. There were beautiful painting on the walls and expensive statues.

I had been trained to act in a very specific way when dressed up like a girl. Everything was programmed, my facial expressions, my posture, how I walked and how I talked. I was dressed up like a doll, and I was to act like a feminized robot who happened to be a boy. I didn’t really look like a girl, and I don’t think that I was all that attractive. I think what turned them on sexually was that I acted robotically. These people were obsessed with control.

We went up to a mid-sized lecture hall that had a small stage area on one end. There were men in there who all wore masks, and they were all in business suits. There was a woman wearing a decorative, full-face silver mask who sat at the back of the hall with several other people. She sat on a chair that was raised higher than everyone else, and she had a silver crown on her head. I can’t be certain whether she actually was a woman or a man dressed in drag.

This was a type of mind-control demonstration. I was the first act.

Pornographic pictures of me that had been taken at various time in my childhood had been passed around to the men in the audience, many of whom sneered with lust as they looked at them. I got up on the stage and performed a striptease then sexually serviced a man. I acted out my part very robotically, but from my point of view, that was just part of the act. I wasn’t really an unfeeling robot. I felt embarrassed and ashamed, and when it was over I felt relieved. Then I dressed and sat down in the audience next to Bob and the Baron’s servant.

In the next part of the demonstration, the speaker, who was some type of mind-control expert, took out a plate that had human feces on it. He walked around the crowd and let everyone look at the plate of feces up close. I remember that there were little bits of partially digested pieces of corn in it. It stank like feces. There could be no question as to what it was. Then he went up on the stage and put it on a table that had two chairs on either side. And there was silverware on the table. He brought in two middle-aged women who seemed to be under his control. He made suggestions to them that they had not eaten anything in days and that on their plates was the most delicious chile ever made. He told them that they could eat all they wanted. The two women started eating the feces as if it was delicious food. The men in the audience laughed at this display. Then he told the women that they were alone in the desert and that it was so hot that they had to take their clothes off or they would pass out from the heat. So they stripped. The controller put another bowl on the table. Then he told them that they were sunburnt all over, but in the bowl was suntan lotion that would heal them. But in the bowl there was really cow manure, which he had also shown to the audience earlier. The women covered themselves systematically with manure as the audience laughed. These women were lead away to a shower room somewhere, while they were still in a trance state.

The final act was a man who looked like he was homeless. He was in a trance state also, or under some type of mind control. He was told that there were leaches on his arm and that the only way to get them off was to burn them off with a cigarette. He was compelled to burn himself repeatedly with the lit cigarette while the audience laughed. After he was lead away, the speaker explained various methods of mind control, and how ultimately they would be used to control the entire population.

Later that day when we left the building through the garage area in the Minnie Winnie, I looked out through the curtained window, although I wasn’t supposed to. I saw that the building was some type of Freemasonic building. I don’t know what city we were in.

The Social Impact of Mind Control

The victims of MK Ultra and Monarch Mind Control often do not understand that they have been programmed. It’s difficult to estimate how many Americans have been subjected to some type of Illuminati mind control, but we are talking about many thousands of people, most of whom have no idea that they have been programmed. Important Freemasons, military personnel, government officials and corporate leaders are often subjected to Illuminati mind control with implanted (or embedded) commands. Key persons throughout society have been subjected to Illuminati mind control, and most of them do not realize that latent mind control commands have been installed.

The Illuminati have many methods for doing this. For example, I know that certain dentists have been recruited by the Illuminati, and when they put a client under general anesthesia, they implant commands into the victim’s subconscious mind. Another practice is that wealthy Illuminati members have large parties where drugs and alcohol are used. At such parties it’s easy to put knockout drugs in someone’s drink, then have that person taken off to a room where commands are implanted. One way billionaire Illuminati members ensure the loyalty of those who work for them is through implanted mind-control commands.

The Illuminati controls the mass media: the press, television and movies.

Illuminati leaders use these mass media outlets to present visual symbolic triggers to the public. These symbolic triggers stimulate implanted commands. Some of these symbolic triggers are images of monarch butterflies, teddy bears, the single eye, the pyramid, the pentagram, the mask, the maze, the goat's head, and many others. These Illuminati symbols reinforce the implanted commands and keep the victims in line.

Anyone who feels lightheaded when staring at any of these symbols may have been subjected to Illuminati mind control.

What has happened in America, Israel and Europe is that brainwashing on a massive scale has taken place. Society is being structured by brainwashing specialists who don't inform the victims that they have been brainwashed. Unless you have a great deal of knowledge about how mind control works, you may have been programmed against your will and without your knowledge.

Anyone who has noticed that they have unexplained periods of missing time in their life may be a Monarch mind-control slave. Even if you've never been subjected to trauma-based mind control, you probably know someone who has been. That's how widespread this is. There are varying degrees to which Illuminati mind-control victims have been affected.

However, the mechanism through which all such mind control operates is memory.

Memory

Memory is at the heart of mind control. What trauma-based mind control does is to attack the memory system. To heal the memory system you must understand its nature.

There are different types of memory. The terminology I am going to use is as follows:

Memory is any mental record of an experience or of information; it is also the ability to retrieve these mental records. Memory is experienced subjectively in the mind. It may consist of words, symbols or images.

Long-term memory stores, manages and retrieves information or experiences. This memory may last for days or years. This is contrasted to short-term memory which is the working memory that you use to decide whether or not you want to memorize something.

For example, while listening to a lecture, your working memory will be evaluating the information presented and you would decide what information you should forget, and what facts to memorize for a test. That's working memory. And the stuff you choose to forget is shortterm memory. The information that you choose to memorize becomes the explicit memory that you deliberately select for memorization.

Then there is subconscious memory and conscious memory. Memories you can recall are conscious, and memories that you can't recall are subconscious.

Your mind is always recording new memories whether you are conscious or unconscious. Even if you are drugged to a state of unconsciousness, everything you hear or experience during that time is recorded by the subconscious mind. And, under exactly the right conditions, carefully worded verbal commands contained in the subconscious memories can direct your thoughts and behavior. This is what the psychic driving of MK Ultra was trying to do – to program the subconscious mind with recorded messages while the victim was drugged unconscious. The MK Ultra techniques used by the psychiatrist Donald Ewen Cameron tended to be unsuccessful at this. But later Illuminati brainwashing research was able to develop techniques for reliably creating these types of subconscious memories. So in spite of Cameron's failure, other successful techniques for psychic driving have been developed. These psychic driving techniques create a type of memory that can be used to control the victim.

I refer to such memories as occluded memories because they have been deliberately blocked from the conscious mind. Occluded memories contain implanted commands. Implanted commands are instructions made to a slave by an Illuminati controller. They are called implanted commands because they are placed methodically within a unit of memory that has been blocked. The blocking of the slave's memory is caused intentionally with trauma, pain or drugged unconsciousness.

In ordinary life, an individual may repress a memory if it contains overwhelming pain or negative emotions. Repressed memories are also subconscious so a child who witnesses his father beating his mother and represses the memory, may grow up to batter his own wife. However, while in therapy he might remember his repressed memory and change his behavior as a result. Such repressed memories differ from occluded memories in that the repressed memories aren't intentionally created, but they come about as an accident of life. Nonetheless, repressed memories can lead to mental illness, and sometimes they can be treated successfully with the techniques of common psychology.

Both occluded memories and repressed memories are toxic memories which exist in the subconscious mind. In both cases they undermine the individual's ability to think rationally and express his or her free will. The therapeutic removal of toxic, subconscious memories is essential to mental health.

But not all memory contained in the subconscious is toxic. Many pleasant childhood memories are subconscious. Such memories haven't always been repressed – sometimes they've just been forgotten with time – but they are always there, in the subconscious. Most of our subconscious memories are benign.

Conscious memories are of two types – semantic and episodic. Semantic memories consist of information that you’ve consciously memorized. This would be information such as your phone number or facts of history that you learned in school. Semantic memories are made up of words or symbols. Episodic memories consist of your experiences in life – specific events, like walking in the park or playing in a baseball game – these are real events that take place in your waking life. Episodic memories are made up of recalled images, sounds, smells, tastes and feelings. Episodic memories are like movies in your mind containing full sensations and perceptions.

Then there are the memories of purely subjective events such as dream memory. This is your ability to recall some of your sleep dreams. Also there is the memory of imagination. For example if you were to close your eyes and daydream that you are sailing on a yacht – then later on when you remember this daydream – that would be imagination memory.

Confabulation is when imagination memory gets tangled up with or confused with episodic memory. For example if a hypnotist were to make a posthypnotic suggestion that you were abducted by a UFO, and after you were awakened you had memories of the imaginary abduction, that would be an example of confabulation.

Illuminati mind controllers use deliberate confabulation to confuse the minds of their victims. For example, if a man were to be drugged unconscious and then was raped by an Illuminati controller, a suggestion might be made so that he remembers the experience as a UFO abduction where he was anally probed. All the humiliating emotions and painful sensations of the memory would be real; only the context of the experience would be altered in the victim’s mind through hypnotic suggestion. So a person recalling a confabulation of what he thinks is a UFO abduction might really be recalling Illuminati sexual abuse. I should point out that in saying this, I am not trying to be humorous, because there really is nothing funny about this.

But I am using this only as an example. Although some people do have false memories of UFO abductions implanted into their minds, I do also believe that some persons actually have been abducted by hostile aliens. And I believe that Fabian Memory Techniques can be used to help such persons. (See page 161 – Fabian Therapy for Helping Abductees.)

Addressing Memory in Therapy

In conventional “talk therapy”, the therapist might try to tease out a repressed memory so it can be analyzed in a session. But this doesn’t work well with the victims of Illuminati mind control. Sometimes the occluded memories can’t be reached. Or sometimes they are protected by implanted commands for the mind control slave to commit suicide or attack the therapist under any such circumstances.

Painful memories that have been repressed by a traumatized person can be difficult to reach. A hypnotist, in trying to help a patient, might place his patient into a trance state and make the suggestion that such repressed memories can be reached. With ordinary repressed memories this technique of hypnosis may sometimes work to transform the patient’s subconscious memories into conscious memories.

But trying to reveal implanted commands within occluded memories is much more difficult. Sometimes a highly skilled hypnotist may be able to help a victim of Illuminati mind control to restore some memories. But even in careful hypnosis, the implanted commands to block memories, commit suicide or attack the therapist may be triggered.

A hypnotist trying to recover occluded memories from a Monarch mind control victim is like a soldier trying to walk through a mine field without a metal detector.

Fabian Therapy is designed to avoid the triggering of implanted commands. The Fabian therapist is like a bomb defuser. He or she defuses the power of the painful memories before they can do harm to the client.

With a few exceptions, Fabian Therapy only addresses conscious memories – these would be episodic memory, dream memory, imagination memory and semantic memory. Fabian Therapy uses an indirect approach. Except for a few rare exceptions, it never directly confronts repressed memories, occluded memories or any painful memories. And yet, with this indirect approach – it frees the individual from the influence of repressed memories, occluded memories and painful memories.

Fabian Therapy is a highly structured, disciplined approach that requires strong determination, patience and time. To understand why it works, you have to understand the true nature of memory.

The people who developed MK Ultra and Monarch type mind control operated on the idea that human memory is like computer memory. They wanted to program people in the way that they would a computer. They wanted human robots. But the human mind is not a machine mind. The human brain is a living, dynamic organism. The human mind is vastly more sophisticated than the artificial intelligence of computers.

The brain is often defined as the physical, tangible aspect of the mind, and the mind is thought of as the faculty for thought and consciousness. The brain/mind has access to many levels of consciousness. Memories are more than just electrochemical recordings in the brain.

One advanced theory suggests the possibility that memories may be part of an energetic mental field that interacts with the brain and that the memories themselves are not made up of neurons, but are actually made up of stable units of subatomic energy. The neurons would be the physical interface point for the mnemonic energies. In this brain/ mind theory, memory would be conceived of as an energy field that interacts with the body through the brain and nervous system. Although this particular brain/mind theory hasn’t been generally accepted by mundane scientists, it does give you a different way of conceptualizing memory.

The mind is not completely dependent upon the brain, but it does need the brain in order to interact with the living body. Brain damage does not necessarily get rid of all memory, but it can make memory harder to access. There is a plastic quality to the brain so that even if it is damaged, memories and brain functions may still be restored.

But I don’t want to go too far into the scientific theories upon which Fabian Therapy is based. Wealthy Illuminati leaders recruit many of the world’s best scientists. However, the Illuminati scientists often withhold important scientific breakthroughs from the general public. The scientists who developed this Fabian system were Illuminati members who had become disillusioned with the Illuminati’s leadership and were covertly rebelling against it. These scientists had advanced degrees in neurology, physics and psychology. They also had access to scientific information that mundane scientists don’t have. I’m not sure that I ever completely understood all of their theories. But I do understand how their system works because the system itself is fairly simple.

Let me put it this way: you don’t have to know everything about how its engine works in order to drive a car – but you do have to know a few things. In the same respect, you don’t have to understand the advanced theories of brain/mind to understand how Fabian Therapy works, but you do have to understand a few basic principles.

You have to understand that on the deepest level of mind, all memory is interconnected. Although conscious memory can be compartmentalized with trauma, on the deepest level of the subconscious – all memory remains intact and interconnected to all other memory.

The memory field is the entire system of all types of memories – conscious and unconscious. The memory field is a continuum of every type of memory that may influence your mind. And all of these memories are energetically connected to one another on the subatomic level of quantum energy. You don’t have to understand advanced physics, but you do have to understand that every memory is connected to every other memory in your memory field. The mechanism of connection is unimportant to know, but the fact of their connection is important.

What this means is that if you work intensively with one area of memory, it automatically influences every other area of memory. So if you intensely work with conscious episodic memories, you subtly bleed off the pain, trauma and unconsciousness contained in the repressed memories and the occluded memories.

Occluded memories and repressed memories contain overwhelming negative emotions. This can be thought of as a powerful negative emotional charge. When you work with any area of memory, it influences all areas of memory. So when you work with conscious memories in a structured and intense way, you slowly release the negative charge from the occluded and repressed memories. This is why the indirect approach of Fabian Therapy works. When enough negative charge is released in this way, the implanted commands contained in occluded memories cease to have any power. This then releases the Illuminati slave from the control of his or her “owner”.

Command Words

Another concept that you must understand is that while the implanted commands are made up of words and pictures, the real meaning of the implanted commands is primarily expressed through words. And words are semantical. So by working with conscious semantical memory – explicit memory – you can subtly release the negative charge of the implanted commands contained in occluded memory.

Certain words are often found in implanted commands. The following list is an example of common command words: obey, control, submit, sex, sexual, identity, comply, forget, remember, owner, master, controller, slave.

The scientists who developed what I call Fabian Therapy did experiments where they took people who had been subjected to Illuminati mind control and hooked them up to a biofeedback machine that measured heart rate and breathing. The experimenters then slowly read out loud from word lists. These word lists were made up of a combination of neutral words as well as command words such as those listed above. For example the word list might go like this: oats, obey, October, odd, offer – and so forth.

In this experiment, when reading the lists out loud to the subject, no special emphasis was placed on the command words. But when the subject, a mind control victim, heard a command word, the biofeedback machine showed a reaction, without his or her conscious awareness that those words were command words.

Therefore it isn't just the occluded memories that are the problem, but also the command words contained in them.

Command words stimulate the slave into action. The slave cannot resist this stimulation because of the pain contained in the occluded memory. But the power of command words can be deactivated by working with vocabulary in a structured way.

The Process of Fabian Therapy

These ideas may not make complete sense to you unless you work with them in some way. Once I started to work with these techniques, the principles upon which they are based became clear to me.

With all that in mind, this is how the methodology of Fabian Therapy works. There are four basic aspects of Fabian Therapy:

1. First there are a number of journaling techniques. These can be done by the patient when alone, but should be reviewed to some extent with the therapist.

2. Second there is EMA, Episodic Memory Analysis. This is the systematic analysis of non-occluded episodic memories, which must be done with a therapist. This is a very powerful technique when used repeatedly, over time.

3. Third there are extroversion techniques.

4. And finally there are vocabulary exercises to influence semantic memory. This process actually releases the negative charge contained in the words themselves which make up the instructions of the implanted commands.

Although there does have to be a therapist to manage this process, I have to say that most of the time the therapist's role in this process is so simple that some of the people I knew years ago who were doing Fabian Therapy did not have a degree in psychology or certification as a therapist. For the most part, a Fabian therapist is more like an exercise coach who motivates the patient and provides some necessary guidance. However, the overall process does need to be managed by a knowledgeable therapist with practiced skill. And at times, some sophisticated therapy methods are required.

On the other hand, the patient receiving Fabian Therapy must be highly motivated. None of the standard Fabian techniques are complex, but two of them require daily attention and all of them require some selfdiscipline and willpower. The patient has to accept the fact that he or she will have to be in this for the long run to get tangible results.

Any therapist that would use Fabian Therapy would have to have commitment. There is an old saying, “Who rides a tiger does not dismount.” This is not a process that you want to start with someone and leave undone. If you begin this with someone, you may be in it for years and ethically you can’t abandon any patient. To start this process and abandon it uncompleted might cause the patient to collapse into depression or commit suicide.

How long they need to be in therapy really depends upon how extensively they have been subjected to Illuminati mind control. If they’ve been subjected to Monarch mind control to the point of having multiple personalities, they could be at this therapy for years. However, if they’ve just been subjected to one or two session of Illuminati mind control, they might recover fully in a few weeks.

I should also point out that the Fabian therapists I worked with believed that they would eventually find a way to speed up the process of recovery.

Journals

Whether or not you’ve been subjected to mind control, journaling techniques can be very empowering. This is something that anyone could do to empower their lives and to take greater control over their lives.

I have to say that even without the help of a therapist, a person could work with just these journaling techniques and get positive results. I had therapists when I first started to work with these techniques many years ago, and even after my therapists were killed by the Illuminati, I continued with the journaling techniques. Eventually I was able to pull myself up by my own bootstraps, as we are apt to say in Missouri.

So here is a description of three highly structured journaling techniques:
1. The daily episodic journal
2. The daily dream journal
3. An imagination/cathartic journal (that can be done at any time)

The daily episodic journal

The daily episodic journal works like this: every day, towards the end of the day, you make an entry into this journal. It doesn't take long. You always write down these three things in the entry:

- Your full legal name (this would be the name of your primary personality if you have MPD),
- The date,

- And a single episodic memory from that day. Preferably the episode will be something memorable. Perhaps you met an old friend, or saw a pretty bird. It should be a positive memory, not something with negative emotions in it.

The episodic memory should be something you experienced in the real world, not something you saw on TV or the internet; the reason that such are no good for this drill is because recorded images are dislocated in time. If you watch the same TV show at two different time periods, the memory of the show is virtually exactly the same in both memories. So this creates a duplication of a memory in two locations in the memory field. But real life experiences are located only once in the memory field.

To do this drill, simply write down and describe that episodic memory in a way that would make it easy to recall later. Then at the end of each week you review the episodic memories that you've written down for that week. Again, at the end of each month you do a review for that month, picturing in your mind each episodic memory in the order you recorded it. I noticed that when I would do these monthly reviews I would often feel the negative charge being subtly released from my subconscious mind. It made me feel as if I was taking back control of my life and regaining my true self. If you do this journaling technique for at least a year, you can do a review at year's end. This review can feel very empowering.

Anyone who tries to use such journaling techniques should have a commitment of doing them for at least several months because it can take that long before you start to feel tangible results. I should point out that if a person has MPD and they notice that entries are missing on certain days it could indicate that an alter-ego personality had hijacked control during those days.

Some entries made in such a journal might be as follows:

John Smith – Sept 20, 2013 – Took walk in park during lunch break. Saw girl in red dress playing frisbee with man in blue jean jacket. Laughed when I saw their dog steal the frisbee and run away.

John Smith – 9/21/13 – Ate breakfast at cafe and ran into my old friend Jane Jones. We reminisced about our days in college.

John Smith – 9/22/13 – During Sunday Service the children of the Church did an amusing puppet play where they dramatized the six days of creation in Genesis.

The daily dream journal

The daily dream journal is also done on a daily basis. For practical reasons you may not always be able to make entries into this on a daily basis. Some nights you might not have dreams, and some mornings you might have to get up in a hurry. But when circumstances allow, what you do is that you simply write down what you remember of your dreams from the night before. In the evening, before going to sleep, put a notebook and pen next to your bed where it can be easily reached.

Not everybody remembers their dreams. But the funny thing is that many people discover that once they start doing the daily episodic memory journal, they start to have nightmares, and these nightmares are usually memorable. It's also true that if the patient is doing EMA on a regular basis it will indirectly stimulate nightmares during sleep. And actually, if you do start to have nightmares, unpleasant as they may be, it's actually a good sign that the therapy is working. It's through these nightmares that the subconscious mind is releasing the negative charge contained in occluded memories.

However, you don't have to analyze the dreams in any way. Just write down the content of the dream – no matter whether it was happy or upsetting. If you dreamt you were flying – write down, "I was flying." If you had a dream you were being chased – write down, "I was chased." Keep it simple.

There are different systems for analyzing dream symbolism. Some of these systems are based on psychology and some are based on mysticism. For our purposes, you don't need to analyze the dreams for symbolic meanings.

By simply paying attention to your dreams and writing them down you eventually come to release negative charge from your memory field. This technique takes advantage of the mind's natural healing processes. Negative emotions and memories that have been repressed from the conscious mind automatically come out in dreams or nightmares. When you make a commitment to write down your dreams on a regular basis, you automatically stimulate this natural mental process.

However, writing down dreams can get to be kind of boring after a while. Because it was helpful, I did dream journaling for years. To keep myself interested in this type of journaling, I got some books on dream symbolism from the library, and when I was doing this type of therapeutic journaling, I would analyze dream symbols just to make the practice more interesting and keep me doing it everyday. But the scientists who developed Fabian Therapy always insisted that such analysis isn't necessary.

Some entries for the dream journal might go as such:
Ate lunch at a fast food restaurant on the moon. I decided that the food tasted bad, but the other patrons kept eating. Dreamed I was flying. Slowly arose above the trees and went up into the clouds.
Nightmare that I was being chased by demons across a barren landscape.

Woke up sweating.

The imagination/cathartic journal

The imagination/cathartic journal does not have to be done every day, but only when you feel like it. Its purpose is to use your imagination to address and release negative emotions. What you're doing with this journal is that you're trying to purge negative feelings. You're not trying to figure out what happened to you. The purpose of this journal isn't investigative, it's cathartic. This journal can consist of written words and drawn pictures.

This journal is for yourself. You don't have to show it to anyone else, though you can share it with someone else if you choose to. But you should only share it only when you feel it's appropriate to do so. Most victims who have been subjected to Illuminati mind control have bad feelings that they carry with them. They don't really know where the feelings come from or why they are there. At times when you have these bad feelings, you can express them on paper with words and pictures. You might find that you sometimes write things or draw pictures that you would feel embarrassed to show somebody else. You should use your own judgement as to whether or not you share with others what you write down or draw. This journal is for you, not anyone else.

The idea here is to express these bad feelings in words and pictures. There is no right or wrong way to do this. You don't have to have artistic talent. Nothing you write or draw needs to make sense. This process isn't intellectual; it's emotional. This is just another outlet to release negative charge from the memory field.

During the more intense periods of recovery I wrote and drew volumes of materials. I had boxes filled with this stuff. Sometimes I put my musings into the form of fantasy stories to keep myself motivated. Years later when I looked at this material I realized that I had produced nothing of literary value, but the physical process of writing and drawing had been a tangible way for me to release negative emotions.

Eventually I found it cathartic to ritualistically burn up what I had drawn and written about the abuse.

EMA – Episodic Memory Analysis

EMA, Episodic Memory Analysis , is the systematic analysis of nonoccluded episodic memories. EMA requires a therapist. Non-occluded episodic memories are conscious memories which do not contain pain or negative emotions. These episodic memories are of happy experiences in life. What the therapist does in this process is to ask a series of questions that help the patient to go into such memories intensely.

In this indirect, Fabian approach to therapy you are indirectly in fluencing occluded memories by intensely focusing upon happy, non-occluded memories.

Envision the memory field as being like a spider web in which all memories are connected to one another through thin strings. If you poke any area of the web, it will wiggle all the other areas. So if you intensely emerge the consciousness of the patient into one area of memory, it will gently influence all the other memories in the memory field. This is not like mechanical memory such as the memory a computer uses, for computer memory isn't based on consciousness the way that human memory is. What quantum physicists have realized is that consciousness is intrinsic to the universe. What advanced neurologists are beginning to see is that consciousness is the web that holds the memory field together.

The goal of this type of memory analysis is for the patient to reexperience a pleasant memory as fully as possible. The role of the therapist is to use his intellect to guide the process, but the patient should not intellectualize at all. For the patient this process should be as experiential as possible. The client's motto should be: "Don't think about the memory – experience it."

This therapy doesn't require a hypnotic or altered state of mind, so the patient should not close his or her eyes while recalling the memories. I have to emphasize that the patient should not intellectualize the process; for the patient it should be purely experiential. Any memory worked with in EMA should be a happy one which does not contain pain or unconsciousness. It also should not be a memory that he or she has dwelt upon a great deal; that is, it should be a fresh memory that has not been analyzed or talked about very much. To avoid embarrassment, it should not be a sexual or romantic memory. And the memory should be an experience in which drugs or alcohol were not used; that is, a sober experience.

To help you understand this process, I've written down a dialogue below which I have reconstructed from one of my own therapy sessions.
Therapist: Can you think of an appropriate memory for us to work with today?
Patient: I went to a baseball game the other day.
Therapist: Great. To the best of your recall, what was the date and time that this episode began.
Patient: I happened two days ago, I think from about one until four PM.
Therapist: OK. Let's start with your olfactory recall, what smells do you recall?

Patient: I remember the smell of popcorn as I was standing in line to get a hot dog. There was the smell of the hot dogs cooking. Let's see. There was the smell of stale beer on the ground near the beer stand. When I went to the rest room I recall that it stank of urine. In the bleachers I was sitting next to a man wearing a heavy aftershave. I recall someone smoking a cigar. The day was pretty hot, I recall the smell of body odor.

Therapist: Was this your body odor or someone else's?

Patient: Both. And there was something else, I'm not sure what it was. Oh yeah. My friend had sunscreen for his arms and he gave me some.

Therapist: What did that smell like?
Patient: It had a slightly coconut smell, but mostly it had a chemical smell.

Therapist: Good. Are there any other recall of smells? Patient: No.

Therapist: OK, then let's go on to an analysis of your recall of tastes in the episode.

In a systematical manner, each of the different category of perceptions contained in an episodic memory are analyzed in this way. The questions of the therapist are only intended to keep the patient's attention focused upon recalling and experiencing the memory. A session of this type should last from a half hour to fortyfive minutes. The patient is not in an altered state. But he or she should be relaxed and comfortable.

When I first started doing this type of therapy, they would encourage me to close my eyes when I recalled the episode, but then later on they changed their attitude about that. They came up with what they called the “Gray Room”. They had a large walk-in closet in their therapy house. They cleared out that room and painted it middle gray. Then they put in a middle gray carpet. Then they put in a comfortable chair that was painted middle gray. The room was illuminated with a dim bulb. The therapist would sit to one side of me as I sat in the comfortable chair. So I wasn’t face to face with the therapist. So when we would do EMA work, we would sit in the Gray Room and I could recall the memory while my eyes were open. But the space that I was staring at when I recalled the episode was a neutral gray.

Furthermore, the therapist should avoid judging the patient or evaluating the reality of the patient. The mind of the Illuminati mind control victim has been tampered with. Therefore even the ordinary recall of episodic memories might contain distortions. If the therapist hears something that doesn’t sound right, he should not question it. For example, if in describing a happy memory of a family picnic the patient were to say something like, “And then Mickey Mouse flew through the air, killing a chicken.”

The therapist should not question such a statement even though it doesn’t sound rational. In such a case the therapist should just continue on with the process. If a statement seems too disturbing, the therapist ends the session and brings the client fully into the present time. But the therapist never questions a seemingly irrational statement. The therapist doesn’t judge the validity of the client’s statements made during EMA; he accepts them.

It is also true the the morality of Illuminati mind control victims has been tampered with. The patient might, for example, recall a happy experience where he shoplifted something. The therapist should not pass judgement on the patient’s lack of morality in enjoying shoplifting. The rule for the therapist is to not judge or evaluate but to just help the patient keep focused on the experience of recalling a happy memory.

There are a number of different types of perception contained in an episodic memory. The Fabian therapist works through an eight-category list in this order:

1. olfactory (smell)
2. gustatory (taste)
3. tactile (touch)
4. emotions (affectivity)
5. personal movement (subjective kinetics)
6. vision (sight)
7. auditory (sound) and
8. linguistic (language)

Frequently recalled memories have a plastic nature to them. The more you go over memories and talk about them the more likely you are to change them in your mind. But the EMA therapist wants the patient to directly re-experience the memory as much as possible without personal alteration. This is why the list starts off with the recall of smell, taste and touch, because the patient is not likely to evaluate them but to just re-experience them. Analysis of sight, sound and language is left to the end of the session because they are likely to be evaluated and altered by the ego of the patient in memory recall. But if the patient is first directed to a direct experiencing of memory by focusing on things like smell and taste, then he or she will continue with that direct re-experiencing throughout the entire session.

The eight categories are used sequentially and the therapist tries to direct the patient to follow this sequence; that is. you start with category 1, move from there to category 2, etc., ending with category 8. When you complete this last category, the session has ended. However if for some reason the client doesn’t exactly follow the intended sequence, the therapist should not make an issue of it, but should just let the client experience the memory freely. The eight categories exist to give the therapist a structured way to ask questions. The questions are asked to encourage the client to directly experience a happy memory. It’s the client’s experiencing of the memory that matters.

The Fabians believed that this process of EMA actually evokes the creation of endorphins in the brain. Endorphins are peptides (pleasurecausing hormones) that activate the body's opiate receptors, causing an analgesic effect. The Fabians used EMA as a non-drug way to treat depression; this is one reason why Illuminati psychiatrists and big pharma have suppressed public knowledge of this EMA technique.

As much as possible, try not to commingle the different categories of memory perception. For example when analyzing category 7, the audio perception of a memory, the patient would be discouraged from focusing on the meaning contain in a conversation he heard because that is what is analyzed in category 8. In such a case, the therapist would direct the patient back to a pure perception of audio memory by asking how loud or soft the conversation was especially in comparison with other audio perceptions. For example the therapist might ask "How loud was the conversation as compared to the sound of the traffic in the background?"

In category 8, first ask the patient to focus on spoken language, then written language in words and finally symbols. "Symbols" means something that is not a word but which conveys meaning – such as a cross, or a traffic sign warning of deer.

When having the patient concentrate on tactile perceptions (category 3 within an episodic memory), questions would be made up such as "How hot or cold did it feel?" Tactile perceptions involve temperature, pressure, discomfort, comfort, wetness or dryness on skin, fullness or hunger, roughness or smoothness, texture and things like that.

Analysis of vision memory, category 6, would involve things like colors, shapes, patterns, brightness and darkness. It would also include the visual perception of movement, such as the perception of a baseball flying through the air or people milling about in a crowd, but an external type of visual perception of movement should be distinguished from personal movement that is felt within one's own body.

Personal movement or kinetics, category 5, involves the perception of movement physically experienced with the memory. This is both the individual's personal movement and the movement of objects which directly influence the individual. For example if you were in a car you would feel the automobile's movement in your own body as you bounced around. However, if you had recall of walking down the street, there would only be the movement of your body unless somebody else brushed into you. If you were playing touch football with friends, your actions – as well as the motions of the other people – directly influenced you. In this sense, there may be some overlapping of the perceptions in categories 3 and 5. Movement that you personally feel is category 3 or category 5, but a movement that you merely see – such as a bird flying – would be analyzed in category 6 . One way to deal with this overlapping in therapy is to not worry about following the categories too exactly. If there is some overlapping, it won't really matter. When you try to get the client to focus on his feelings of touch, he might come up with some visual perceptions. Never criticize the client. Just accept what you are told and move on with the process.

Emotions, category 4, would be both the perception of other people's emotions and the perception of one's own emotions. The patient can know his or her own subjective emotional responses, but can't know the actual subjective experiences of others. To keep the patient from speculating about what other people are experiencing – limit the perception of other people's emotions to describing what emotions are expressed by the other person with facial expression, tone of voice and body language. With such physical indicators, the patient should be able to read basic emotional responses such as anger, disgust, fear, happiness, sadness, boredom, indifference and surprise. Studies have shown that these eight basic emotional responses to life are found in all human cultures and can be easily read through facial expression and body language. So the patient is asked not what other people were actually feeling inside but rather what emotions were communicated through their body language, facial expression and/or voice inflection.

However, the patient's own subjective emotional responses may be more complex. And the patient should be allowed to describe these personal emotional responses in whatever way he or she chooses. So in category 4, the patient's perception of other people's emotions should be objective, focusing on the perceived perception of their emotions as revealed through facial expressions and such; however, the patient's perception of his or her own emotions is subjective. The patient's subjective emotions might be described as melancholy, optimistic, perplexed, conflicted, euphoric, infuriated and so forth. But the description of other people’s emotions would be simpler. Things like “He looked angry because his face turned red,” or “Her facial expression was one of disgust.”

During the analysis of emotions in an episodic memory, there will be an overlapping of perception categories.

Internal feelings can be addressed under emotions as well, things like the feeling of hunger or fullness and feelings of pleasure. Again don’t worry about some overlapping.

The final category 8, deals with language and meaning, therefore it is more intellectual. Here the patient would focus on the meaning of any conversation that took place in the memory. Also the patient would focus on his or her recall of any written messages that were read in the memory and the meaning of any symbols recalled in the memory. For example a stop sign would be a symbol that has meaning. Also a cross on a church steeple would have symbolic meaning.

Generally speaking, the episodic memory chosen for this type of analysis should be a happy one. The patient might actually choose to create a happy experience in his or her life to be later used in Episodic Memory Analysis. For example, one time I intentionally went to a baseball game prior to a therapy session so I could analyze it in therapy.

Recent memories that are easy to recall tend to be a good choice, but older memories that are easy to recall will also work. In therapy it’s best for the therapist to start out with sessions that address recent happy memories and then after the patient is comfortable with the process, older happy memories can be used in sessions.

As the therapist works more and more with the patient they will want to start working with memories from differing locations on the memory field. That is, they will want to deal with memories that are recent, and memories of the more distant past. In one session you might analyze a happy memory from last week, and in the next session you might analyze a happy memory from two years ago. The EMA process can be applied to any memory which the patient can reasonably recall. The more you use this process, the more you will increase the patient’s ability to remember episodes. With practice, the patient may find that he or she can contact memories from early childhood. The ability of the patient to be able to recall such memories should be the guide.

In doing EMA, it’s vital that the patient not be doing drugs and alcohol during the weeks or months when EMA therapy is being practiced. It’s also important the the patient get a good night’s sleep the night before each session. It’s also good that the patient avoid drinking caffeinated beverages prior to the session

There are always certain principles that must be followed in any Fabian approach to therapy using episodic memories. One is that all such episodic memories must be happy and without unconsciousness, overwhelming pain, or strong negative emotions.

In this indirect Fabian Therapy process, the negative charge contained in occluded or repressed memories will be subtly but consistently released.

The EMA acts as a catalyst. What happens is that the feelings contained in occluded or repressed memories begin to surface in various ways. They may come out in dreams. They may come out in art work such as drawings. The patient may have the occasional flashback during waking hours. The point of this type of therapy is not to dwell on the negative feelings that surface but to simply allow them to happen and then get on with life by extroverting your attention on present-time events and people.

EMA Past Life Exploration

Most past lives therapy that is being used today focuses upon painful memories from past lives, but I think that this approach is a mistake. I think you get much more benefit from past life exploration if you focus on the happy memories from past lives.

The Fabian therapists that I worked with did some exploration of past lives with their clients. In this type of past life memory analysis, they only dealt with positive memories. They might ask a question such as “Recall a past life experience where you felt good about accomplishing something.” Then the client would locate such an experience. Then they would ask, “When was it?” The response to that question might be an exact date, but it might be something subjective like, “During the Civil War era.” Whatever the client’s response to that question, even if it didn’t make sense, would be accepted by the therapist. They would not judge or question anything that the client would say about the past life.

The point of this therapy isn’t to have an intellectual comprehension of what happened in a past life but to create a positive emotional experience. The past life experience would be analyzed with EMA as in the previous chapter.

An interesting point of this has to do with language. The clients might recall a past life where they spoke a language they no longer speak. Commonly, clients recalling such past lives will recall the meaning of what was said even if they don’t understand the exact words. Apparently the soul which incarnates from life to life retains an understanding of the meaning contained in language even when the present incarnation doesn’t understand the language itself anymore. This is because language is really a type of carrier wave which codes and decodes essential information. Information or meaning exists not as words or symbols but as vibrational wave forms in the Universal Mind of God. So meaning itself transcends language.
Persons who did this type of past-life work would discover that conflicts in their present life had arisen from past lives. And they would learn to process those conflicts. The persons who did this type of past-life analysis often would also develop psychic powers as a result.

However in doing past life EMA the Fabian Therapists would make sure that they only contacted episodic memories that had these traits:

- You felt happy about life.
- You were healthy and whole.
- You were sober.
- There was no unconsciousness in the memory.
- You were not in pain.

If a client did come across a past life whereupon he or she contacted a memory containing upset or trauma, the Fabian Therapists would be sure to bring the client into the present time with extroversion techniques.

Extroversion Exercises

Sometimes in this process of Fabian Therapy, recovered memories of painful experiences will suddenly arise into the patient’s consciousness. Rather than going into such memories, the patient is encouraged to retreat from them. That’s what these extroversion exercises are intended to do. They help the patient to escape from memories from the past which contain pain and to focus on the present time environment where the patient can feel safe.

For example, in one session of Episodic Memory Analysis, we started to go into a memory that I originally thought was a true memory. I started to recall the time that my Nanny, Shotzy, took me to the zoo. But as we went on in the analysis, it turned out to be a false memory that had been implanted by Shotzy.

After torturing a cat in front of me, Shotzy used my emotional trauma from that experience to put me into an altered state where suggestions were made to me. It was suggested to me that I not be able to remember the experience of seeing the cat tortured. It was also suggested to me that in place of that experience I should remember going to the zoo with Shotzy. The imaginary zoo trip was described in great detail to me. I received descriptions of all the animals we supposedly saw, the cotton candy I ate and so forth. After this, I was returned to a normal state of mind. Then, as Shotzy drove me home, she talked with me about the imaginary trip to the zoo we had just made – as if we had actually gone to the zoo. She asked me what I thought about the lion who we saw roar at us, and so forth. I felt compelled to go along with this game of hers until I actually started to believe it was true. So by the time I got home, I was describing the trip to the zoo as if it had really happened. Later I would recall it as if it had been one of the happiest of my childhood memories.

Years later, after I had been in Fabian Therapy for a while, during a session of Episodic Memory Analysis, I choose the memory of my childhood trip to the zoo with Shotzy. However, when we started to do the memory analysis, I couldn’t remember any smells. So even at the start of the analysis something seemed to be not right. Then I remembered the malodorous smell of a cat’s intestines being pulled out. Then I remembered the truth about Shotzy and what she did to me. At that point, the therapist used extroversion techniques to bring me out of the painful memory and back into the present time. Had he not done this, I might have collapsed into my negative memories of being repeatedly tortured as a child, and this could have triggered implanted commands to commit suicide.

When he became aware that we had encountered a false memory that was covering a memory of abuse, he quickly started to use extroversion techniques. He asked me what that present day’s date was. He asked me to describe the location of where we were at that present time. He had me look around the therapy room and describe what I saw there. He asked me to walk around the room and touch things – feeling their textures. Then when he was certain I was focused on the present time, we took a walk together and made small talk as we walked along.

All of this activity extroverted my attention away from my painful memories so that I could focus on the present time. As I walked along, I felt more powerful. I could tangibly feel the negative charge being released from me. I remember that on that day my perceptions all seemed clearer, as if a fog had been lifted from me, and I took pleasure in extroverting my attention on my present time perceptions. This is the kind of thing that happens when subconscious memories are converted into conscious memories.

So when practicing EMA, the therapist will always keep the patient’s attention on recalling a happy memory, but if a full-blown negative memory of any kind comes up, then the therapist uses extroversion techniques to bring the patient back into the present time.

Any therapist practicing EMA should have good communication skills and emotional intelligence. The therapist should be professional, friendly and supportive – but not overly sympathetic. When working with a person who has been sexually abused and tortured, it might be a temptation to express deep sympathy – but this can be destructive to the process. Empathy is a better attitude than sympathy. The therapist is not a parental figure working with a child. The therapist and patient are adult equals. The good will of the therapist should be expressed in professionalism rather than sympathy.

Furthermore in EMA there may be unexplainable negative reactions. The patient may get angry for no apparent reason. In such a case the therapist should respond by using extroversion techniques to bring the attention of the patient back to the present time. The basic principle here is that all inappropriate negative emotions arise from a dislocation in time. Something in the past made the patient angry and so now he or she may get inappropriately angry with the therapist. In such a case, both the therapist and the patient must understand that they must bring the patient's attention back into the present time and place. Another thing about negative emotions is that they are always based on fear, so it's important for the therapist to help the patient feel safe.

Extroversion exercises are a necessary part of Fabian Therapy. Extroversion can be thought of in two ways:

1. First, it is simply any technique that brings a person into the present time when he or she has gotten stuck into painful memories of the past.

2. Second, it is an attitude of living an extroverted lifestyle. This means the patient should have a goal of being socially extroverted. Being with other persons in safe, social situations keeps the patient from focusing on the past in a negative way.

Furthermore extroversion also means having one's attention focused on activities taking place in the present time. This can be things like taking a walk, working in the garden or doing physical labor.

For the purposes of EMA therapy, extroversion exercises should be thought of as both social extroversion through conversation with the therapist, as well as perceptive extroversion by getting the patient to pay attention to the present environment. During EMA, the therapist is helping the patient to achieve a deep introversion into a happy, conscious memory. But when the process of EMA is over, the therapist must help the patient to extrovert.

A patient who is in Fabian Therapy is encouraged to not get stuck in painful memories as they spontaneously arise during journaling. This is also true of negative memories that arise in Episodic Memory Analysis, in nightmares or daytime flashbacks of trauma. Although it's a good sign that occluded memories come back uninvited in flashbacks, when this does happen, the patient should understand that while in Fabian Therapy it's best to retreat from such memories. If there is a need for some emotional catharsis, the patient can use the cathartic journaling technique to release negative emotions. Or the client can use drumming or art work to cathartically express negative feelings. But after such cathartic expressions, the patient should extrovert his attention and let go of the experience.

If a session of EMA is interrupted with a strong negative reaction that the patient feels the need to express in some way, the patient should be allowed to write down words or draw pictures to whatever extent he or she feels is appropriate. This can be done for cathartic purposes. But the therapist should avoid the temptation to analyze or dwell on the pictures or words. The idea is that once the negative feelings have been released, the patient should refocus on the present moment.

In a sense, what Fabian Therapy does is to heal the entire memory field through therapeutic memory exercises. In this way the individual takes back control of his or her ability to recall memories. There are two aspects to the memory field:

1. the memories themselves and
2. the mental mechanisms which allow memory to be recalled.

Traditional talk therapy attacks the painful memories contained in the memory field, but Fabian Therapy systematically heals the mind's ability to recall memory through indirect processes. In this way, the individual takes back his or her life.

For years I didn't talk about my experiences with Satanic Ritual Abuse, but I continually did journaling and my ability to remember the abuse slowly came back. After decades of work, I can consciously recall everything that I was subjected to. The way I recall a memory of abuse and the memory of normal childhood life are exactly the same. For example, I can recall a time when my little league team won a baseball game. (My team wasn't very good, this only happened once.) I also recall a time when Shotzy sacrificed a rabbit to Ishtar on a white lace altar before a intricate silver pentacle as she insisted to me that the blood of the sacrifice was beautiful. At one time the baseball memory was conscious and the Satanic sacrifice memory was repressed into the subconscious. Now both memories are conscious. But I never addressed the memory of the sacrifice of the rabbit in therapy. It's just that over time, as my memory field healed, that memory slowly emerged into conscious awareness.

When I first began with EMA as a teenager I had some conscious recall of the abuse that was done to me, but I also had periods of missing time and some mental confusion. As a teenager I experimented with the usual drugs of the 60s, and I often drank too much. But during the time period when I was doing EMA therapy I made a commitment to be clean and dry. There was a period of several years where I avoided my usual drinking buddies and lived a sober lifestyle. It was during that time in my life that I did most of my EMA work. Eventually, I was able to recall the implanted commands contained in occluded memories, and in consciously recalling them I became released from them. For example, I remember the implanted commands made to me that I should commit suicide if I ever started to recall the abuse, but in consciously recalling these recovered memories, I don't feel any desire to commit suicide. These implanted commands have been slowly defused.

But there are still some residual negative emotions. In writing my books, for example, some negative emotions are definitely being triggered. Writing down my memories is difficult. But it is also possible. Someone who had not recovered from this type of abuse would not be able to do this.

Many victims of Illuminati mind control question whether or not they've been abused because they have no touchstone in reality. It's tempting for them to think that the abuse was all just some type of fantasy or confabulation. I have certain advantages over many victims of mind control in that I have had feedback from the real world concerning my abuse. When I was young I had persons I knew in the Illuminati who I could talk with about the cult and its abusive practices. Now, many decades later, I have had some contact with Illuminati insiders who I’ve talked with about these issues.

When I was a child, I had great difficulty even being able to remember the abuse I received. Even after I got to the point where I could remember the abuse, I had great difficulty talking about it. Eventually, after decades of work, I got to a point where I could talk about it, even on a public radio program. I got to the place where I can think about and talk about the abuse because I have put many years of work into the healing of my memory field.

During those years of healing I deliberately avoided going into the painful memories and instead tried to keep my attention extroverted as much as possible. This was a lifestyle choice. I made a point of attending social events and doing volunteer work. I made a point of going on long hikes and doing things outdoors. My attention was not focused upon myself and my personal problems so much as it was focused on other people and the world around me. Illuminati mind control deeply wounds its victims. Fabian Therapy is a method of slowly healing those wounds. During the years that I was healing myself, I managed to live a normal life and I was not under the control of the Illuminati. Extroversion is more than a therapeutic technique, it is an attitude that makes a normal life possible.

Semantical Deactivation Technique

Here the term semantical refers to language, words and symbols used in Illuminati mind control. To be activated is to be pushed or goaded toward an action. The words and symbols in Illuminati mind control commands drive the victim toward taking an action or repressing an action. Therefore a victim of Illuminati mind control is a slave who can be activated by command words. To semantically deactivate the victim of Illuminati mind control is to lessen the power those control words have over him or her.

All the implanted commands used in Illuminati mind control are based upon spoken words – the implanted commands are essentially semantical. However, the spoken words may also be tied to visual symbols and written words. Think about the power of language. A hypnotist can place a person into a trance using words alone. While under hypnosis a person’s heart rate may be increased or decreased – by the words of the hypnotist. Other physiological responses can be invoked with words spoken by the hypnotist. Someone may voluntarily submit to hypnosis, but the Illuminati mind control victim has no such choice. He or she is controlled robotically by the words contained in implanted commands. And all such implanted commands contain a negative emotional charge due to the trauma that has been used to implant the commands.

Let’s say a woman is programmed with Monarch mind control. She has been programmed with an implanted command that says, “You will sexually service whomever your owner instructs you to.”

The words of that command contain negative emotional charge from the trauma-induced mind control. And it is her inability to confront that negative charge that forces her to obey the command. But the negative charge contained in those words can be slowly discharged and neutralized. This is how it’s done: three of the key words in the command phrase above are “sexually”, “owner” and “instructs”. So the Fabian therapist would create three word lists. Each word list would have only one of the keywords from the implanted command in it. So there would be a list, for example, that consisted of the following words: angel, boat, coat, owner, porch, tree, waterfall.

The Fabian therapist would have the patient go through the list and define each word, then make up sentences containing each word. The therapist would draw no special attention to command keywords, but would treat them in the same way as the neutral words which do not stimulate reactions. In doing this, the process would touch the memory field and subtly discharge negative emotions from any occluded memory that contained those command words.

Semantical memory recall is the ability to understand and use words in communication. In a sense, the Illuminati mind control process hijacks the victim’s ability to understand and use words so that command phrases can be used to control the victim. However, by having the patient make vocabulary word lists, he or she can slowly reclaim full conscious control of his or her semantical memory recall. The word list exercise strengthens the patient's ability to understand and use words. This changes how the patient relates to all the words and language contained in the memory field. This ultimately opens a greater conscious awareness of all that is within the memory field.

The therapist might not always know what the command keywords are, so he might have to guess. But consider this: there are certain words you always have to use in the construction of any sentence, words like: the, and, or, of, a, an, in, this, that.

So by using word lists put together, even with guesswork, you still are likely to discover some command keywords. And by working on any type of word list, you influence the semantical memory recall function. In doing this, you strengthen the mind's ability to remember. One principle of Fabian Therapy is that by increasing the mind's mnemonic abilities you decrease the power of occluded memories. Having a client work on any type of memory-improving exercise helps repair the overall memory system. Having the client learn new words and memorize their meanings helps to give the client control over words. You want the client to have control over words, rather than to be controlled by them. So simply by working with vocabulary in general and having the patient make up sentences with words defined in a dictionary, you actually decrease the power of implanted commands.

A Typical Fabian Therapy Session

In a typical Fabian Therapy session, I would arrive up at the house where we did therapy and the therapists and I would sit across from each other at a table. They would each have a notebook and pen, and I would have some paper and a pen too, in case I wanted to take notes. I would not go into an altered state of consciousness. And normally hypnosis would not be used. The attitude would be of adults meeting together as equals.

The Fabian therapists I worked with operated always in teams. There would be at least two therapists. Some times both of them would be with me, but usually they would go back and forth and take turns being the primary therapist. The sessions would go on for hours, and we would take breaks.

The therapists would first ask me if I had any ongoing concerns in my life that would keep me from focusing my attention upon the therapy. One time I forgot to bring enough change for my return trip home on the bus, and he gave me some change. But more often than not, it would just be issues in my life that I needed to talk through a little with someone; things like me not getting along with one of my girlfriends or something like that. This initial conversation would usually not take very long and was called the Preliminaries. (Read more about the Preliminaries at the end of this chapter.)

The Preliminaries were a prerequisite to doing Episodic Memory Analysis. That way your attention would be on the EMA process and would not be distracted by some present-time problem. However, when I was first in therapy, most of our time was spent in these Preliminaries. The point of all this was to make sure that the client was stable enough to go on with the more advanced forms of therapy.

Because the Fabian therapists were dealing with persons with multiple personalities, they would sometimes use lie detector machines. Lie detector machines don't detect lies, they detect emotional responses. But that information is valuable in the case of people with multiple personalities or split personalities. One personality doesn't necessary know what the other personality did or experienced. If the therapist asks the primary personality if he's recently been the victim of violence and he says no, but the machine shows an emotional response, this could indicate that the alter personality has been subjected to violence which the primary personality doesn't recall. So the therapist would know to evoke the alter personality and find out what happened. This way the therapist would be able to help the client avoid being the victim of violence in the future. However, the therapist would want to work with the primary personality as much as possible. So evoking an alter personality would only be done in an emergency situation such as the client's life being in danger.

After that we would talk about my journaling. Sometimes I would bring along my journals and we would look through them and they would encourage me to continue with my journaling practice.

Then we might do something like vocabulary work, that is Semantical Deactivation Technique. We would go over a word list. I would take each word, fully define it with a dictionary and then make up sentences using that word. The therapist would listen to me as I did this. When the list was complete we would take a break for ten to fifteen minutes. And we might do other things. The pattern of the therapy sessions varied some. But these therapy sessions would last for hours and involved a number of different activities.

If we had time, eventually we would go into the Episodic Memory Analysis. This would be the heart of the therapy session. We would usually spend from thirty to fortyfive minutes on EMA. Because the focus of such episodic memories is on happy events, I would usually be in a positive mood at the end of the session.

At the end of the session, the therapist would make sure that I was grounded in the present. The attitude that I had to assume was to be here now; that is, the main focus of my attention should be in the present moment. Often we would go outside and take a walk and make small talk before I took off to go back home.

It was usually during these walks that my therapist and I together would plan when we would next be in session. The frequency of the sessions depended upon what I felt I could deal with emotionally. Commonly we met once a week, every week. Sometimes we met as little as once a month. When therapy first started we met frequently. The therapy sessions tended to make me feel emotionally stabilized. The more sessions I attended, the more grounded I felt. Eventually we started to meet with less frequency.

One important rule was that while I was in therapy I was to avoid talking with anybody else about the therapy. I mostly only talked about the therapy with my therapists. I did occasionally talk with some other patients who had been through this type of therapy. but I never talked with outsiders about it. This was important for two reasons:

1. Fabian Therapy is a rebellion against the Illuminati who don't like it when people rebel against them, and thus are likely to hurt anyone perceived as a threat.

2. Also it's easier to avoid painful memories if you don't talk with other people about the fact that you're in therapy and Fabian Therapy is based on the avoidance of painful memories.

More about the Preliminaries, taken from the author's memoirs: Angelic Defenders & Demonic Abusers:

The Preliminaries were the issues that had to be addressed before going into the main therapy session... During the Preliminaries, Mr. Fabian would ask a series of question from a list. My recall of the questions were that they addressed issues of health and well-being. These would be questions like:

- Did you smoke marijuana at any time during the last two weeks?
- Did you consume alcohol at any time in the last 36 hours?
- Did you have any unpleasant reactions to the last therapy session?

- Have you made any major changes in lifestyle since the last time we met?
- Have you been ill since the last time we met?

- Have you had an episode of emotional distress since the last time we met?
- Have you been the victim of violence since the last time we met?
- Have you committed an act of violence since the last time we met?
- Have you committed any crimes since the last time we met?
- Have you had any social problems since the last time we met?
- Have you had a serious life problem since the last time we met?
- Have you formed any new relationships since the last time we met?
- Do you have any issues that you need to address before we go further into therapy?

When I would answer "yes" to any of those questions, the Fabians would go into a dialogue with me about it. These discussions would take varying amounts of time. The first two therapy sessions that I had with the Fabians, we mostly just dealt with the Preliminaries. By the time that I started therapy with the Fabians, I had become a somewhat troubled young man. The years of abuse had taken their toll on me... I was a typical juvenile delinquent. The Fabians felt that they had to help me to stabilize my life before we started the deep therapy techniques. And that’s what the Preliminaries were for: to help the client deal with real world problems and stabilize.

Advanced EMA Techniques

What I described above is the typical approach to EMA that my therapists were using at that time, and that approach is relatively easy to understand and describe. But they also had some other, more advanced techniques.

In using these advanced EMA techniques they had a diagram that they would make. Imagine a circle divided into eight different sections. This would look sort like a picture of a wheel with eight spokes. Think about the concentric circles such as those that you would see in a tree ring. Now divide those concentric circles into eight equal sections. That is what the diagram looked like.

• The eight sections represent the eight categories described before: olfactory, gustatory, tactile, affectivity, subjective kinetics, visuals, audio and language.

• The concentric circles are a representation of the different time periods in the patient’s life, such as: prepuberty, puberty, young adult and so forth.

• The center circle is the subconscious memories of the patient from the prenatal period, birth and early childhood.
• The surrounding circles are subsequent time periods in the life of the patient so that the outer circle represents the most recent time.
• The chart could be divided into years and the sections used would depend on how old the client was.

This diagram was a chart of the patient’s life that was used as a tool in helping the therapists move the patient’s attention to different points in his memory field. So the chart was like a symbolic representation of the holistic memory field.

They would also use a biofeedback machine in these more advanced techniques. The only purpose of it was to make sure that the patient remained calm, deeply relaxed and without internal conflict. Then they would go to different locations on this chart in a random fashion.

The client would recall the memories with his or her eyes open, and this therapy would be done in a room where everything was of a middle gray color and there were no distractors. The therapists would look at the chart, but the client would not be able to see it. The client would concentrate on only the happy memories.

For example, they might ask the patient to recall a recent happy memory. Having done that, they would ask for a single perception of that memory from one of the eight categories. For example: “Recall a smell in that memory.”

The patient would recall a smell: “I remember the scent of a flower.”

Then they would go to to a different happy memory in a different time location and a different category of perception. Typically, EMA intensely and systematically analyzes a single recalled episode, but advanced EMA is different. Instead of intensely analyzing the memory perceptions from one episode, they would go from episode to episode and pick only one type of memory perception from each episode.

So the patient might recall the smell of a flower when working in the garden two weeks ago, then the taste of corn on the cob from a picnic ten years ago, then the feeling of cool rain coming down on a hot day during a hike three months ago, and so forth.

This would go on for about twenty minutes. I did this a few times toward the end of my therapy work. You needed to already have had a lot of typical EMA work before you could do this. Sometimes we found that I could recall happy sensations from early childhood – memories I thought I had forgotten. My therapists claimed that some of the people they had worked with could recall prenatal memories.

This type of therapy really made you feel good. It tended to leave you feeling uplifted. It also provided a change from the other type of work. My Fabian therapists believed that this type of advanced EMA could speed up the process of recovery. They had used this method with certain clients in The Retreat and in some cases they had achieved an integration of multiple personalities in a matter of weeks.

If the Illuminati hadn't killed my therapists, I think things might have gone better for me in my life. If they had been able to complete their research on their therapy system, I think it would have benefited me and been a substantial contribution to society. I wish that they had been able to openly publish their findings. But I'm hoping that I'm able to reveal enough about their approach so that others who are doing research about Illuminati mind control may gain insight from what I've written here. I feel confident that someday benevolent social scientists will be able to figure out more therapies for effectively deprogramming the victims of trauma-based mind control.

Basic Deprogramming Theory

Just as there are four aspects to the mind control method, there are four aspects to the deprogramming method:

1. awakenment
2. memory recovery
3. authentic self realization
4. emotional sensitization.

1. Awakenment

Awakenment is the experience of an individual realizing that he or she has been brainwashed. This realization doesn't necessarily happen all at once. The individual might wake up a little at a time. This awakenment happens in different ways for different persons. There is an international "Truther" movement in which internet activists are trying to wake people up. Leaders like Alex Jones and David Icke put a great deal of effort into this type of activism. Awakenment is the first step in deprogramming.

2. Memory Recovery

For victims of trauma-based mind control, memory recovery is very problematic. But it isn’t just the victims of trauma-based mind control who struggle with this. Many people suffer from medical birth trauma, the effects of which they do not understand. Men who have been circumcised as children have been tortured, but most do not consciously remember the torture.

Also there is a deep philosophical meaning to memory recovery. As humans, we are powerful spiritual beings. But most humans have forgotten who and what they really are. Reconnecting with your inner spiritual core is a part of memory recovery because you are recalling your true spiritual nature.

But memory recovery also means the rehabilitation of the memory system. The practice of daily journaling is something that can be useful to many persons because it reinforces the health of your memory system.

3. Authentic Self Realization

Authentic Self Realization: It’s become a motto of our time for people to say that they are “looking for themselves” – and this really makes sense because the entire culture has been subjected to varying degrees of mind control. In the case of persons suffering from multiple personality disorder this conflict is intense. When you can reject the false masks of persona that have been imposed upon you and find the person behind the mask, you have found yourself. But this is something that can never be done alone. You need to have relationships with persons for whom you feel mutual respect and affection. Such relationships are necessary in order to know who you are, because we humans are social creatures. Of course some relationships are toxic and destructive. Therefore you have to concentrate on those relationships that are positive and life affirming.

4. Emotional Sensitization

Emotional Sensitization: Most mind control involves varying degrees of disassociation, in which your mental processes disconnect from your emotional awareness and physical sensations. We have all been socially conditioned into ignoring the body’s messages, but reconnecting to your feelings is essential to recovery. There is no simple way of doing this other than to pay close attention to what you are feeling – pain, tightness, tension, etc. – and to then respond to those bodily sensations, which are also called feelings or emotions, in a way that helps to release them.

For years I used artwork and drumming to connect with my feelings. I’m not a good drummer. I have no talent for drumming, but when I would feel negative feelings in my body, rather than going into the traumatic source of the feelings, I would drum. Sometimes I would drum for hours. I’d try to express the emotions through the drumming. My drumming might start off as slow and soft drum beats to express apathy and depression. The drum beats would become faster as I got into fear and anger. Often, by the time I finished drumming, the beat would be strong, steady and cheerful.

There are other ways to sensitize yourself to your feelings. I’ve found yoga and Tai Chi type stretching exercises to be useful for this. Support groups and supportive relationships can be helpful as well. But essentially you must have the attitude that an acute awareness of your feelings and emotions is not shameful but important to your recovery.

Many victims of trauma-based mind control become drug addicts or alcoholics. Psychiatrist encourage psychiatric drug use, which can be very harmful in many cases. These drugs disconnect you from your feelings, while you really need to feel these emotions and process them. Negative emotions can be released in a healthy way with talk therapy, journaling or some physical cathartic expression. It’s good to get physical when releasing these negative emotions. There have been times when I’ve gone out to my car, rolled up the windows and screamed for long periods of time. But most of the time I’ve processed negative feelings with things like art or drumming.

Sexual Templates from Child Abuse

During my childhood, I was sexually abused mostly by men, but sometimes by women. The pedophiliac abuse never felt good. It was always humiliating, sometimes painful and continually frightening. I felt that I had no choice in these abusive sexual encounters with adults. But after I became a teenager I did have a choice in relationships – or I thought I did. While I was in Fabian Therapy, during the preliminary discussions that we had during each session, it slowly became clear that my childhood abuse had become a template for my sexual behavior as a teenager and in my early twenties. I would have sexual encounters with men, and sometimes women, that were in some ways similar to my childhood abuse.

In my teenage years and during my twenties I generally had a girlfriend with whom I had a normal and usually meaningful relationship. This relationship would be openly known about and it tended to be typical for our age group. These relationships lasted for varying periods of time, as little as a few weeks or in some cases as long as a year. These relationships involved some degree of commitment, and they were emotionally supportive relationships that were usually fun and meaningful.

However I also had brief sexual encounters with men and sometimes women. These were secretive relationships that were short-lived and meaningless. Usually these sexual encounters would involve alcohol or drugs. Most of these were not even one-night stands. These sexual interactions would last a few hours or in some cases perhaps only twenty minutes or so. They tended to be encounters that I felt bad about afterwards. They were less sexually satisfying than masturbation. Sometimes they were dangerous. As a child I had been trained to always use condoms, and that was the case for these encounters. But if I hadn’t been trained to be so disciplined in the use of condoms I probably would have gotten a sexual transmitted disease, which I never did. In therapy I eventually realized that I was having sex like this as an acting out of my childhood abuse. A psychological template for bad sexual encounters had been etched into my psyche through my childhood abuse.

Once I was able to make this connection, I stopped this type of sexual behavior. And I did go through a long period in my life where I became celibate because it was less confusing to just not have sex. I worked on my recovery and developed a deeper sense of spirituality. Eventually I did have a relationship with a woman that lasted for years and was mutually supportive and emotionally intimate. But it took years of healing work to get to the point where that felt normal.

This is something that any person recovering from childhood sexual abuse needs to consider. As a prepubescent child, there is no real pleasure from the sex act. There may be some psychological satisfaction such as being the center of attention or pleasing an adult in a position of authority. But the sex act is really for the benefit of the adult and not the child. But as an adult, when the sex act does have the potential to be pleasurable, behaviors learned in childhood abuse may arise in adult sexual behavior. These patterns of sexual behavior are almost always destructive and ultimately undesirable. You’ll know that you’ve healed childhood abuse when you can release the template for sexual behavior that was imposed upon you as a child.

EMA to Reinforce Healthy Behavior

The Fabian therapists did not have any desire to shape my sexual orientation to either gay or heterosexual, but they were concerned that my choices were healthy. During my late teenage years and my early twenties I acted out bisexually. I do believe in gay rights and I do believe that some people are gay or bisexual by nature. But I also believe that homosexuality was imposed upon me by Illuminati mind control, and for me gay behavior was never a good thing. In other words, I’m not really bisexual, I was acting out that way because of the abuse. And the abuse experience was a toxic sexual template.

Throughout the therapy process, it eventually became obvious to me that certain relationships were healthy and others were unhealthy. A few of my gay interactions were more or less healthy. But virtually every gay encounter was something that made me feel bad afterwards, and often they were dangerous. Some of my interactions with women were equally unhealthy. But most of my romantic and sexual interactions with women were healthy and mutually supportive. The sexual relationships that left me feeling good tended to be with women. The Fabian therapists didn’t try to criticize my gay relationships. They did not try to use behavioral techniques to punish gay relationships and to reward relationships with women. Instead the used EMA to focus on my happy memories of romantic experiences with young women.

The Fabian therapists did not ever use EMA to focus in on sexual experiences, even sexual experiences that were happy because they didn’t want their clients to become sexually aroused in therapy. But they would focus on romantic experiences that didn’t result in sexual activity.

For example, one EMA experience was a high school dance that I took a girl to. We never dated before this or afterwards. And to be honest, I think she was trying to get another boy jealous so that he would date her. There was a boy who had dated her a few times, but then he asked someone else to the dance. So the girl hinted that she wanted me to ask her. I had spoken with her a few times, but she was more popular than I was, and I was surprised that she showed interest in me. I nervously asked her to go to the dance with me while we were on lunch break. She agreed. The dance was a pleasant experience for both of us. But the boy she really wanted to date was there also. He saw us together and got jealous. After the dance he started to date her exclusively. Although there was no sexual content to the EMA analysis of that experience, it was a happy experience for which I had no regrets and only good feelings.

By using EMA to focus on those types of happy dating experiences with women, my behavior did shift. I stopped being drawn to unhealthy sexual interactions and became more focused on healthy relationships. Instead of condemning my drug use and drunkenness, the Fabian therapists would use EMA to focus on the times that I enjoyed myself when I was sober. EMA doesn’t shape behavior directly. Instead it speaks directly to emotional consciousness. You focus on the time when you genuinely felt happiness and contentment deep within your heart. This causes you to become drawn to the behaviors that make you feel good, rather than the behaviors that make you feel bad. So the Fabian therapists used EMA to indirectly shift my sexual orientation away from toxic gay relationships and toward natural, healthy heterosexual experiences.

Many persons living gay lifestyles are unhappy. This is not true of all gay people, but it is true for many. So overcoming Illuminati mind control may involve an understanding of how the Illuminati is trying to impose homosexuality on persons who are heterosexual by nature.

Some people are by nature gay persons, and this fact should be understood and respected, but the Illuminati has an agenda to promote homosexual behavior to persons who are not gay by nature. This has to do with plans for massive social engineering. Agenda 21, promoted by the United Nations, contains plans to place all persons in human population centers, which will be like large prisons. One reason for this is to segregate the population by gender the way it is done in prisons. Another agenda has to do with limiting population growth. Prisoners, organized into labor crews, will be separated from persons of the complementary gender, thus pregnancy becomes impossible. There is also the matter of psychological manipulation. Prior to puberty, children are attracted to friendships with other children of their own gender. It’s also true that children at this age are deferential to adult authority. Enforced homosexuality is a way to use social engineering to impose a childlike state of mind on adults. They want to brainwash the average citizen to be attracted to same-gender relationships and to be submissive to the authority of the government. This will mimic a pre-adult state of mind.

Individual therapy systems can heal a single person, but there needs to be deprogramming also on a larger scale because the Illuminati brainwashes not just individuals, but whole societies.

Concordance

The Illuminati tries to synchronize the mind control commands made to its individual victims with the propaganda slogans presented to the public through the mass media. Concordance takes place when the control words contained in mind-control command phrases also are used as propaganda slogans in the mass media. The Illuminati controls the mass media and coordinates command phrases that appear in the mass media with command phrases programmed into slaves during brainwashing sessions.

Consider the propaganda slogan, “Too big to fail.” This first appeared through mass media into public consciousness in 1984. The slogan means that if a corporation is big enough, the government must guarantee its success because its failure would destroy society. Of course this is not true. The failure of a large and poorly functioning corporation is good for society and makes the economy stronger. This is how actual free market capitalism works. But it’s bad for wealthy stockholders who don’t want their investments diminished by economic reality. So this propaganda phrase has been used to justify every type of financial scandal imaginable. But it really isn’t a rational statement. Large corporations have failed before without destroying the entire economy. In fact, common sense tells us that the failure of a large, incompetent and corrupt corporation is good for the health of the economy. But whenever the phrase, “Too big to fail,” is evoked, the politicians respond like Pavlov’s dog and give that large corporation whatever it wants. Many key politicians are victims of Monarch mind control and they’ve been programmed with the implanted command, “Too big to fail.”

Whenever the mind-controlled politicians hear that command phrase on the television, it evokes a conditioned response. They know then, on a subconscious level, that they must give that corporation whatever it wants. “Too big to fail,” is a concordant control phrase. It creates concordance between the individual brainwashed victim and the propaganda used to control the general public.

This “Too big to fail” justification has been evoked in recent financial political scams, and has resulted in massive debt and an ongoing depression.

Some typical concordant control phrases are: “war on terror”, “war on drugs,” “post 9/11 world,” “politically correct,” “New World Order,” “global community,” “hidden hand of the market,” and “free market”.

This coordination of an implanted mind-control phrase, along with the mass media propaganda slogans, prevents discordance within the mind of the brainwashed victim. The brainwashed politician must feel that he is part of a greater movement in society. The politician who has been brainwashed will believe that he is in the right by going along with his programming because that programming is also reflected through the mass media.

However, when mind control command phrases are challenged in life, this can cause the mind-control victim to question his programming. This may cause him to feel anxious, but it also has a potential for releasing him from his mind control, at least to some small extent. The more the public challenges the lies told by the Illuminati-controlled mass media, the more discordance takes place in the minds of the brainwashed politicians.

If you were to hook up the average American politician to a biofeedback machine, and slowly read a word list that contained the words “fail,” “too” and “big”, you would see reactions on the machine whenever any of those three words were read.

I have to point out that in a sense, the entire population of the United States has been subjected to Illuminati mind control. The Illuminati has been taking over the United States a little at a time since before the Civil War. The Illuminati controls the economy of the United States by using the Federal Reserve. Wall Street is a center of Illuminati power. The Federal Government takes its orders from Wall Street and the Bilderberg Group. The consolidation of all mass media corporations into a very few corporations controlled by the Illuminati, has already taken place.

If you get your news from mainstream newspapers or television outlets you are being subjected to Illuminati propaganda. Ever since September 11, 2001, the entire country has been acting out an Illuminati mind-control drama. The extent to which the average American is disconnected from reality is overwhelming.

Whenever a person watches television or spends long periods of time on the internet, that person goes into a subtle, altered state of mind. In this state of relaxation, the individual is less likely to be critical of any information received. When the Illuminati uses brainwashing techniques on politicians and other important leaders, they coordinate their mind control with the propaganda that the general public is being subjected to. This creates a mind-control continuum which consists of both the propaganda control of the public psyche and the Illuminati's brainwashing control of society's leaders.

Those of us who actually tell the truth about what's going on are labeled as "conspiracy theorists". So if you are freed from propaganda and brainwashing, you are actually out of concordance with mainstream society. This is another issue that a person faces in recovering from Illuminati mind control. The more you attain freedom, the more discordance you feel with this society which is based on Illuminati mind control and propaganda. However, if enough people were to become deprogrammed, there would be a tipping point where society in general would awaken to the truth of what the Illuminati is doing.

Nevertheless, my goal in presenting this information at this time isn't political transformation. I simply believe that the information presented here may have some potential to benefit the mental health treatment of individuals.

Deactivating Mind-Control Symbols

There are certain mind-control symbols, visual symbols, that are used to trigger and reinforce Illuminati mind control. Some examples of these are the single eye, the single eye in the triangle, pyramid with the all-seeing eye at the top, the pyramid, the owl, the butterfly, the umbrella, the goat's head, the devil, devil's horns, the skull, the pentacle, the lighting bolt, the teddy bear, the mask, the maze, the doll, the checkerboard pattern of black and white squares, two columns – one white – one black, the torch of Lucifer, a hand holding the torch, the torch bearer, Mickey Mouse, and various hand signals.

All the above symbols are meant to act as triggers to reinforce various mind control techniques. During trauma-based mind control sessions the victim may be forced to look at such symbols and associate them with conditioning.

However the Fabian therapists had a technique for deactivating the power of these symbols. What they did was to create a series of cards some of which contained these Illuminati symbols but most were images or symbols which had no Illuminati association. Some of the cards had religious symbols from various religions. Some cards were corporate logos or images associated with brands of products. Some were of everyday symbols like stop signs. Some were pictures of ordinary everyday objects like a glass of milk or a flower. The cards would be randomized so that they were never in any particular order. The first time they would go through a run of the cards they would do free association. This is sort of like what some therapists do with ink blots. You look at the card and say whatever comes to your mind.

For example when they showed me the teddy bear card for the first time I free associated the word “pain” with the teddy bear. But they would never judge the free association or get hung up on it. They would just move on. And they accepted whatever free association the client came up with.

Then in the next run of the cards, you would make up happy nonsense words which had nothing to do with the symbol. For example, you might be shown a picture of a pentagram and you’d respond with the words, “strawberry jam”. Of course that might be a subconscious reference to blood. But they wouldn’t get hung up on that. The idea of these nonsense words is that they all have a happy meaning. So no matter what symbol you are shown, you make up a happy nonsense word.

This drill would be done periodically. The result of doing this is that you come to realize that you don’t have to accept the meaning of a symbol. It can mean anything you want to make it mean. And when you realize that through the practice of this drill, the symbols stop having power over you and you have power over them.

The all-seeing eye doesn’t have to mean the power of the Illuminati, it can mean insight, or any other meaning you assign to it. These symbols don’t have occultic power unless you accept that power. You can reject the influence of occult power just as you can redefine symbols any way you choose.

One thing that should be mentioned is that in the course of using this technique, the client would often develop headaches, body aches or strange physical sensations. The therapist would encourage the client to communicate when such sensations take place. At that point, the process of looking at cards would end, and the client would be brought back into the present time using extroversion drills. Then, whatever actions necessary to process the negative emotions would take place. Often the Fabians would use breathing exercises to to release stress and increase relaxation.

Other Uses of Fabian Therapy

I know that the scientists who invented this type of therapy didn’t use it only with the victims of mind control. Although their therapy techniques were never presented publicly, they did find people who they could quietly help. I heard the story of a Vietnam veteran who had been traumatized by his war experiences. Fabian Therapy was used to help him heal from his painful memories. It has been used to help persons with depression and other types of psychological problems. In some cases, the therapists would start out with a traditional talk-therapy approach and then switch over to using Fabian techniques. In other cases, they started out with Fabian Therapy and then when the person stabilized, they switched over to typical talk therapy. The scientists who invented this approach believed it could be used as a substitute for psychiatric drugs.

And certain aspects of this therapy approach are commonly used. The Fabian therapists drew ideas from mainstream therapists whenever possible. For example, it’s not unusual for mundane therapists to encourage patients to use journaling. If they had been allowed to, the scientists who developed Fabian Therapy would have shared some of their insights with mundane psychologists. However before they could do that, the research project that developed Fabian Therapy was shut down by the Committee that rules the Illuminati.

Illuminati Cultural Mind Control

Thus far we've mostly discussed the way that the Illuminati programs individuals, but the Illuminati is also programing the entire world culture, and you along with it. So there are some things to think about in understanding this cultural mind control. One thing is that Hollywood and the music entertainment business is pretty much controlled by the Illuminati. So any movie or TV show you look at has been designed to program your mind. If you are not very aware of what you are looking at and how these entertainment programs are designed, you are accepting Illuminati mind control every time you watch TV. This is also true of music.

One thing you should be aware of is preprogramming. Think of all the zombie movies that are being put out. In them, ordinary citizens are turned into evil creatures who must be killed in order for the surviving humans to escape. This image of a zombiefilled world is a template that is being programmed into your consciousness. Your subconscious mind is being programmed by these images. You are being programmed to see everyone you come across on the street as a potential enemy. But there is something more than that. Preprogramming means that movies are used to prepare you for future events that the Illuminati might impose upon society. There is a military chemical weapon called BZ. Victims of this chemical weapon may act in a zombie-like manner. Some feel that the zombie movies are being designed to preprogram the public for a BZ attack against the general population by the Illuminati. When victims of BZ begin to act in a zombie-like way, you are preprogrammed to kill them instead of trying to help them.

You have to realize that the Illuminati owns and controls the mass media outlets in Europe and the USA. When you get your news from these outlets what you are getting is a clever mixture of facts and propaganda. Local news has to be more accurate because you have ways of directly checking out events in your area. But no major outlet news program can be trusted. You can’t trust the news. You can’t trust the history books. In order to be free, you have to question everything. This is a difficult discipline to maintain. But one thing that you have to your advantage is that you were born to have a natural ability to recognize the truth when you hear it. When you pay attention to the feelings that you have in your body, they will reveal truth to you and let you know when you are being lied to.

You need to realize that Psychic Driving, that uses occultic psychic powers, is combined with media propaganda to brainwash the population on a massive scale. The Illuminati have a depopulation agenda and they use movies to forward that agenda. Occultic influencing of the collective consciousness of humanity is reinforced with mass propaganda.

Shortly after the Civil War, a famous Freemason, Albert Pike, created a plan for the Illuminati. This was a plan for Three World Wars. And according to his plan, at the end of those wars, the Illuminati would take over the world and brainwash everyone to believe in “the pure doctrine of Lucifer”. We find ourselves now in the midst of this world war three.

Movies are used to program the minds of the public to accept and cooperate with the process of the Illuminati apocalypse. There was a film made in 1916 called The End of the World. That was just the start of a deluge of cinematic apocalypse films. The compulsion to make such films doesn’t come from public demand. People are just as content to go to see happy films and films that project a positive future. So realize that this type of apocalypse visualization is being imposed upon the public consciousness with evil intentions.

This is just a short list of some of the better known films which promote the idea of an impending apocalypse:

Deluge, Things to Come, The Day the Earth Stood Still, On the Beach, Planet of the Apes, A Boy and His Dog, The Terminator, Waterworld, The Day after Tomorrow, This is the End, Mad Max, The Road Warrior, Dr. Strangelove, Invasion of the Body Snatchers, WALL-E, Dawn of the Dead, Children of Men, Fail-Safe, Night of the Living Dead, The Thing, Shaun of the Dead, Twelve Monkeys, Zombieland, 28 Days Later, Hunger Games, War of the Worlds, The World's End, The Matrix, A.I. Artificial Intelligence, Contagion, Testament, The Dead Zone, Dogma, Judge Dredd, World War Z, Miracle Mile, I am Legend, The Road, and Soylent Green.

Understand this: television and movies are designed to be Illuminati propaganda. When you look at TV and movies in an unthinking way, you are allowing yourself to be brainwashed. The act of looking at a movie or TV actually alters your brainwaves so that you go into a state of light relaxation. This is what a hypnotist does when he relaxes a client in order to make hypnotic suggestions. You are better off if you only watch movies that are funny and life affirming. The less you watch television and movies, the more control you have over your own mind.

The Illuminati Power Structure

When I talk about extraterrestrials, people sometimes roll their eyes. And many people who have awakened to the fact that our governments are really being run by secret societies draw the line at an awareness of hostile ETs. However, you have to realize that the general public has been conditioned to deny the existence of intelligent ETs in much the same way that Pavlov's dog was conditioned to salivate whenever he heard a bell ring. So let's go there. You can't really understand the true nature of thought control until you see the controllers for the intelligent insects that they are.

The symbol of the Illuminati is an owl – which is a bird of prey that operates in the darkness – hence a symbol for secret societies in general. The Illuminati rose to power in part by first taking over the Freemasonic lodges in Europe and the USA. The symbol of Freemasonry and aristocratic Luciferianism is the pyramid. The Illuminati has taken over the Freemasons and all other secret societies in the USA, Israel and Europe. So for many, the pyramid has become a symbol for the Illuminati which is itself organized as a hierarchy with all the power at the top. I have been told that the Illuminati is run by a Committee of three hundred people, but really those three hundred are connected to other powerful, wealthy interests. So realistically what we’re talking about is a few thousand people who basically rule much of the world. Their control is not absolute, but they are powerful enough – and criminal enough – that if they really feel threatened by someone they might have that person killed. Supposedly, all initiated members of the Illuminati are themselves protected from such punishments, but in reality if they offend the hierarchy, they can be executed. So if an Illuminati member offends anyone who is on the Committee or close to it, there is the possibility of harsh reprisals. The leaders of the Illuminati are very powerful people who are devoid of moral restraints.

The Illuminati is a personification of an otherworldly demonic empire. I personally believe that the Illuminati is something like a hostile alien consciousness. If you want to, you can think of this as a metaphor: evil aliens rule the world. But you might consider the possibility that this is literally true. The way I visualize the Illuminati is that at the top of the pyramid are dispassionate and intellectual gray aliens. They manipulate everyone with their psychic powers. The Illuminati members who I call the High-Adepts are interested in psychic abilities, but they don’t indulge in the sexual rituals or the blood rituals. They are only interested in psychic connections with demons, Lucifer or Satan. I would say that these High-Adepts make up the ruling 1% of the Illuminati. They are the real leaders, but you never see them on TV or the internet. They have a group of criminal enforcers who are loyal to them. These enforcers are Satanists who are obsessed with sex and violence. Some of them have extreme practices such as animal sacrifice, human sacrifice, cannibalism and blood drinking. They make up perhaps 15% of the Illuminati. The other 84% are basically puppets. Some of the puppets may seem powerful – the presidents of the USA and such – but they are just puppets manipulated by the High-Adepts. If the puppets get out of line, the enforcers put them back in line or kill them. And High Adepts have complete control over the enforcers. These High-Adept Illuminati members are gray aliens, or they are possessed by the demonic souls of gray aliens. The criminal enforcers are Reptilian aliens, or they are possessed by the demonic souls of Reptilian aliens. However you look at this, the leaders of the Illuminati aren’t really human.

The Sci-Fi movies always describe alien invasions as being fought with spaceships and such, but I don't think this is the case. These aliens are using their psychic powers to invade our planet. The High-Adepts are genteel in their mannerisms. But if somebody crosses them, they have their violent enforcers who can step in.

The Suppression of Fabian Therapy

Back in the early 1980s, the Fabian therapists who had helped me and others got in trouble with the Illuminati. The Committee which runs the Illuminati did not initially object to the idea of a therapy system being developed to undo the damage caused by MK Ultra mind control. Every now and then, after they destroyed somebody's mind, they wanted to restore it again.

I heard a story once of an important scientist whose mind was ruined with trauma-based mind control to the point where he couldn't work anymore. Fearful that he might reveal the technological data that he had discovered, they tried to erase part of his memory and then put him to work on a different project. But the trauma-based mind control wrecked his mental stability, and he wasn't able to work effectively. So they used these Fabian techniques, which I've just described, to restore his sanity and he was able to go back to work for them.

However, the Fabian therapists who helped me also helped many others. They started helping too many people whom they hadn't been authorized to help. And some paranoid members of the Committee felt threatened by their deceptions and disobedience. That is why my therapists were killed.

I had two main therapists. They were a husband and wife team. They were two of the scientists that had developed the basic theories and protocols of what I call Fabian Therapy. I also knew of some other therapists who worked at a compound known as The Retreat. This was an isolated environment where therapy could be conducted intensively.

I did have a split personality when I was a child and certain events caused my personality to spontaneously reintegrate. But my personality has always been somewhat split. Instead of developing multiple personalities, I had one very complex and conflicted personality. I always could remember some of the abuse, but there were originally some gaps in my memory. Sometimes I had periods of missing time in my life when I seemed to spontaneously disassociate. This usually happened when I was very upset. I was not very functional when I was a teenager. I struggled with life and felt suicidal until I was well into my twenties.

However, I managed to eventually stabilize my life. Part of this was from this type of therapy I received, and part of this was that I had become more spiritual. Prayer and meditation became important parts of my life. But in truth I have never completely gotten over the emotional scars caused by the Satanic Ritual Abuse which I had experienced when I was a child. Emotional wellbeing is something I've struggled throughout my life. I feel disturbed by the knowledge of all the evil things which the Illuminati are still doing to our world. However, I still consider myself fortunate when compared to what I've seen happen to other victims.

Anyone who joins the Illuminati makes an oath of secrecy so that they can't talk publicly about the Illuminati. But I never joined and never took the oath of secrecy. So I am not breaking any rules by talking about this information.

The members of the Committee don't really trust one another – and for good reason. Most of them achieve and maintain power through betrayal.

Some of them would like to see the Illuminati become less powerful and more decentralized. Their motivation in wanting decentralization isn't out of kindness but out of a desire for personal survival. The power struggles within this group are difficult for outsiders to understand. My perception of this situation is that some people on the Committee want this information about Fabian Therapy to be made public, but others don't. I'm not friends with anyone in the Illuminati, but I do have some feeling for how they operate. There are those within the overall Illuminati organization who recognize that the Illuminati must someday be deconstructed and that one element of that deconstruction is the development of therapy systems for treating the victims of traumabased mind control. So there are those even in the Committee who wish the suppression of Fabian Therapy to end.

Even those persons who are helped with Fabian Therapy still experience problems. The scars of this type of mind control are very deep. And such scars do not heal quickly. Just because you can remember something that you had forgotten due to trauma does not mean that you have healed emotionally. This is why the Fabian therapists were more concerned with creating positive experiences in the lives of their clients than they were with restoring memory loss. The goal of Fabian Therapy is not to restore lost memories, however as the mind is rehabilitated the ability to recall what was once lost memories does take place. So with enough healing you do find that you can remember everything. The goal of this therapy is to free victims of Illuminati control so they are able to function in life. The goal of Fabian Therapy is to help unhappy people find real happiness and contentment again.

I can’t say that I’ve ever been able to completely recover from all the psychological scars of my own experiences, but I can function in life well enough to be able to speak out against the Illuminati – and that makes me better off than most Illuminati mind-control victims. I was well along with my therapy when my therapists were killed, so I was able to continue on with it by using journaling techniques after their deaths. I took the attitude that I could best honor their sacrifice by continuing to heal myself.

I won’t go too much into the details of their deaths right now, but I mention this because it points out the problems you might have in trying to help people who are the victims of Illuminati mind control. The Illuminati mind controllers don’t want their slaves to be freed. Many victims of Illuminati mind control don’t consciously know that they’ve been programmed. However, the Illuminati’s control over their slaves is not absolute. There are slaves who have been highly programmed and who are monitored on a regular basis; such victims would probably be very difficult to help. However, there are a great many people who have only been subjected to a few session of Illuminati mind control, and some of those victims may suspect that their minds have been tampered with. There are always some persons who can be helped, and the point is to help those people who can be.

In a sense the ultimate goal of Fabian Therapy is to heal the world. That is, to create a world where everyone can find happiness in a life of contentment. Many people around the world strive to create such a world, but they are often suppressed. However, someday that suppression will end. As people become more aware of what is going on with the institutions that have been influenced by the Illuminati, I believe that there will be a movement to eliminate psychiatry. Also I believe that there will be a movement to reform medical institutions and psychology. I believe that my experiences with the Fabians helped to give me a vision of what this reformed psychology will look like.

Institutionalized & Medicalized Mind Control

When I was young I knew that highly-organized Satanic secret societies existed among the wealthy. I knew that they hurt children and were criminally violent. I also knew that if I talked about this publicly, nobody would believe me. But what I didn’t understand until I became older was how the oppression of Luciferian mind control is found in the institutions of society. It really is integrated into every major institution.

So you need to understand that mind-control methods aren’t just being used by Satanic cults, they are being used by all the major institutions in society. My personal awakening to this fact came about in this way:

When GMO tomatoes first came out I started to eat them, believing that they were safe. The government approved of them and the news media said they were safe. Shortly after this I started to develop a very serious stomach problem. I didn’t associate it with the GMO tomatoes, I didn’t know what was causing it. But it felt as if I was being poisoned. I experienced intense pain in my stomach, and sometimes the pain was so overwhelming that the only way I could lessen it was to stick my finger in my mouth and vomit. I went to the doctors and they asked what I had been eating. I told them about everything I ate, including the GMO tomatoes, and they eliminated food as the cause of the problem. Then the doctors did expensive test after expensive test. These tests were an extreme financial burden. One of the tests injured me for life and its damage can’t be undone. While I was in the hospital recovering from the botched and unnecessary test, they fed me a meal that had GMO tomatoes in it, and this meal made me extremely ill. I was in overwhelming pain for hours.

The doctors never figured out what was causing the problem. But one doctor who was a respected expert did tell me something interesting. He said that my health problem wasn't psychosomatic; it wasn't "all in my head." He knew this because many other people had the same problem and nobody in the healthcare industry seemed to know what was causing it. After months of intense pain and losing thousands of dollars, I gave up on hospitals and doctors.

I finally went to a group of professional psychics that I had heard about. They did a psychic reading where they consulted a spirit guide. The advice that came back was that I should stop eating GMO foods. They also recommended an organic herbal tea that would soothe my stomach. I took the psychics' advice and immediately got better. The psychics did charge a small amount for the health reading, but it was a tiny fraction of what I had paid to the hospitals and doctors who had not helped me at all. I had always been told that people who claim to have psychic ability are quacks and that we should only trust the advice of doctors, journalists and the government. My going to the psychics had been an act of desperation.

And what I realized from this was that some psychics are legitimate and that the fraudulent institutions of healthcare, mass media and government are not to be trusted.

Although I did know about the existence of organized Satanism when I was young, I did not comprehend how it had taken control of so many organizations in society. But I have done a great deal of research since then. Brainwashed puppets of the Luciferian secret societies hold positions at the top of every major institution. Psychiatric institutions are designed to drive people insane. The Federal Reserve is designed to create widespread poverty and financial deprivation for the masses. News agencies disseminate propaganda. The educational institutions limit intelligence and teach falsehoods. The court system imposes injustice on the people. And the hospitals do sometimes cure people, but they also sometimes make people ill.

Psychiatry seems to be particularly toxic. Psychiatric drugs are very destructive. I don’t deny that psychiatrists do sometimes help people and that certain psychiatric drugs under certain circumstances can be helpful. But the way that psychiatry is being used today has nothing to do with promoting mental health. Psychiatry has become an institution of toxic social control. And although many people do not realize this, Monarch mind control is being routinely administered in hospital settings by psychiatrists.

Even the way that the Fabian therapists dealt with alcoholism was different than Alcoholics Anonymous. Although I know that AA has helped some addicts very much, there are some toxic ideas in it that make its approach ineffective. For one thing the recovering addict is told over and over that he must accept the fact that he is “powerless”. It’s nice that AA encourages one to look for a spiritual Higher Power, but to dwell on powerlessness is not healthy. The fact is that we are amazingly powerful beings who have yet to tap into our latent powers. Another thing about AA is that right at the start of their program, they have you dwell on every mistake you’ve even made in life. All of this is just more brainwashing. It is depatterning and tabula rasa to erase your old personality, then they use The Big Book of Alcoholics Anonymous and meetings as psychic driving to create a new personality.

When I was young, I had some very serious issues with drugs. There was a period when I was taking amphetamines and barbiturates as well as drinking alcohol in a way that was very dangerous. This was all a reaction to my childhood abuse. We called the drugs uppers and downers. I knew some other addicts who were experimenting with these same drugs who died.

The way that the Fabian therapists got me out of this destructive habit was to use talk therapy to convince me to quit all drugs and alcohol long enough that they could use EMA therapy with me. Then we focused on happy memories of times when I was not drunk or under the influence of drugs. We did this EMA process repeatedly and intensively. This focus on happy times when I was sober helped me to realize that I could enjoy life without drugs, and that I didn’t need to commit suicide by overdosing on them. I never went back to taking dangerous uppers and downers. The EMA therapy probably saved my life. But you won’t find that type of life-affirming approach used in drug treatment centers or any other therapeutic institution. Instead they use Illuminati mind control techniques to attack the natural personality of the individual.

Speaking Out

If you have been the victim of trauma-based mind control and you have recovered from it, you may or may not want to speak out in public about what is going on. For myself, I finally realized that it was necessary to my spiritual wellbeing that I find my voice and speak out. In recent years, I have been involved with Thought Crime Radio, which was a radio program on KOPN – and it still has a website (ThoughtCrimeRadio. net). I was a co-host on that radio program for a while where I openly talked about the Illuminati and their mind-control methods. As the result of this, some people who are within the Illuminati, who have become disillusioned with the Illuminati, have contacted me in private and have been feeding me more insider information. Apparently Fabian Therapy for deprogramming Illuminati mind control still exists and is still being secretly used. But it is only being used for the benefit of a small number of people who are wealthy and connected with the Illuminati. So knowledge about this type of therapy is still being suppressed from public knowledge. I’ve told you here as much about this therapy approach as I feel safe in doing. If you are interested in healing the victims of Illuminati mind control, I hope you are successful.

Right now the Illuminati still seems to be all-powerful. However, I have reason to believe that someday the Illuminati will fall. Although at the present time, the highest-ranking members of the Illuminati all seem unified in their purpose and actions, it is known to many insiders that this cannot last. Right now the Illuminati are continually increasing their wealth and power by systematically looting the middle class. But eventually they will have to turn against each other. This is more than just a hopeful theory, it is a mathematical certainty that the Illuminati will disassemble at some point. This is why the attitude of some Committee members is changing. Every day more and more people outside the Illuminati are becoming aware of it and the harm it does. An opposition movement to deconstruct the Illuminati is growing and it will eventually succeed. However, for most people in America, things will get worse before they get better. During the chaotic times that come, there may be opportunities to help some of the victims of Illuminati mind control.

Perhaps the ideas presented here will be helpful in doing that. I know that there are other people who are aware of Illuminati mind control and are trying to come up with psychological techniques for helping its victims. Someday a standardized approach for dealing with trauma-based mind control victims needs to be developed because of the widespread epidemic that has been going on in our country and the world.

Fabian Therapy for Helping Abductees

I do know that the Fabian therapists did work with some victims who had been abducted by hostile extraterrestrials and that they were known to have gotten positive results. But my Fabian therapists had only just begun to do this type of work when they were killed. However, there can be no doubt that some abductees suffer greatly from the abuse they've received at the hands of their alien abductors.

The most famous abduction is the case of Betty and Barney Hill. After their abduction experience they were aware of missing time, but they were not aware of what happened. They visited a psychiatrist who put them under hypnosis. They recounted almost identical stories, even though they were hypnotized separately. The psychiatrist had them relive the experience over and over again in therapy. Now this did a great deal to publicize the abduction phenomena, but there is nothing to indicate that it helped Betty and Barney Hill to heal emotionally from the experience. In fact, the approach used by the psychiatrist may have made things worse for the Hills. This is because he was forcing them to relive their trauma, but he was doing nothing to heal their memory system. He simply repeated bypassed their damaged memory system by using hypnosis. This is not the optimum approach. And yet this hypnotherapy approach that has the victims re-experience their abductions is being widely popularized and used around the world.

The Fabian approach to deal with this was to avoid making the client directly re-experience the trauma. They would use EMA as described above to analyze only memories of happy experiences which took place during times of sobriety and health. They would teach the clients various methods to process the negative emotions that would come from having been a victim. These would be things like journaling and the use of art to express the experiences. Eventually the client would restore his or her memory system. So hypnosis would not be used to recall the abduction experiences. But the persons would eventually recall the abduction experiences the same way that they can recall any other experience.

When I recall my childhood abuse, even memories that were once repressed, I recall it the same way that I would an ordinary memory from my childhood. I don’t need to go through some special mental process to recall the abuse because my memory system has been rehabilitated. And I never was subjected to hypnosis to recall repressed memories.

This is how it would be for an abductee who used Fabian Therapy to heal his or her memory system. Hypnosis has the potential to create confabulation in the mind of the client. Confabulation is the commingling of memory and imagination. But Fabian Therapy doesn’t require hypnosis. Fabian Therapy is designed to eliminate confabulation. EMA of happy memories doesn’t re-traumatize the person and is designed to eliminate imagination. The structure of the EMA process discourages imagination by encouraging the direct re-experiencing of the memory. Any traumatic experience such as an alien abduction damages the mind’s memory recall mechanism. If you try to recall an overwhelmingly painful memory with EMA you will become traumatized again, and this will keep you from healing the memory recall mechanism. But if you use EMA to focus on only happy memories, this will heal the natural mechanism of memory recall. The journaling and other techniques reduce the negative charge contained in the traumatizing abduction memories. Eventually the abductee will be able to recall the abduction memories as he or she would recall any other memory.

I have personally come to believe that Satanic Ritual Abuse, MK Ultra and Monarch mind control are all really forms of alien mind control. Hostile extraterrestrials manipulate the members of these Luciferian secret societies. The Satanists, psychiatrists and CIA operatives who victimize human beings with mind control are themselves being manipulated by hostile extraterrestrials. The alien overlords of this planet have created a culture in which some humans are exploiting their fellow human beings. The extraterrestrial abduction experience is the direct abuse of a human being with trauma-based mind control. They deliberately terrorize the abductees and inflict unnecessary pain because this suppresses memory recall. But the hostile extraterrestrials also are the originators of MK Ultra and other forms of mind control administered by humans. So the ultimate source for this entire culture of mind control is extraterrestrial.

When I was on the radio as a co-host of Thought Crime Radio, I did a number of shows on the subject of UFOs. These shows received the strongest response of any of the shows that we did. We usually had so many people calling in and making comments that we didn’t have time to deal with all the people who wanted to respond. Although we had a strong and positive response to such shows, a number of people working at the radio station objected to them. And this played a part in my being driven off the air.

I’ve done quite a bit of research on the UFO phenomena, and there can be no doubt that UFOs exist. Anybody who is honest and does the research knows that they exist. There are simply too many credible eye witnesses who have come forward having observed such craft. Some might argue that these craft don’t come from an extraterrestrial source, but are merely classified, experimental craft built by our government. And some undoubtably are built by the government. But if you do enough research I believe that it becomes clear that some of these craft are not of human design.

And the same thing could be said for the mind-control techniques. It may be human beings who administer Monarch mind control, but it is an alien technology in the same way that UFOs represent an alien technology.

We are being invaded by hostile extraterrestrials. We can’t fight back against them with the Sci-Fi weapons like phaser beams or death rays. We can only fight back against them by freeing our minds and helping others to attain mental liberation.

Matthew’s Song

Mattheo (Matthew) was the primary father I loved when I was growing up, and during this time I both loved him more than anyone in the world, and hated him for his abuse of me. Complex emotions, indeed, which I dealt with by dissociating them into different parts before healing.

When I was in my late 20’s, Mattheo became the occultic Superior General (SG) of the Jesuit Order – their black pope. On the occultic side, this is different than the individual who is publicly known as the “black pope” since the Jesuits never let it be publicly known who their real generals and black pope are. The occultic SG is the one with the real authority in the Order, though.

After becoming SG, he wrote a poem about the passing of his mentor (the previous SG) and his feelings upon taking up this role and responsibility. I knew about the poem, because he had shared it with me privately at one point. But when he died 17 years ago, his poem was found and the decision to set it to music was made.

Because Mattheo played the cello, and loved it most, the original music was created for cello lead, with violin, drums and harp. It was slow and sad, and beautiful, and the song was played at his funeral in his honor.

The decision was also made to release the song publicly as well, in honor of his passing. The song was given to a band, which created a much more upbeat and snappy tempo. The song was released (about a couple years after) as what was publicly known as “Viva la Vida” (it had a different name originally).

I have decided to share the meaning behind the words in this post, that the Jesuits understood, in the lyrics below.

I used to rule the world – the Jesuits believe that the SG really does “rule the world” since they influence

Now in the morning I sleep alone-Being the SG, and losing his mentor, meant Mattheo felt alone sweep the streets I used to own.-One of Mattheo's favorite stories was of the king who traded places with a street sweeper; it also shows that he could play any role

I used to roll the dice, feel the fear in my enemies' eyes-he had killed many in his lifetime, and made the decision who would be killed or not in numerous situations while he was a leader in the order

Listen as the crowd would sing "Now the old king is dead, long live the king." –his mentor had just died, and now Mattheo was SG. In the occultic Jesuit Order, the previous SG is normally killed psychically – a theta kill – with the incoming SG leading several of his generals in doing so. I was present when this occurred.

One minute I held the key, next the walls are closed on me. –he held the key to victory, as he "won" over his mentor, but feels now trapped by having to be in the very heavy and difficult role.

And I discovered that my castles stand upon pillars of salt and pillars of sand. –he is realizing that everything he fought for and worked towards is transient and will one day cease to exist.

I hear Jerusalem bells a-ringing – the Jesuit Order refers to the Vatican and Rome as "Jerusalem" sometimes in their private speech and programming; this refers to the bells heard ringing in Rome and the Vatican churches when the previous SG dies.

Roman Catholic choirs are singing, – choirs sing within the Vatican to proclaim the death of the previous SG and honor the incoming one.

Be my mirror, my sword, my shield, –this is part of the oath that the Order makes to their new SG. This oath is also first made when a Jesuit child becomes a father at the coming of age ceremony at 13. When a Jesuit father becomes a general or a councilor, this oath is also repeated. During the oath-taking ceremony, the oath-giver will receive a small mirror on a necklace from their primary mentor who states that every man needs a mirror (someone to reflect to them regarding their behavior and how they treat others and themselves, who is honest; this 'mirror' is often the primary programmer; Mattheo gave me my mirror when I became a father, then again when I became a general, and promised to be my 'mirror'). The sword represents the oath to give one's sword to defend Rome and the Order; the shield is the willingness to defend the SG with one's life.

Be my missionaries in a foreign field, –the entire Order makes this oath when they become a father (at age 13), to the current SG; this vow is renewed to the new SG

For some reason I can't explain, Once you're gone there was never, never an honest word. –Mattheo felt that once his mentor had died and he achieved the status of SG, that he would never hear a truly honest word from others; his mentor was the last person to ever be truly honest with him.

And that was when I ruled the world. –because now he is SG.

Listen as the sound of drums, –played when the old SG passes and the new replaces him.

people couldn't believe what I'd become.-I believe in the original poem, the line was "I couldn't believe what I had become" – he could not believe that he had killed his beloved mentor.

Revolutionaries wait for my head on a silver plate, – knowing that one day, someone from the next generation of Jesuit fathers would do the same to him.

just a puppet on a lonely string. –a reference to his own programming and realization of how lonely and trapped he is.

Ah, who would ever wanna be king? –this role is difficult, dangerous and entails a lot of responsibility, as well as the loss of a beloved mentor

I hear Jerusalem bells a-ringing, Roman Catholic choirs are singing,

Be my mirror, my sword, my shield, my missionaries in a foreign field,

For some reason I can't explain, I know Saint Peter won't call my name. –a reference to his deep internal knowledge that he has done things that are against God; his belief that he cannot be saved especially after just killing his mentor.

Never an honest word, but that was when I ruled the world.

It was a wicked and wild wind, –an acknowledgement of the theta spirits that enabled him and two others to 'take out' the previous SG that blew down the doors to let me in. –spiritual forces that took out the old SG and let him into the role of SG

I loved Mattheo and cried when he died. This poem expresses how difficult taking on this role was for him, and how lonely he felt once he took it up. But it also expresses some of the terrible realities that those in the Order deal with, and the incredible feeling of being trapped that occurs, even in the highest ranks.

My prayer is that many of those trapped will choose to become free.

Oh my goodness. This song has haunted me since I was forced to play it in church many years ago. I always felt that the lyrics were occultic, but I couldn't make heads or tails of it. I am so appreciative that you shared this!! It satisfies a question I've held for years about what it means, exactly. !!!! So grateful, thank you !!!

I am completely mind blown. This was a tremendously popular song and still remains critically acclaimed. It went to number 1 in both the US and UK, and was awarded Song of the Year by the Grammy's for Outstanding Song Writing. According to Wikipedia the song was written by the band. It really just goes to show how the Jesuits have such a sway over global culture, the music industry, certainly and the mainstream. It's why the Bible instructs us to not be conformed by the things of this world but constantly renew our minds.

Eye opening as usual Svali, may God continue to bless and protect you . You are a powerful weapon He has used to expose the works of evil in these end times.

Coldplay did not have to pay anything; the song was given to them, since the decision was made that its worldwide popularity would be in memory of Mattheo.

INTRODUCTION
by W.A. Harbinson
author of GENESIS

While Genesis is very much a work of fiction, it has been based on certain facts which this author feels are worth bringing to light.

In the course of researching a different novel altogether, I obtained, through the Imperial War Museum in London, two short but intriguing articles which immediately captured my interest. The first one was a routine war report by Marshall Yarrow, then the Reuters special correspondent to Supreme H.Q. in liberated Paris. This article had been published, among other places, in the South Wales Argus on December 13, 1944, and it stated: "The Germans have produced a 'secret' weapon in keeping with the Christmas season. The new device, which is apparently an air defense weapon, resembles the glass balls which adorn Christmas trees. They have been seen hanging in the air over German territory, sometimes singly, sometimes in clusters. They are colored silver and are apparently transparent." The second article, an Associated Press release extracted from the New York Herald Tribune of January 2, 1945, illuminated the subject even more. It said: "Now, it seems, the Nazis have thrown something new into the night skies over Germany. It is the weird, mysterious 'Foo Fighter' balls which race alongside the wings of Beaufighters flying intruder missions over Germany. Pilots have been encountering this eerie weapon for more than a month in their night flights. No one apparently knows what this sky weapon is. The balls of fire appear suddenly and accompany the planes for miles. They seem to be radio-controlled from the ground, so official intelligence reports reveal . . .” Apparently those ‘unknown’ objects made their final appearance in May 1945, when the end of the war was in sight

Intrigued by these reports, I conducted some more research and discovered a highly technical but little-known book called Intercettateli Senza Sparare (see “Sources” for details), by Renato Vesco, in which the author claims that the “Foo Fighter” actually existed, that it was originally called the Feuerball, and that it was first constructed at the aeronautical establishment at Wiener Neustadt, with the help of the Flugfunk Forschungsanstalt of Oberpfaffenhoffen (FFO). According to Vesco, the Feuerball was a flat, circular flying machine, powered by a special turbojet engine, which was used by the Germans during the closing stages of the war both as an anti-radar device and as a “psychological” weapon against Allied pilots. Says Vesco: “The fiery halo around its perimeter—caused by a very rich fuel mixture—and the chemical additives that interrupted the flow of electricity by over-ionizing the atmosphere in the vicinity of the plane, generally around the wing tips or tail surfaces, subjected the H2S radar on the plane to the action of powerful electrostatic fields and electromagnetic impulses.” Vesco also claims that the basic principles of the Feuerball were later applied to a much larger “symmetrical circular aircraft,” the Kugelblitz (or Ball Lightning Fighter), which was the first example of the vertical-rising “jet lift” aircraft

Further intrigued, I continued my research in West Germany and came up with a surprising number of newspaper and magazine clippings—all from the 1950s—about one Flugkapitan Rudolph Schriever. One clipping stated that this former Luftwaffe aeronautical engineer had designed, in the spring of 1941, the prototype for a “flying top,” and that the device was tested in June 1942; another stated that the same Flugkapitan Schriever, with “three trusted colleagues," had actually constructed, in August 1943, a "large specimen" of his original "flying disc," but that in the summer of 1944, in the East Hall of the BMW plant near Prague, he had redesigned the original model, replacing its former gas turbine engines with some highly advanced form of jet propulsion; and a third, which reiterated the above information, added the interesting news that original plans for the flying disc had been drawn up by the "German experts," Habermohl and Miethe, and an Italian physicist, Dr. Bellonzo. According to other reports (and, subsequently, to Major Rudolph Lusar's indispensible book, German Secret Weapons of World War II, English language edition, published by Neville Spearman, London, 1959, and the Philosophical Library, New York, 1959), Habermohl and Schriever had designed a large ring plate with "adjustable wing-discs," which rotated around a "fixed, cupola-shaped cockpit," while Miethe had developed a "discus-shaped plate in which adjustable jets were inserted." Reportedly the flying saucer had a diameter of 42 meters (137.76 feet), a height from base to canopy of 32 meters (104.96 feet), and had reached an altitude of approximately 40,000 ft, with a horizontal flight speed of 2,000 kilometers per hour (1,250 mph).

So far, so good . . . But what I now came to was a series of small and puzzling contradictions.

Shortly after the war, Flugkapitan Schriever was living at Hokerstrauss 28 in Bremerhaven-Lehe from where he announced that the flying disc had indeed been constructed, that it had been ready for testing in April 1945, but that with the advance of the Allies into Germany, the test had been cancelled, the machine entirely destroyed, and his papers either mislaid or stolen. Schriever's story was, however, contradicted by alleged eyewitness Georg Klein, who later stated that he had actually seen the test flight of the Schriever disc, or one similar, on February 14, 1945. A certain doubt may be cast on Klein's date since, according to the War Diary of the 8th Air Fleet, February 14, 1945 was a day of low clouds, rain, snow and generally poor visibility—hardly the conditions for the testing of a revolutionary new kind of aircraft. Nevertheless, according to author Renato Vesco, in his thoroughly documented book, Intercept UFO, the test flight of a machine called the Kugelblitz—which was rumored to be a revolutionary kind of supersonic aircraft—was successfully conducted over the underground complex of Kahla, in Thuringia, some time during that February of 1945.

By 1975 Luftfahrt International was stating that a certain World War II Flugkapitan Rudolph Schriever had died in the late 1950s, and that found among his papers were the. incomplete notes for a large flying saucer (most of them technically out of date), a series of rough sketches of the machine (some of which had obviously been redrawn and updated just before his death), and several newspaper clippings about himself and his supposed flying saucer. Now, while none of the designs would have led to a workable flying saucer, Luftfahrt International did include reproductions of the designs of both Schriever and Dr. Miethe and also pointed out that Schriever, right up to his death, had been convinced that the UFO sightings since the end of the war were proof that his original ideas had been taken further with successful results.

Could this be true?

Let us examine the possibilities. According to Schriever, what appears to have been the final version of his flying saucer was constructed at the BMW plant near Prague in the early months of 1944 and was ready for testing in April 1945. According to Georg Klein, a similar flying disc was actually flown near Prague in February 1945, and according to the Italian author Renato Vesco—who seems unaware of the existence of the Schriever legend—an extraordinary new flying machine called the Kugelblitz was tested sometime that same month over the complex of Kahla, in the mountain region of Thuringia.

Tying in with this information is the fact that the gas turbine section of BMW was originally located in the suburb of Spandau, near Berlin—where, according to Renato Vesco, a lot of research on the Kugelblitz was undertaken—that it was later moved to the underground plant of Wittringen, near Saarbrucken, but that it finally ended up, as from 1944, in seven enormous underground complexes in both Thuringia and Nordhausen in the Harz Mountains.

That whole area, running in a metaphorical arc from the Harz Mountains, down through Thuringia, Bohmen and Mahren, was to form the Germans' last redoubt, and as such was littered with a staggering number of underground military and scientific complexes, including the enormous and invaluable Mittle-Werke factories and the personnel and equipment from the experimental center at Peenemünde. Certainly, while history was to decree otherwise, it was from there that Hitler intended to defend the remnants of the Third Reich with "a whole underground army" and the "secret weapons" he had been promised for so long.

In May 1978, at Stand 111 in a scientific exhibition in the Hannover Messe Hall, some gentlemen were giving away what at first sight appeared to be an orthodox technological tabloid paper called Brisant. This paper contained two seemingly unrelated articles: one an article on the scientific future of the Antarctic, the other an article about Germany's World War II flying saucers. The flying saucer article reiterated the information mentioned above, but added that the research centers for Projekt Saucer had been located in the areas of Bohmen and Mahren.

Regarding this, it should be pointed out that Prague is in Bohmen, and that Bohmen is more or less surrounded by the metaphorical arc of the Harz Mountains, Thuringia and Mahren—all of which areas contained vast underground research complexes, none of which were more than a few hundred kilometers from Prague.

The article also included a detailed drawing of a typical World War II flying disc, did not mention the designer's name, and claimed that the drawing had been altered by the West German government to render it "safe" for publication. Adding weight to his argument, the unknown author then pointed out that during the Second World War all such inventions, whether civilian or military, would have been submitted to the nearest patent office where, under paragraph 30a and 99 of the Patent-und Strafgesetsbuch, they would have been automatically stamped “Secret,” taken away from their rightful owners, and passed on to Himmler’s research establishments . . . and, according to the article, at the end of the war some of those patents disappeared into secret Russian files, others into equally secret British and American files, and the remainder disappeared with various “missing” German scientists and S.S. men. (Since neither the British, the Americans nor the Russians are ever likely to reveal what, precisely, was discovered in the secret factories of Nazi Germany, it is worth noting that in 1945 Sir Roy Feddon, as leader of a technical mission to Germany for the Ministry for Aircraft Production, reported: “I have seen enough of their designs and production plans to realize that if they had managed to prolong the war some months longer, we would have been confronted with a set of entirely new and deadly developments in air warfare.” And by 1956 Captain Edward J. Ruppelt, then head of the U.S. Air Force’s Project Blue Book, was able to write: “When World War II ended, the Germans had several radical types of aircraft and guided missiles under development. The majority of these were in the most preliminary stages, but they were the only known craft that could even approach the performances of the objects reported by UFO observers.”)

The same article went on to point out that in 1938, Hitler, anxious for a foothold in the Antarctic, sent an expedition commanded by Captain Alfred Richter to the coast due south of South Africa. Daily for three weeks two seaplanes were catapulted from the deck of the German aircraft carrier, Schwabenland, with orders to fly back and forth across the territory which Norwegian explorers had named Queen Maud Land. The Germans made a far more thorough study of the area than the Norwegians had done, finding vast regions which were surprisingly free of ice. Their planes covered 230,000 square miles in all, photographing almost half of the area. They also dropped several thousand metal poles, each marked with the swastika and pointed at the heavy tip so that they would dig into the ice and remain upright. This job done, they renamed the whole area Neuschwabenland and claimed it as part of the Third Reich.

According to Brisant, German ships and U-boats continued to prowl the South Atlantic Ocean, particularly between South Africa and the Antarctic, throughout the whole of the Second World War. Then, in March 1945, just before the end of the war, two German provision U-boats, U-530 and U-977, were launched from a port on the Baltic Sea. Reportedly they took with them members of the flying saucer research teams, the last of the most vital flying saucer components, the notes and drawings for the saucer, and the designs for gigantic underground complexes and living accommodations based on the remarkable underground factories of Nordhausen in the Harz Mountains. The two U-boats duly reached Neuschwabenland, more correctly known as Queen Maud Land, where they unloaded. Finally, two months after the war, the same U-boats surfaced mysteriously off the coast of Argentina where the crews were handed over to the American authorities, who interrogated them at length and then flew them all back to the United States.

About a year after this, the United States launched the biggest operation ever known regarding the Antarctic. While the stated purpose of the operation was to "circumnavigate the 16,000-mile Antarctic coastline and map it thoroughly," Brisant felt it odd that Operation Highjump, under the command of Antarctic veteran Admiral Richard Evelyn Byrd, included thirteen ships, two seaplane tenders, an aircraft carrier, six two-engine R4D transports, six Martin PBM flying boats, six helicopters and a staggering total of 4,000 men. It was also considered odd that when this virtual assault force reached the Antarctic coast, they not only docked, on January 27, 1947, near the German-claimed territory of Neuschwabenland, but then divided up into three separate task forces.

That expedition became something of a mystery. Subsequent official reports stated that it had been an enormous success, revealing more about the Antarctic than had ever been known before. However, other, mainly foreign reports suggested that such in fact had not been the case: that many of Byrd's men were lost during the first day, that at least four of his airplanes inexplicably disappeared, and that while the expedition had gone provisioned for six to eight months, the men actually returned to America in February 1947, after only a few weeks. According to Bristant, Admiral Byrd later told a reporter (I could find no verification on this) that it was "necessary for the USA to take defensive actions against enemy air fighters which come from the polar regions" and that in the case of a new war the USA would be "attacked by fighters that are able to fly from one pole to the other with incredible speed." Also, according to Brisant, shortly after his return from the Antarctic, Admiral Byrd was ordered to undergo a secret cross-examination—and the United States withdrew from the Antarctic for almost a decade.

What was being suggested, then, is that throughout the course of the Second World War the Germans were sending ships and planes to the Antarctic with equipment for massive underground complexes, that at the end of the war the flying saucer project's team of scientists were taken from Germany by submarines U-530 and U-977, that the Americans interrogated the crews of those submarines when they docked in what they had thought was a friendly Argentina, that the Americans then, upon hearing of the Antarctic base, organized a military task force disguised as an exploratory expedition, that that expedition was subsequently put to disarray when it came up against the extraordinary German saucers, and that the United States then pulled out of the Antarctic temporarily, in order to build their own saucers based on the designs found in Germany after the war.

The second article was also of modest interest. It was in point of fact a rather crude propaganda statement masquerading as a scientific review of Antarctic potential. Dusting off the already well-known topographical facts, what one was left with was an insistence that the Democratic Republic of Germany should claim back their rights to that part of the Antarctic which the Nazis stole from the Norwegians and arrogantly renamed Neuschwabenland.

Taking note of the National Socialist leanings of the article, bearing in mind the fact that Brisant was a one-shot publication whose origins were untraceable, and reminding myself that the whole theory had suspicious parallels with the more farfetched “Holes in the Poles” UFO myths, I nevertheless checked up on other aspects of the article and discovered that the Germans had, in fact, been patrolling the Antarctic regions of the South Atlantic Ocean throughout the war. Indeed, two years after the Richter expedition, a couple of large Norwegian whaling ships were seized by boarding parties from the German raider Pinguin as they rested at anchor in their own territorial waters just off Queen Maud Land. Within hours of that incident, a Norwegian supply ship and most of the nearby whaling convoy had been lured into the German trap—and the war in the Antarctic was underway. In May 1941, HMS Cornwall located and sank the Pinguin, but not before Pinguin had captured a whole string of Allied merchant ships totaling more than 135,000 tons. What is also historical fact is that Pinguin’s sister ships, appropriately named Komet and Atlantis, continued to prowl the Antarctic shores until the end of the war.

Regarding the two submarines, I also came across some startling information. U-977, under the command of Captain Heinz Schaeffer, did in fact leave Kiel Harbor in the Baltic Sea in April 1945, stopped in at Christiansund South on April 26th, left Christiansund South the following day, and was not seen again until it surfaced at Mar del Plata, Argentina, on August 17, 1945—a period of nearly four months.

Where was the submarine all that time? According to Captain Heinz Schaeffer, they had left with the intention of patrolling the South Atlantic, had docked for fuel at Christiansund South the following day, and had then, several days later, heard over their radio the news that the war was over. Convinced that he would not be treated too kindly by the Allied Command, Schaeffer gave his crew the option of being put off along the coast of Norway or traveling on with him to what he thought was a friendly Argentina. Since some of the crew preferred to return to Germany, the next few days were spent in hugging the Norwegian coastline until, on May 10, they dropped some of their men off on the mountain coast not far from Bergen. This done, according to Schaeffer, he and the remaining crew embarked upon what surely must have been one of the most remarkable feats of the war: a total of sixty-six days under water—through the North Sea and the English Channel, past Gibraltar and along the coast of Africa, and finally surfacing, all of sixty-six days later, in the middle of the South Atlantic Ocean. During the next month they alternated between floating on the surface and diving back to the depths, once even surfacing off the Cape Verde Islands and going ashore on Branca Island, another time going so far as to "disguise" the submarine when it was on the surface by rigging up false sails and funnel to make it look like a cargo steamer, Finally, when close to Rio de Janeiro, they heard over their radio that another fleeing German submarine, U-530, had put into the River Plate and that its crew had been handed over to the United States as prisoners of war. Disturbed by this, they nevertheless put into Mar del Plata on August 17, 1945—nearly four months after they had put out from Kiel Harbor.

This rather fantastic story was recounted by Captain Schaeffer to the Argentine authorities when they interrogated him on three specific issues: (1) Where had U-977 been when the Brazilian steamer Babia had been sunk? (2) How come U-977 had arrived in Argentina so long after the war had finished? and (3) Had U-977 carried anyone "of political importance" during its voyage to the Argentine? Schaeffer denied that he had been anywhere in the area of the Babia when it was sunk, explained his late arrival in Argentina with the fantastic story I have just recounted, and stated that no one of "political importance" had ever been aboard U-977.

Now what is really intriguing about all this is that a few weeks later an Anglo-American commission, composed of high-ranking officers especially flown to the Argentine to investigate "the mysterious case" of U-977, spent a great deal of time interrogating Schaeffer regarding the possibility that he might actually have taken Hitler and Martin Bormann aboard his U-boat, first to Patagonia and then to a secret Nazi base in the Antarctic. Indeed, they were so insistent on this that they subsequently flew Schaeffer and his crew—and Otto Wehrmut, commander of U-530—back to a prisoner of war camp near Washington where for months they continued their interrogations. While I could find no record of the fate of Commander Wehrmut, what I did authenticate is that Schaeffer repeatedly denied having shipped anyone anywhere . . . Nevertheless, he was handed over to the British in Antwerp and again interrogated for many months.

Assuming that Schaeffer was telling the truth and that the Allies found nothing unusual in Schaeffer's U-boat, it seems rather strange that the Americans would later send the submarine back to the United States where, under direct orders from the U.S. War Department, it was blown to pieces with torpedoes. As for Schaeffer, he was eventually returned to Germany, did not feel comfortable as one of the conquered, and then went back to join some fellow Germans in the Argentine.

The possibility remains that Schaeffer might have been lying. For a start, it is decidedly odd that two insignificant German U-boats should have stirred such monumental interest among the Allies. It is also worth considering why the Allies would even have imagined that Hitler and Martin Bormann—or anyone else for that matter—would have fled to such an unlikely place as the Antarctic. Finally, it is worth noting that Schaeffer had spent much of his career protecting the research centers at Regen and Peenemünde, that he was highly experienced at patrolling the South Atlantic and the polar regions, and that he was one of a select group of Naval officers who were sent to the Harz Mountains to study the highly advanced XXI submarines. Schaeffer was, in other words, a man familiar with the "secret" underground establishments of the Harz Mountains, and a man familiar with the Antarctic sea routes.

Now let us review the situation. It is not confirmed, but it is very possible that the German Feuerball existed, that it accounted for the first modern UFO sightings during the Second World War, and that an extraordinary flying machine, the Kugelblitz, was successfully test-flown in Germany a few weeks before the war ended. The Feuerball, therefore, could have been the forerunner of the small, seemingly remote-controlled UFOs observed frequently throughout the final months of the war, while the Kugelblitz could have been the first of the larger, pilot-controlled flying saucers.

The unsigned flying saucer designs reproduced in Brisant (and in a great many more orthodox journals) mentioned materials not in existence, as far as we know, during the war years. This suggests that they could have been reproductions of the original plans which Flugkapitan Rudolph Schriever updated just before his death in the late 1950s. Assuming, then, that Schriever's "mislaid" or "stolen" notes and designs were actually in the hands of the S.S., it is possible that they were secretly developed in one of the many underground completes in the area of the aborted last redoubt—either the Nordhausen complex in the Harz Mountains or at Kahla in nearby Thuringia—that the completed saucer was test-flown in the early months of 1945, and that it was then destroyed in the face of the Allied advance.

We know from reproductions of the drawings of Schriever, Bellonzo and Miethe that a flying saucer project, no matter how primitive at the time, was definitely on the list of German military priorities. Regarding the fact that the only evidence of such machines is the evidence mentioned above, it should be borne in mind that the most fanatical of the Nazi S.S. were controlling the research centers in the areas mentioned, that as they retreated they attempted to destroy as much as possible of their most important scientific papers and inventions, and that thousands of slave workers and their S.S. overlords—who could have revealed a great deal more—disappeared in the chaos of the liberation and were not seen again.

Could some of them have gone to the Antarctic?

Contrary to the accepted view, it is actually quite possible that the Nazis continually shipped and flew vital men, material and documents to the Antarctic throughout the war years.

Regarding the possibility of the submarines of that time being able to complete such a lengthy journey, it is to be noted that the normal U-boat could cover 7,000 miles on each operational cruise, that the Germans had submarine tankers spread across the South Atlantic Ocean at least as far as south of South Africa, and that any one of those tankers, which had a displacement of 2,000 tons, could have supplied ten U-boats with fuel and stores, thus tripling the time that those U-boats could stay at sea.

Regarding the possibility of the Germans building self-sufficient underground research factories in the Antarctic, it has only to be pointed out that the underground research centers of Nazi Germany were gigantic feats of construction, containing wind tunnels, machine shops, assembly plants, launching pads, supply dumps and accommodation for all who worked there, including adjoining camps for the slaves—and yet very few people knew that they existed.

Given all this, it is in my estimation quite possible that men and materials were shipped to the Antarctic throughout the war, that throughout those same years the Germans were engaged in building enormous underground complexes in Neuschwabenland similar to those scattered around the last redoubt, and that the American, Russian and British "cover-up" regarding saucer sightings could be due to the reasons given in this novel.

Skeptics would argue that the major histories of the Third Reich either ignore or pass off as "ridiculous" any stories about German "secret" weapons, but such an argument can be countered by reminding the reader that most of the secret weapon projects were highly secret, usually controlled by the dreaded S.S., and were therefore beyond the reach of later historians. While Albert Speer, as Minister of Armaments and War Production, was openly skeptical about the "secret weapons" in his otherwise eloquent book Inside the Third Reich (Weidenfeld & Nicholson, London, 1970), he does admit that there was increasing speculation about such weapons during the closing months of the war—and that while he himself had stated at the time that there were not enough basic materials for the production of such, he had, in his own words, "underestimated . . . the large stocks of material that had been accumulated in the factories." Speer was equally skeptical when Robert Ley, the Minister for Labor excitedly told him, in April 1945, that his German scientists had invented a "death ray" (possibly a laser weapon); this is interesting when one considers the fact that Heinz Schaeffer, captain of the submarine U-977, stated in his book U-boat 977 (William Kimber, London, 1952) that in April 1945 an S.S. associate had offered him a demonstration of a so-called "death ray." It is unfortunate that Schaeffer, in a hurry to return to Kiel for his famous last voyage, had no time to remain in Berlin and check out the validity of his friend's claim.

For the purposes of fiction I have utilized the real-life personages, S.S. generals Hans Kammler and Artur Nebe. Readers might therefore be interested to know that while Nebe was placed on the Nazi "death list" after the attempted assassination of Hitler, his death was never actually confirmed and many felt that he had simply fled for his life. As for General Hans Kammler, his history with the S.S. and the V-l and V-2 rockets is well documented, but what became of him after he disappeared from Germany in April 1945 remains a mystery to this day. Regarding the members of the German flying saucer team, Schriever and Bellonzo are now dead, Habermohl was reported to have been captured by the Russians (thus the American military's fear of Russian saucers shortly after the war), and—perhaps most interesting—Miethe, who stated to the press that he had worked on Projekt Saucer, went to work for the Americans and Canadians. Finally, for the record, the prototype for the AVRO flying saucer, which was handed over to the U.S. and loudly proclaimed to have been a failure, is now in the U.S. Air Force Museum in Fort Eustis, Virginia.

While Genesis is a work of fiction, the fiction is based on various facts—and those facts could do with further examination. A list of sources is given overleaf.

Information about Flugkapitan Rudolph Schriever and his fellow officers on Projekt Saucer came mainly from the following articles: “Untertassen—Flieger Kombination,” Der Spiegel, March 30, 1950. “Fliegende Untertasse in Deutschland erfunden,” Sonderbericht der Deutsche Illustrierte, S.1350, 1951. “Fliegende Untertassen—eine Deutsche Erfindung,” Criticus, No. 26, June 27, 1952. “Die Deutsche Fliegende Untertasse,” Das Ufer—die Farb-Illustrierte, No. 18, September 1, 1952. “Flugscheibe flog 1945 in Prag,” interview with Georg Klein, Welt am Sonntag, April 25, 1953. “Wunderwaffen 45,” Bild am Sonntag, February 17, 1957. “Die UFOs—eine deutsche Erfindung,” Das neue Zeitalter, October 5, 1957. “Flugkreisel, irdisch,” Geun & Welt, No. 14, April 2, 1959. “Deutsche UFOs schon 1947/48 einwandfrei beobachtet,” Das neue Zeitalter, February 6, 1965. “Projekt Flugkreisel,” Bremerhavener Zeit (undated photocopy); and “Deutsche Flugkreisel,” Luftfahrt International, No. 9, May-June, 1975. Major Rudolph Lusar’s book, German Secret Weapons of World War II (see “Author’s Note”), which was an invaluable reference work regarding both completed and uncompleted secret German projects, also contains a detailed section on Projekt Saucer.

The other major source of information about Germany’s World War II aeronautical innovations, and also about the postwar history of British, American and Canadian utilization of those innovations, was Renato Vesco's Intercettateli Senza Sparare, first published in 1968 by E. Mursia & Co., Milan, Italy, later English-language edition published in 1971 by Grove Press under the misleading title of Intercept—But Don't Shoot, and then reissued in 1974 by Zebra Publications Inc., New York, under the even more misleading title of Intercept UFO. Unfortunately, while Vesco bases most of his technical information on very strong official sources, most notably the numerous reports of the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee (H.M.S.O., London, 1945–47), the reports of the American Alsos Commission in Alsos (Schuman, New York, 1947) by Samuel A. Goudsmit, and similar reports from other World War II scientific investigators, he offers no real substantiation for the existence of the Kugelblitz which is meant to be the pivotal subject of his argument However, Vesco's book remains indispensable on two counts: (1) It is the most detailed history yet published of the lesser known, but revolutionary German aeronautical innovations; and (2) while the author makes no mention of Schriever or his saucer project, he does state that a machine called the Kugelblitz—or the "Ball Lightning Automatic Fighter"—was first test-flown in early 1945 over the great underground complex at Kahla, in Thuringia, and suggests that both the Kugelblitz and the remaining Feuerballs were then destroyed by the retreating

S.S.—details which have remarkable parallels with the Schriever story.

Apart from the books mentioned above, the following books were of real value: Hitler's Last Weapons: The Underground War Against the V1 and V2 by Josef Garlinski (Julian Friedmann, 1978); V2 by Walter Dornberger (Hurst and Blackett, 1954); The Birth of the Missile: The Secrets of Peenemünde by E. Klee and O. Merk (Harrap, 1965); German Secret Weapons of the Second World War by R. Luser (Spearman, 1959); History of the German Guided Missile Development by T. Benecke and A. W. Quick (Brunswick: Verlag E. Applehans, 1957); German Guided Missiles by R. F. Pocock (Ian Allen, London, 1966); Raketon-Flugtechnik by E. Sänger (Edwards, Ann Arbor, Michigan, reprint of 1933 edition published by Oldenbourg of München); Soviet Rocketry by Michael Stoiko (David & Charles, 1971); The Papers of Robert H. Goddard, edited by E. C. Goddard (McGraw-Hill, New York, 1970); The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich by William L. Shirer (Secker & Warburg, 1960); Adolf Hitler by John Toland (Doubleday Company/Ballantine, New York, 1976 and 1977 respectively); Gestapo by Edward Crankshaw (Putnam & Company, 1960); Children of the S.S. by Clarissa Henry and Marc Hillel (Hutchinson & Co., London, 1976); Himmler als Ideologue (Göttingen, 1970); and The Occult Establishment by James Webb (Open Court Publishing Co., La Salle, Illinois), the only reliable book I have read so far on the Nazis and the Occult.

There are literally thousands of so-called "factual" books on UFOs, many of which are well worth avoiding. Since this author has obviously not read all of them, he must acknowledge his debt to the following: The UFO Experience; A Scientific Inquiry (Corgi) and The Hynek UFO Report (Sphere), both by Dr. J. Allen Hynek; The Report on Unidentified Flying Objects (Doubleday & Co., New York, 1956) by Edward J. Ruppelt; The UFO Controversy in America (The New American Library, 1976) by David Michael Jacobs; Project Blue Book (Ballantine) edited by Brad Steiger; The Interrupted Journey (Berkley Medallian Publishing) by John G. Fuller; The Crack in the Universe (Neville Spearman, London) by Jean-Claude Bourret; UFOs From Behind the Iron Curtain (Souvenir Press, London) by Ion Hobana and Julien Weverbergh; UFOs: A Scientific Debate (W. W. Norton & Co., New York), edited by Carl Sagan and Thornton Page; Worlds Beyond (And/Or Press, Berkeley, California), edited by the New Dimensions Foundation; and Ufology (Celestial Arts, California), a fascinating analysis of the possible physical properties of the UFOs by James M. McCampbell.

The famous monthly magazine Flying Saucer Review is mandatory reading for anyone interested in the subject, but should be perused with a very selective eye.

I am indebted to NASA's Exploring Space With A Camera and to their reproductions and analysis of the much abused ESSA 7 satellite photographs. I am also heavily indebted to Eliot Porter's Antarctica (Hutchinson, London, 1979), in which both text and photographs are magnificent.

Should some of my readers think that the physiological and psychological horrors presented in certain chapters of Genesis are solely the products of the author's feverish imagination, I must recommend the following factual books: As Man Becomes Machine (Sphere) by David Rorvik; Man Modified (Paladin) by David Fishlock; Manipulation (Fontana) by Erwin Lausch; The People Shapers (Futura) by Vance Packard; Supernature (Coronet) by Lyall Watson; The Immortalist (Panther and Abacus) by Alan Harrington; Inside the Black Room: Studies of Sensory Deprivation (Pelican) by Jack Vernon; Hypnotism: Fact and Fiction (Pelican) by F. L. Marcus; PSI; Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain (Abacus) by Sheila Ostrander and Lunn Schroeder; Future Science (Anchor Books, Doubleday, New York), edited by John White and Stanley Krippner; Future Facts (Heinemann) by Stephen Rosen, and Mysteries (Hodder & Stoughton) by Colin Wilson.

My thanks to the following libraries and universities for their kind assistance in gathering further research material: Cornell University, New York; the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; the University of London; the British Museum Library, London; the Imperial War Museum, London, the Landesbibliothek, Wurttembergische; the Universitatischebibliothek, Freiburg Im Breisgau; the Landesbibliothek, Stuttgart; and the Staatsund Universitatsbibliothek, Hamburg.

Personal thanks to Stephanie Trudeau (New York); Willi Mayer, Reinhold Stoll, and Rudiger and Hannelore Vogt of West Germany; Marc Williams of Lookout magazine, Spain; Martin Atcherley for his kind assistance regarding Paraguay and Argentina; James Webb, for his very authoritative response to my inquiries about the S.S. and the Occult; Richard and Iris Grollner, my literary agents; Nick Austin, for his generosity with certain books; and finally, Alan Barney, for so enthusiastically backing this whole project.

Bulls of Fire Stalk U. S. Fighters In Night Assaults Over Germany

By The Associated Press.

AMERICAN NIGHT FIGHTER BASE, France, Jan. 1—The Germans have thrown something new into the night skies over Germany—the weird, mysterious "foo-flghter," balls of fire that race alongside the wings of American Beaufighters flying intruder missions over the Reich.

American pilots have been encountering the eerie "foo-fighter" for more than a month in their night flights. No one apparently knows exactly what this sky weapon is.

The balls of fire appear suddenly and accompany the planes for miles. They appear to be radio-controlled from the ground and keep up with planes flying off t hour

Donald Meiers of Chicago said. "One is red balls of fire which appear off our wing tips and fly along with us; the second is a vertical row of three balls of fire which fly in front of us, and the third is a group of about fifteen lights which appear off in the distance—like a Christmas tree up in the air—and flicker on and off."

The pilots of this night-fighter squadron—In operation since September, 1943—find these fiery balls the weirdest thing that they have yet encountered. They are convinced that the "foo-fighter" is designed to be a psychological as well as a military weapon, although it is not the nature of the

The famous "foo-fighters" of the later years of World War II began to appear around Allied bombers flying missions over Germany during 1944. They were reported as small glowing spheres that paced the bombers while in flight and often made the engines stutter and missfire. Americans nicknamed them after a pun feu, the French word for fire, which appeared in the comic strip Smokey Stover in the popular expression of the time, "Where there's foo, there's fire." At the time it was widely believed that these balls were widely believed to be a German secret weapon: the Feuerball.

TESLA, AT 78, BARES NEW ‘DEATH-BEAM’

Invention Powerful Enough to Destroy 10,000 Planet 250 Miles Away. He Asserts.

DEFENSIVE WEAPON ONLY

Scientist, in Interview, Tells of Apparatus That He Says Will Kill Without Trace.

Nikola Tesla, father of modern methods of generation and distribution of electrical energy, who was 78 years old yesterday, announced a new invention, or inventions, which he said, he considered the most important of the 700 made by him so far.

He has perfected a method and apparatus, Dr. Tesla said yesterday in an interview at the Hotel New Yorker, which will send concentrated beams of particles through, the free air, of such tremendous energy that they will bring down a fleet of 10,000 enemy airplanes at a distance of 250 miles from a defending nation’s border and will cause armies of millions to drop dead in their tracks.

Rocket Flight to the Moon, a film also known as Spaceship Number 1 Starts (Weltraumshiff I Startet), is made in Bavaria by the Bavaria Film-Künst. Since the Germans cancel most of their science fiction films once the war begins, this film is only a short remnant, edited from scenes already filmed. It eventually forms a portion of the German-made documentary History of Rocket Development. At the end of the film, Spaceship 1 is shown leaving its hangar and taking off for a flight around the moon. The bullet-shaped, stubby-winged art-moderne rocket takes off along a horizontal track, leaving its wheeled undercarriage behind. The model spaceship constructed for the film was half a meter long. Spaceship #1 Starts was directed by Anton Kutter, with technical advice from engineer Fritz Beck.

PREFACE

"Intercept—but don't shoot!" Ever since the United States Air Force top brass issued this order in 1948, American pilots have been mockingly defied by the UFOs (Unidentified Flying Objects) that frequently invade the air space of the United States as though on peaceful missions of exploration. Why hasn't the Air Force authorized its pilots to shoot the mysterious invaders down? Fear of extraterrestrial reprisal? Diplomatic protests from the "unknown" power that possesses the biggest secret of our times? Technological awe dictated by ignorance? Or, finally, deliberate deceit dictated by circumstances?

These questions are conclusively answered in this book. We start from the affair involving the pilot Kenneth Arnold when —at the western end of the U.S.-Canadian border—on June 24, 1947, he happened to see a squadron of circular-shaped airships in the distance. They appeared to come straight out of the pages of the headiest science fiction.

It was his flight report, in fact, that started the long series of sightings that is still going on. According to one's convictions, these sightings are the greatest mystery of the twentieth century, a gigantic hoax, or the prelude to the second redemption of humanity through the efforts of our "Brothers from Space"—which is how the pilots of the presumptive extraterrestrial space ships are referred to, especially in the United States. In effect, two decades of well-kept secret and an incredibly extensive pseudoscientific literature—unceasingly fed by over four hundred private investigatory groups working throughout the world—have ended by implanting in the public mind the idea that the UFOs either simply do not exist or are the artifacts of the people of another planet that are observing us—artifacts that are capable of flying through space at speeds approaching that of light—if, indeed, not faster—of neutralizing the effects of gravity and the forces of inertia, of disappearing at will, and so on.

The less these investigators know about aeronautics and the less experience they have had of the convulsive events of the last two years of World War II, the more strongly they hold their opinions.

It is high time that the UFOs—or Flying Saucers, a name that fairly accurately describes these machines' characteristic aerodynamic structure, which resembles that of an inverted plate—take their place somewhere between current events and history. And it is high time, too, that ufology, the absurd branch of "science" that nourishes the myth of extraterrestrial flying saucers manned by demiangelic pilots, be unmasked.

On the other hand, if we except those investigations carried out by military commissions (whose forced and deliberately windy public statements almost certainly say the opposite of what they have actually discovered), today, thanks to the mystical obfuscations of ufologists, the only statements worth taking seriously are cautious and ambivalent ones. One such is, for example, the declaration that Rear Admiral Delmar Fahrney, former commander of the Naval Guided Missile Section and honorary president of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena, gave to the press. Fahrney declared in 1957 that according to "reliable information," it had now been proved that our atmosphere is periodically invaded by mechanical objects traveling at very high speeds, beyond anything that American or Soviet aircraft can at present attain. Reports of highly qualified observers state that the objects in question often travel in formation and execute maneuvers that seem to indicate that they are not under the complete control of some automatic system. Their actions, he said, force us to the conclusion that many of them are piloted. The objects appear to be unarguably the result of long research and exceptional technical know-how. Generally, working by exclusion, we cannot deny a priori that they have an extraterrestrial origin. This does not mean, however, that we must postulate one! Just as we cannot exclude a priori the possibility that some nation may have taken such a giant step with its own air technology as to move considerably ahead of technology of other countries. But this, he added, was highly improbable. That is a great deal to say—and also very little—after a good sixteen years of "reports," studies, investigations, and discussions.

Having said this, we are forced to one conclusion: just as the separate colored chips of some vast mosaic represent no more than shapeless fragments of various colored minerals, so the information brought together in the present volume—some of which appears in print for the first time—takes on meaning and value only if arranged according to a rigorously preestablished scheme that leads to one predetermined conclusion and only to that. Transposing or interpreting the material differently would mean distorting it or denying a whole complex of universal truths.

We will, then, eschew the inconclusive ravings of ufologists and come down to verifiable facts. For the moment we will confine ourselves to revealing how the idea of building airships of such unusual structure was born and to giving precise particulars about who is building them and to establishing the place where they take off on their flights, flights that concern the entire world.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Dear Secretary Forrestal:

As per our recent conversation on this matter, you are hereby authorized to proceed with all due speed and caution upon your undertaking. Hereafter this matter shall be referred to only as Operation Majestic Twelve.

It continues to be my feeling that any future considerations relative to the ultimate disposition of this matter should rest solely with the Office of the President following appropriate discussions with yourself, Dr. Bush and the Director of Central Intelligence.

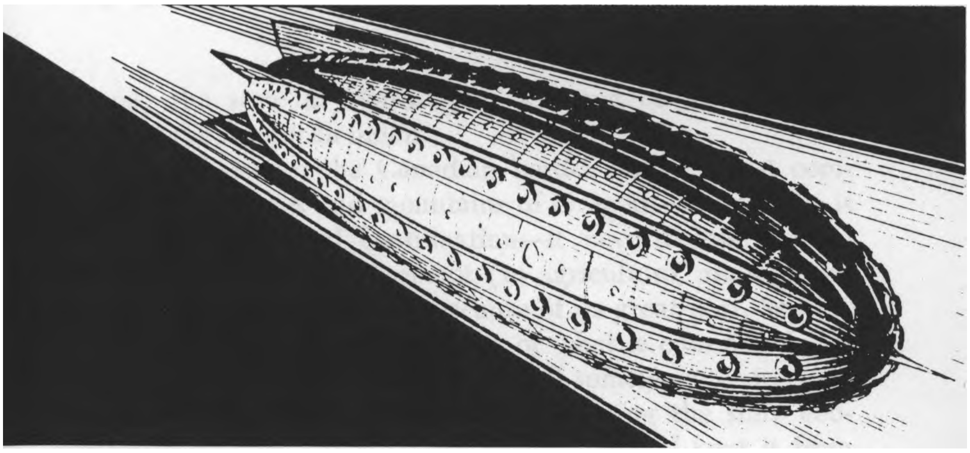
Man-Made UFOs 1944-1994

50 Years of Suppression



C. Schneeman, 1933

CHAPTER 1

June 24, 1947: "A Day to Remember"

In 1947 the state of Washington was one of the youngest "stars" in the American union.

Wedged between the Canadian border and the vast complex of the plateaus and mountains of Oregon—of which it is the natural geological continuation—it nevertheless boasted first-class economic development (in agriculture, mining, and aircraft construction) mainly because of its great port, Seattle.

The happy geographical position of what is considered one of the greatest Pacific ports and the self-sufficiency of its local industries had greatly contributed to isolating the state economically vis-à-vis neighboring Canada and had kept it from more active relations with British Columbia, equally mountainous but much less populated and gravitating in turn to the port of Vancouver. Its isolation was, then, purely the result of geographical circumstances, but it later made possible the sensational appearance of a “UFO incident” which was then shrouded in mystery (as, for that matter, the farsighted Anglo-Canadian promoters of the whole business intended).

Near the center of the Cascade Range—which cuts the state almost vertically into two unequal parts—rises the main bulk of Mount Rainier National Park, a complex of twenty-eight glaciers encircling the peak of Mount Rainier, well known to American visitors as the “great sacred mountain” of the Chinook Indians.

Cut by valleys that offer easy access and long since transformed into a great national park in order to preserve its characteristic local subalpine flora, this region receives crowds of visitors during the hot months and the winter season.

Toward the end of spring in 1947, the thaws having been slightly behind their usual seasonal schedule, there was no large group of excursionists to disturb the quiet awakening of the park.

In that picturesque natural scenery, despite the views of ufologists, it was not the appearance of alien beings or of secret forces but only chance and an airplane disaster that gave the initial impulse to the strangest phenomenon of our time.

During the night of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of June, a Marine Corps C-46 transport crashed against the south shoulder of Mount Rainier. When the military bases on the coast received word that the plane was missing, they radioed pilots flying over the area, asking them to join in the rescue search.

On Tuesday, June 24, Kenneth Arnold—a businessman from Boise, in the neighboring state of Idaho—took off from the airport of Chehalis in a privately owned Piper Cub bound for Yakima and Seattle on one of his normal business trips for the Fire Control Equipment Company. He intended to look for the scene of the crash on his way.

At 3:00 P.M., twenty miles ahead he could see the highest snow-covered peaks of the Cascade Range thrust jaggedly into the clear skies. After searching long and hard without finding any evidence of a crash, he climbed back up to 9,200 feet and headed toward Yakima.[1]

He was skirting the spent crater of Mount Rainier when a sudden flash on his left attracted his attention: nine silvery objects appeared in, as he later said, the characteristic form of an inverted plate and they flew in a "diagonal chain-like line," similar to a formation of geese, toward the mountains at what was obviously supersonic speed.

Gleaming in the sun like sheets of burnished metal, the nine objects maneuvered easily for some time among the high peaks of the chain, occasionally rising and descending as they traced its profile. During a brief pause in the maneuvers the formation flew in a single line, stretching across the sky for almost five miles. Then, with the help of the instrument panel clock and his perfect knowledge of the area, Arnold was able to determine that the mysterious flying machines covered the distance between the south wall of Mount Rainier and the distant peak of Mount Adams in a maximum time of 102 seconds: consequently they were flying at a good deal better than 1300 miles an hour.

Since he knew that such high speeds were not envisaged even for planes then on the drawing boards, Arnold flew toward the rear of the formation to check whether these were real objects or merely a mirage. Approaching within a few miles' distance, he was able to note, but only imprecisely because of their renewed, continuous spinning through the sky, that they were indeed solid objects, perhaps metallic, that they were in fact perfectly circular and were about a hundred feet in diameter; moreover, they seemed to have no tail or any other visible kind of wing or rudder. At the center of each object, he noted finally, was a sort of shining cupola. Perhaps noticing the presence of an intruder, the nine discs abruptly interrupted their strange aerial acrobatics, formed an echelon, and took off toward the north, disappearing in the direction of the Canadian border.

Resuming his search for the military transport, Arnold extended his investigations to the north slope of the mountains; then, considerably disturbed by the inexplicable celestial apparitions, he decided to inform the federal aviation authorities of what had happened.

After he had landed at the Yakima airport, he drafted a report of his flight in which he declared that he had caught sight of nine large aircraft of a hitherto completely unknown type flying above Rainier National Park.

For a number of years the Boeing Aircraft Company of Seattle had been building giant airplanes (the last of the series were the famous Super Fortresses, which were the pride of the state), but none of them had anything like the absurd circular shape described by the excited eyewitness. Consequently the (semiofficial) introduction of flying discs into the history of aviation was greeted with skepticism and derision.

The Arnold Report was published only by a small magazine dedicated to metaphysical, pseudoreligious, and extrasensory studies—Fate Magazine—which because of its special editorial slant ("True Stories of Mystery and the Unknown") presented it as putative proof of the arrival on earth of unidentifiable extraterrestrial objects.

UFOS SWARM ACROSS THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

In the days following the Arnold sighting local newspapers were swamped with new and different reports of mysterious overflights. Almost all of the reports came from areas close to the point of the first sighting.

Now no longer afraid of being taken for a visionary, Fred Johnson, a prospector from Portland, reported that he too had seen the same aircraft—or at any rate another formation of the same type—also on June 24.

On that day he had almost finished prospecting at Salmon Dam, about 4500 feet above sea level in the Cascades, when a strange humming and flashing of lights caused him to scan the skies to find out what was causing the phenomenon. Six shining aircraft "resembling enormous circular mirrors catching the sunlight" were flying over the area at a height of 3000 feet above the mountaintops. As observed through a telescope during a sharp turn, one of them appeared to be of a flattened circular construction followed by a kind of short wavering tail (evidently a short trail of vapor or combustible gases). Worthy of note was the fact that for fifty seconds, during which two of the craft flew by at a low altitude, "the compass needle went wild."

But the report that caused the greatest sensation was without doubt the Dahl Report, which concerned certain strange events that had happened three days before on June 21.

At 2:00 P.M. on that day, Harold H. Dahl, while on harbor patrol in Puget Sound—an inlet of many bays and coves that runs from the Canadian border to Tacoma—was following the coast line of the wooded part of Maury Island. Suddenly he saw an irregular formation of circular shapes completely unlike weather balloons, with which he was familiar, descend from a thick white cloud. There were five large whitish aircraft, he later wrote in his report, whose diameters were in the neighborhood of 100 feet and which seemed to be involved in a complicated protective or rescue maneuver. In fact, they were slowly circling around a sixth craft that had stopped at some 1500 feet above the coast, probably because of mechanical failure.

Suddenly the UFO in the center rapidly descended to about 500 feet and stopped, apparently rotating on its own axis with a slight humming sound similar to that produced by electric motors. On the belly of the machine a kind of dark, central "hole" stood out distinctly; from time to time bright lights issued from it (perhaps the entrance hatch protected by a bubble of transparent material), and it seemed to have a series of smaller, evenly spaced apertures encircling it.

Five minutes later, one of the machines circling about at the higher altitude detached itself from the formation and descended until it rested on the motionless UFO. The two machines remained in contact for about four minutes, then slowly the one on top separated itself from the other and began to climb to a high altitude.

Afraid of being caught in the possible crash of the machine, Dahl steered his launch deep into a small bay, just in time to get out from under a rain of small, lightweight, whitish metallic fragments, expelled by the hundreds with a dull explosion from the motionless craft.

Moving away slowly at a low altitude, the UFO continued spewing out fragments, dark gray this time and different from the ones expelled shortly before; they resembled scraps of cast metal and they were obviously very hot, for when they struck the water they gave off little clouds of steam.

After a final, shorter but much more violent expulsion, the UFO, as though lightened, regained altitude and returned to the center of the formation, which disappeared at high speed toward the open sea.[2]

The Dahl Report, as was to be expected, also reached the editorial office of Fate Magazine. The editors thought it would be a good idea to institute a private investigation in Tacoma by the person they thought best qualified to investigate matters relating to "flying saucers": Kenneth Arnold, the first eyewitness to this whole strange affair.

At the end of the investigation some of the information seemed to confirm the validity of the sighting. Other information—for example, that about a mysterious "stranger" who knew all about the events in Puget Sound and who allegedly "advised" the eyewitness not to tell anyone any of the details of the sighting—threw instead a certain shadow of doubt over the report.[3] Arnold had, however, the distinct impression that some of the blank spots and contradictions that emerged from a comparison between the written report and the oral testimony given by Dahl himself and his direct superior, Fred L. Chrisman, were dictated by higher considerations—namely, fear of compromising their jobs or careers.

Called in because of a confidential telephone call, it is not clear from whom, the U.S. Army A-2 Intelligence Branch did not begin its investigation until July 31.

If we can unquestioningly accept the final report drafted some years later and preserved in the files of the A.T.I.C. (Air Technical Intelligence Center), the "tons of metal that fell from the skies and were visible on the beach of the island" consisted of no more than a couple of fragments of strangely porous lava rock that wouldn't even fill a cornflakes box. Arnold sent some of this matter to the chemical laboratory at the University of Chicago, which classified it as slag of volcanic origin. The rest of the matter—turned over to the A-2 agents—was lost in a serious but purely fortuitous airplane accident during the investigators' flight to Hamilton Air Force Base in California.

At this point the co-authors of the report, Dahl and Chrisman, under pressure from the investigating authorities, ended by admitting that the fragments were only mineral formations picked up at random on Maury Island—"oddities" that they decided to show the press as evidence of the wreckage of the flying saucer with the sole aim of heightening interest in their story.[4]

In any case, the stories of Arnold and Dahl, which were picked up and commented on even by big papers and mass magazines, spread with extreme rapidity; and with equal rapidity the sky of the entire United States became spangled (or at least so it seemed to most people) with swift silver or fiery saucers. From the Pacific to the Atlantic, a real psychosis gripped the American masses and millions of people began to scan the skies anxiously, hoping to make a fateful sighting.

At the end of the first week of July fully thirty-eight states already boasted at least one flight of mysterious flying objects, including both actual sightings and those merely presumed to be such.[5] Naturally, wherever these objects refused to appear —because of their special operative cycle—imagination was called upon and in the end all those who believed in the discs could boast of having seen them, describing them in the oddest ways.

While the whole United States seemed literally to have gone mad about flying saucers, Europe showed decided skepticism. The news of recurrent North American sightings was picked up by the British press. Finally even the authoritative London Times emerged from the austere reserve with which it had received the first news to come out and say that when it is very hot, the imagination tends to overwork. And the aviation editor of the Daily Telegraph thought he could give the quietus to the whole affair by declaring that the flying saucers seen by the Americans were nothing more nor less than the indirect result of the recent wave of export of Scotch whiskey.[6]

Nevertheless, running down a list of the most convincing sightings, one notes at once that in June 1947 the mysterious overflights were apparently limited to the states in the northwest corner of the United States.

Then, in the first week of July, strange luminous bodies appeared also in the skies over Oregon, Nevada, New England, and the Canadian province of Quebec. On July 8 it was the turn of California and New Mexico.

Finally, as the North American sightings multiplied, the discs made fugitive appearances elsewhere as well. In fact, on July 8 a flying saucer was reported from South Africa. This object, which appeared to the naked eye to be about the size of a phonograph record, circled for some fifteen minutes at a high altitude over Johannesburg. Then, after giving off a dense cloud of smoke, it disappeared rapidly upward. On the same day, in Sydney, Australia, a number of persons observed the passage of a swift, shining object—appearing oval in shape because of its angle to the horizon—whose structure tallied with descriptions given by American and Canadian observers.

After the first ten days of July, the skies of the entire Western hemisphere, virtually from pole to pole, were pierced silently and mysteriously by the phantom saucers.

U.S. AIR FORCE DENIALS

The existence of the strange celestial presences having been conclusively proved, public opinion in the United States was at first divided into two distinct currents.

One current leaned toward the thesis of secret, massive experimentation by the Army or the Air Defense Command with some new type of extremely powerful radio-controlled device for atomic bombing and believed that on occasion some defective models had got out of the control of their operators.

The other current maintained that these presences were globes of electrically charged air, were radioactive, hence shiny, and were the results of atomic explosions.

Asked for his opinion, David Lilienthal, chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, gave the press a sharp answer: "I can't prevent anybody from saying foolish things."

In the meantime strange rumors began to spread among the public, giving rise to ill-concealed uneasiness. Were the discs interplanetary messages sent from the dying planet Mars? Or were they, perhaps, Russian missiles propelled by special engines that even harnessed the still very young but already terrible energy of nuclear fission? As a result, a reluctant Air Force staff felt compelled to conduct an investigation in order to quiet the press and reassure the public.

Exactly ten days after the Rainier Park incident, the U.S. Air Force in its first, very brief statement declared that the whole story was merely the fruit of mass hallucination.

This peremptory brush-off served only to confirm many Americans in the view that some kind of automatic exploratory expedition to the earth was being carried out by the inhabitants of another planet (some said Mars, others Venus, and still others named even Saturn) by means of machines that were different from our missiles but whose scientific purposes were more or less analogous to those of our present-day interplanetary probes: Lunik, Venusik, Explorer, and Mariner.

After all, hadn't a widespread rumor originated in England, which turned news about some mysterious celestial phenomena (the so-called Soviet "phantom rockets") that had excited the Scandinavian countries during the spring of 1946 into science fiction? This rumor unequivocally had it that certain Soviet astronomers had "confirmed" that beginning with the end of the last war, interplanetary projectiles had occasionally been fired at the earth, and, moreover, that "something" more alive than the incandescent material of a projectile had descended some time before from the depths of interstellar space at some unidentified point on the Siberian tundra.

At the time Kenneth Arnold was described as "the first man to see the Martians." In any case, although he was not convinced that the affair concerned Martians at all, Arnold vehemently disagreed both with those who denied the existence of the saucers and with those who declared that they could at most be aircraft constructed by the Soviets or the American Air Force. It was no mirage, he protested. He had been flying for years and knew those mountains as well as he knew the insides of his own pockets. He had never seen anything like them or anything so fast! The Air Force and the press could say he was an Einstein, a Flash Gordon, or just another screwball, but he knew damn well what he saw!

Finding himself purely by chance on the crest of a wave of unexpected if ephemeral notoriety from the day that Ray Palmer, the editor of Fate, had entrusted him with the investigation of the Dahl Report, Arnold began to fly back and forth across the United States investigating various sightings and collecting material for a book—The Coming of the Saucers—which he afterwards wrote with Palmer.[7]

He sought conscientiously to collect and evaluate the best reports in order to try to solve the mystery. Nevertheless, for the great majority of Americans he remained "the first man to see the Martians" . . . and the UFO question, born in this original sin, became a subject for jokes and denials from experts.

In the second week of July the Pentagon thought it advisable, in view of the discordant reactions of the public, to offer through its own spokesman something more specific than the too vague conclusions of the U.S. Air Force: "The mysterious devices that some people claim to have seen for some time in the skies are probably the sunlight reflected on cloud formations moving at a high altitude, or exploded meteors whose microscopic residue reflects the sunlight, or very large and considerably flattened hailstones which, falling through the atmosphere, begin to glide and, rising and falling, give the illusion of horizontal flight."

Thanks to this ingenious "clarification," the press accused the military authorities of desperately trying to cover up some dangerous fact. One indefatigable reporter discovered, for example, that at the time of the first sightings Air Force General Carl Spaatz had been spending a long time in these northwestern areas. Spaatz dryly retorted that he vacationed there every year to pursue his favorite sport of salmon fishing. Thus the secret hope that there would be an official and sensational statement on the matter collapsed, but as a kind of compensation, a flying saucer did in fact fall on United States territory.

THE YELLOWSTONE "YO-YO"

On July 7, 1947, a twin-engined P-38 fighter that had been converted into a photoreconnaissance plane for the photographic service of U.S. Army Ordnance was flying at about 30,000 feet in the direction of the Air Force base in Bozeman, Montana.

The sky along the extreme northern edge of Yellowstone National Park was completely free of clouds. Except for a little trouble with the oil system of the engines—a not particularly serious matter, in any case—the flight was proceeding routinely.

Suddenly the photographer shouted: "Look! They're coming! They've almost caught up with us!"

"What? Who's coming?" asked the astonished pilot. What could possibly threaten this lonely flight? The war had been over, definitely over, for some time.

"Those things the papers are always talking about."

For a few moments the sinister shadow of a new Pearl Harbor hovered in the minds of the American airmen. The "cold war" was by then an unpleasant but obvious political state of affairs, and hadn't the immense Asian north shown itself to be an impenetrable fortress hostile to the Western peoples?

The European news release of an American wire service that had somehow learned about this militarily "classified" episode quoted Lieutenant Vernon Blair:

". . . And then turning around to speak to the photographer I saw the yo-yo behind me. I call it a yo-yo because I surprisingly thought of that toy that I used to play with as a child. We had orders to shoot them down at any cost, but I didn't remember that until afterwards, and although I was flying at 360 miles per hour, the strange aircraft quickly overtook me. I was, however, able to observe it for a few seconds: it had the shape of a very flat oyster and was, as it seemed to me, about fifteen feet or so broad, and about three feet thick. It was flying without making any sound, I mean any sound louder than that produced by my own plane, and emitting a light, luminous trail. Then, as soon as it had overtaken me and I was about to try to follow it, I saw it open in two, just like an oyster, and flutter down. I noticed that it was catching up with at least a dozen yo-yos proceeding in an irregular formation, almost like fighters peeling off for an attack.”

“Are you sure that they were metallic objects and not, for example, simply shiny spots moving of their own accord or the effect of some such mirage?”

“The mysterious aircraft seemed to be made of aluminum. They were pearl-gray in color and on the upper side they all had a shining bubble of some transparent material.”

“Did you see who was flying them? And why didn’t you take any pictures?”

“We wasted some time watching them fly by and trying to determine whether there was anyone on board. They moved quicker than we could act!”

“Did the leader by any chance graze your plane?”

“No, absolutely not. I have no idea why he fell. Perhaps he was already having mechanical trouble or perhaps he accidentally got into my slipstream and was torn apart. As I said, we were going pretty fast.”[8]

The photographer confirmed that he did not have time to aim his large vertical camera at the formation because the objects flew by too rapidly, and his report on the event coincided in its main particulars with that of the pilot (who was described by his direct superiors as a “serious and honest officer, who takes his job seriously”). He added that since he had concentrated his attention on one of the craft that had briefly approached the P-38 more closely than the others, it seemed to him that he had glimpsed a man, the pilot, inside, lying flat in the cabin and looking out the glass porthole in the front of the bubble.

The terrain in which the contraption fell is quite rough and thickly wooded. The staff at the base in Bozeman, authorized by the Pentagon, immediately began a series of careful inspections in the area with search parties and army helicopters, but without any positive results.[9] Perhaps the Martians had collected those precious fragments?

A few Americans wept over the sad fate of the unknown hero who had perished in order to further the secret progress of American aviation. More, however, were afraid that the Martians would be angry. But nothing happened. In fact, flying saucers continued to swarm for a while, harmless and elusive, in the skies of the Western hemisphere, following certain broad but well-defined routes (though no one at the time noted the fact), as though they were guided by a careful plan to carry out an ambitious and difficult end that was perhaps rendered possible solely by their strange form.

In any case, the frivolous appellation of "yo-yo" that Lieutenant Blair had conferred on the strange craft, and its similarity to the well-known toy that gave us many pleasant hours in our youth, anticipated later observations on its peculiar "biplanar" form (that is, of two circular bodies, one atop and slightly apart from the other). These observations were reinforced by at least a dozen reputable eyewitness depositions in succeeding years, suggesting that the contraption seemed to revolve around its own axis.

The luminous trail was a dead giveaway of the presence of a jet engine, although of a special and still completely unknown type: using hot, burned air that formed a propelling jet. Even though in those years propeller-driven planes were still the dominant type, jets being an exclusively military rarity, there was really no call, even then, to seek to explain these things by attributing them to the inhabitants and technology of the remote planet of Mars.

The press, however, did not give up but asked, among other things, why this little saucer—which after all had supposedly traveled tens of millions of miles through cosmic space without any trouble—had then so ignominiously broken up in flight a short distance in front of the P-38 that it had overtaken. Could it have been that the warm, dense atmosphere in the altitudes that our planes fly at was harmful to the Martian flyers? Neither then nor later was anyone able to give a plausible explanation of the event.

Nevertheless, the considerations that are forced upon us today are of quite a different nature: while the U.S. Air Force was publicly denying the existence of the discs, it secretly issued orders to its pilots to shoot them down, no matter what the cost—in complete agreement with the secret orders that the other two military branches issued to their flight crews. Contradiction and confusion? Not in the least. Deception, rather.

A deception that has been going on for nearly two decades.

APPENDIX TO THE "MANTELL CASE"

As we have seen, toward the end of July 1947 American sightings of unknown flying objects became fewer and further between; during August a few isolated UFOs appeared only over Europe. Then sightings ceased completely. The press looked for its own explanation of the matter, questioning any experts who were not muzzled by Air Force directives.

A compact front of astronomers rejected in toto the idea that a new and unknown form of flight could exist. They explained all the objects sighted as meteors, which at that time were indeed on the increase because of the regular annual appearance of the meteoric wake of Aquarids II.

The prudent silence or tentative observations of some civilians who were authorities on aeronautical matters were prompted by the fact that the form and speed of the objects as reported by the most reliable witnesses might also come within the scope of technical secrets known for the moment only to the military.[10]

Other authorities, versed in the most disparate disciplines, wanted, or were induced, to have their say. Some accepted the official "explanations" without discussion. Others leaned toward explanations based on the appearance of mirages similar to the Fata Morgana. There were those who referred to the increased launchings of new types of weather balloons and those who considered instead the possibility that some new atmospheric phenomenon connected in some way with the growth of radar installations had developed. There were even those who said that the whole thing was a gigantic mass hallucination that could be traced back to spots before the eyes, the so-called muscae volitantes which for a brief time afflicts those who stare at the clear sky or some light source for a protracted period.

In America these declarations naturally satisfied neither the superpatriots—who wanted the discs to have the Air Force star on them—nor those who were expecting the Martians.

Moreover, the first group observed, not without a tone of vexation, that with these perhaps still experimental machines sent all over the world, an accident might jeopardize this extremely well-kept national secret. Or—as the second group of malcontents insinuated—these saucers were really photographic reconnaissance machines of great range—furnished with an automatic avoidance device that kept them from crashing into any sort of obstacle (earth, airplanes, antiaircraft missiles)—which had been constructed on the basis of the plans of certain German projects dating from 1944. But in that case what would be the point of America spying on itself? Only Russia, which also had a corner on "secret weapons," would have been able to use the invention profitably in order to learn about America's industrial and military potential.

The U.S. Air Force again issued vehement denials. Flying saucers, whether Russian, Yankee, Martian, or from anywhere else, were nothing but tall tales. And the witnesses of the by now innumerable overflights were rewarded en masse with the very unflattering description of hallucinated visionaries.

Authoritative denials and journalistic pressures mingled for another few months without throwing any substantial light on the exciting mystery. In order to reassure the public and to cut short the press' inconvenient probing that kept the question alive (although the discs had by now not been seen for some time), on December 30, 1947, the Secretary of Defense, James Forrestal, signed an order that set up a permanent committee of inquiry on flying saucers.

Placed under the Air Matériel Command (A.M.C.) at Wright-Patterson Field and headed by Professor J. Allen Hynek, then the director of the McMillin astrophysical observatory of Ohio State University, the commission set to work immediately, sending special questionnaires to witnesses who had happened to see unusual celestial phenomena—questionnaires that would be subjected to analytical and statistical evaluation by a group of civilian and military experts.

Although not openly stated, the basic aim of the commission was to attribute the sightings either to nonexistent things or to mistakenly identified things that already existed: psychopathic hallucinations, hoaxes, optical illusions, weather balloons, parhelia, lenticular clouds, meteorites, ordinary planes flying at high altitudes, flocks of migratory birds, and the like.[11]

To the 117 sightings of 1947 that they culled from the most responsible press reports, the commission added some 436 individual questionnaires covering the entire two-year period that followed.

The hard nut of the inquiry was a sensational bit of evidence from Kentucky known as the "Mantell Case." The episode is so well known that we need not report it here in detail, but there is one aspect, still almost totally unknown, that is worth noting because it throws real light on the complicated UFO question.

Briefly, then, the tragic affair began in the neighboring state of Indiana. At 2:30 P.M. on January 7, 1948, a high-flying, shiny, flat, circular object passed over the town of Madison at a speed of at least 500 miles per hour.

A series of telephone calls from Elizabethtown, Lexington, and Fort Knox—the famous national safe-deposit box—shortly after alerted Godman Field, a military air base. A gigantic shining object was, in fact, moving swiftly through the skies of the area, giving the impression that it was carrying out a methodical exploratory mission. At 3:00 P.M. this object, or perhaps another of the same type, appeared directly above the base.

Observing it through binoculars, Colonel F. G. Hix concluded that it was a flaming disc of gigantic size—in all probability its diameter was about 150 feet.

Three F-51 Mustang fighters were returning to the base under the command of Captain Thomas Mantell. The squadron received radio orders to identify this object, which in the meantime had begun to move away. Shortly thereafter two of the fighters had to return to the field, having run out of fuel. Captain Mantell continued in pursuit and at 3:15 P.M. he reported: "I've sighted the thing. It looks metallic and of tremendous size. It's rotating rapidly and surrounded by reddish streamers. It looks like an ice-cream cone topped with red, intermittently flashing at the top."

According to official sources his last radio message said: "It's still above me, making my speed or better. I'm going up to 20,000 feet and if I'm no closer, I'll abandon chase."[12]

However, one of the personnel at the Godman control tower later revealed to a member of the British Flying Saucers Bureau, a private association dedicated to the investigation of UFOs, that there was a sequel to the story. Shortly afterward, Captain Mantell did manage to get within closer distance of the UFO when it made a brief stop in the air.

"My God!" he then exclaimed on the radio. "There are men in it!" The rest of his words, if there were any, were drowned out by an indescribable crescendo of noise. Then came a terrible crash and radio contact was broken.

While Captain Mantell remained disturbingly silent, another white-gold circular object enveloped in a red halo and with a long amber-colored contrail crossed the skies of Ohio, passing very rapidly over the Lockbourne air base at what was surely a stratospheric altitude. At almost the same time, within a few miles of the airport of Wilmington, Delaware, a sort of ball of fire surrounded by a cloud of greenish gas appeared in the sky from the southwest and for a good thirty-five minutes executed strange maneuvers in space—continuous alternation of turns and vertical climbs and dives. Finally it flew off at a "terrifying" speed. And that was the last sighting on that memorable day.

At dawn the next morning, after a telephone call from the local police near Fort Knox, several platoons sent by the command at Godman Field found the wreckage of the Mustang spread over a vast area.[13]

The press was forbidden access to the site of the accident. There was no authorized photograph and no statement to the press, as is usual under the circumstances. This was not, in fact, one of those simple aviation disasters that spatter the records of mechanical flight. The "Mantell Case" was a mysterious episode that was rendered even more puzzling by the report that some of the wreckage appeared to have "tiny perforations and to be almost porous or rough," as though it had been struck by a combination of a blast of intense heat and a violent abrasive jet.

REPORT NO. 102

On December 27, 1949, Professor Hynek sent a—naturally “final”—report to Washington on the investigation (for the record, its official title reads: Report No. 102-AC/49-15-100/ Project SIGN), and Order No. 629/49 of the Command of the U.S.A.F. marked the official dissolution of the commission.

In two years of work 375 of the most reliable reports had been analyzed, $34,000 had been spent, and the conclusions were, as might have been foreseen, that “basically nothing proved the existence of the flying saucers.”

Nevertheless, of the 228 sightings that were made public only 194 were explained exhaustively or in accord with the stated premises of the backers of the commission. Thirty-four cases were in fact considered inexplicable. For example, the accident in which Captain Mantell lost his life was at first explained away as an attempt on his part to intercept the planet Venus, which was especially bright that night, then as an equally futile attempt to pursue a very high cirrus cloud that had caught the reflections of the sun, and finally it was simply brushed aside as “contact with an unknown object.”

Given the small number of “unexplained” sightings, the commission considered that it was within its rights to reach a completely negative conclusion, at the same time, however, prudently advancing the hypothesis that the thirty-four cases in question could be ascribed to special atmospheric phenomena that had been incorrectly described or were still little known scientifically.[14]

For some time the disappearance of the unknown machines from the skies seemed fully to support the explanation that no mystery did in fact exist, and on American airfields those who reported sightings were made the butt of all sorts of jokes. They had seen pie pans flying upside down, had they? Fine! Anyone who still saw some rare, isolated UFO was of course careful not to talk about it.

The unexpected conclusion to the official investigations had an equally unforeseen consequence. Those who disseminated false reports about Martians and such things—people who had "worked" secretly before—vigorously fanned the flames of disappointment and, with the help of those newspapers interested in sensationalism, spread a series of increasingly amazing and unlikely news stories among millions of unsuspecting readers.

On the other hand, outraged by the negative views of the U.S.A.F., numerous people who had seen UFOs began to listen, though with some misgivings, to certain rumors that had been making the rounds for some time but that now began to grow. As often happens, the minority led the majority along, and soon much of the American public believed in the Martians (or the Ethereans, or the Wolfians, or what have you).

The authorities, however, maintained their curiously "incoherent" attitude. From the spring of 1948 American military pilots had orders to intercept and shoot down the unknown invaders. Then the orders changed, doubtless because of the Mantell case: "Intercept but don't shoot except in the case of an obvious maneuver on the part of the UFO."

The instructions of Major General Ramey of the Air Defense Command aimed simply at acquiring clear ocular or photographic evidence and precise details that might in some manner interest the Air Force Technical Intelligence Center. (Science "worked" for the public, but it demanded "details" for the military.)

The order was never revoked. Meanwhile, in the secret corridors of the Pentagon a new policy began to form, a policy of silence and denials that years later led ufologists to talk about a "Flying Saucer Conspiracy" that had been arranged in high places against the flying discs or, more precisely, against our Brothers from Space and their antiatomic and pacific mission.

In reality, what was taking shape, and in really high places, was a sort of "conspiracy of silence" that was adopted in order not to shake the prestige of the Republic, which, although at the zenith of its political and technical hegemony, possessed no aircraft able to emulate the then almost legendary speeds of the UFOs.

NOTES

1. In fact, the transport was found the following day on the slopes of the South Tacoma Glacier, considerably south of Arnold's route.

2. To better evaluate the Dahl Case, compare it with the following episode: February 18, 1950, Sjaelland (Denmark)—Christian Sandersen, owner of a small plot of land on the east coast of Sjaelland, reporting to the press the nighttime flight several miles out to sea of two "flying saucers," said: ". . . When I saw them, the first was proceeding at a very high altitude. The other, however, was flying at about 1500 feet and seemed hesitant about what course to take. It was going back and forth and spinning furiously as it climbed, then it slowed down its motor, descending to about 500 feet. The disc at the higher altitude had meanwhile stopped and seemed to be waiting. After a few moments during which it was motionless, it descended rapidly and brought itself almost in contact with the other; it remained in that position for several minutes, then it rose again and disappeared. A few seconds later, the 'hesitant' disc exploded in a blinding ball of flame that seemed to consume the whole thing." It is true that the "ball of flame" could quite reasonably be explained by the instantaneous combustion of its remaining fuel by means of some timing device and that the momentary contact between the two craft can be logically explained as an attempt to rescue the endangered crew, effected perhaps by the pilots' transferring from the bubble on the back of the nonfunctioning disc to the bubble on the belly of the rescue ship (these structural elements are quite clear in the later Brazilian photographs of 1952). The local press, however—still under the influence of the then very recent American "Report No. 102," which unequivocally denied that any unidentified flying objects existed—gave no credence to Sandersen's story. Yet only three days before, the same Danish press had given considerable play to certain military statements designed to calm public opinion concerning repeated signals that radar stations and the Coast Guard had picked up of very high and fast overflights of unidentified air formations, cautiously suggesting that the Soviets were carrying out cartographic research in the Baltic!

5. Among the many “saucer psychosis” cases, one is worthy of note: the claimed sighting of a UFO on September 28, 1947. Air currents had caused one of the many weather balloons that are periodically launched in the area around New York to drift over the city. Perversely, the state of New York had not had any sightings of unidentified flying objects. Could not, then, the round and shining body that swiftly and nimbly disappeared and reappeared here and there among the gray clouds have been one of the rare and eagerly awaited contraptions? The sensation caused by its appearance was such that the local radio stations hastily broadcast a statement on the true nature of the object, but since this did not have the desired effect, it was proposed to send up a fighter plane to shoot down the intruder. Fortunately an offshore wind carried the sphere away from the city, disappointing those—and there were many—who were eagerly awaiting a local landing of astronauts on a visit to the biggest city on earth.

6. This assertion immediately had an unexpected as well as an unmerited notoriety. When the hypothesis that the mysterious machines seen by the Americans were a new kind of Soviet long-range weapon launched from some secret Siberian base was advanced in the United Nations, Molotov rose up angrily and declared: “The flying discs are of English origin, because the only thing responsible for such visions is the too-abundant consumption of whiskey, which overstimulates your imaginations!"

8. In the autumn of 1948 the operational staff of the U.S. Air Force circulated a directive to all fighter units equipped with jets to be on guard against the serious danger presented by the turbulent propeller wash from piston-engined bombers—a danger that had been pointed up by a series of fatal accidents. During mock combat exercises against a formation of four-engined B-29S, an F-84 jet fighter that had entered the slipstream close behind the propellers of one of the bombers had literally disintegrated in flight, and the same fate had befallen an F-80 fighter during a similar maneuver. Finally, another fighter that had come into contact with a bomber's propeller wash had been hit violently in a vertical line along its left side, losing an auxiliary fuel tank along with a part of the wing tip because of the violent vibrations that resulted.

9. At least this was the official version distributed to the various staffs of the Air Force and Army concerned with the searches, and sanctioning the results of the investigation.

10. The Italian press reported the comment of Charles Gardner, then considered Britain's best aviation editor: "Whatever the truth may be about the American flying saucers,' there is one aspect of the matter that has considerable importance for high-speed aircraft designers. All of the witnesses that have 'seen' the mysterious objects agree on their circular form, which would represent an evolution in the projects worked out by a number of scientists in the last ten years. One witness has described the strange craft as resembling a giant lens, another has said that it has a low cupola, but most have gone no farther than a simple comparison with an inverted plate. . . . There is no doubt that the problem of passing through the 'sound barrier' will force us to make considerable modifications in the shapes of our flying machines. . . . In order to overcome such difficulties many scientists have suggested a 'delta'-shaped wing, or a right-angled triangle . . . without tail or fuselage. . . . From the 'delta' to the semicircle and from this to the full circle are two clearly connected steps. . . . We know that the 'flying triangles' will actually be built and therefore the semicircles and even the 'flying discs' are not after all so farfetched as might seem at first sight. I would, however, be surprised if all the enormous problems of such a heterodox and supersonic machine had already been resolved and if a 'flying saucer' with men on board had already flown. . . . The Americans are building jet planes that approximate the speed of sound (746 miles per hour at sea level) and we hope that England will soon achieve the same results. It seems incredible to me that someone is not only four or five stages in advance on the road of aeronautical progress but that he has also built so many of them that he can launch them by the scores across a continent." To understand Gardner's technical assessment and his doubts better, it should be pointed out that it was precisely at that time (on June 19, 1947, to be exact) that the Americans had taken the world speed record from the British, and were the first "officially" to fly faster than 1000 kph in a modified P-80C jet fighter. The timed speed was 1003.811 kph. Because of the lack of more precise data Gardner had, however, made a technical mistake in supposing that the flying saucers were derived by simple evolution, in the aerodynamic sense, from the 'flying wing,' or that they were a development in construction in the area of so-called low aspect-ratio wings.

11. Professor Hynek's serious preconceptions concerning the UFOs can be deduced, for example, from the introduction to Project Blue Book, Special Report No. 14 (Analysis of Reports of UFO), Project No. 10073, May 5, 1955, issued by the Air Technical Intelligence Center at Wright-Patterson Field, in which is written: "The unfortunate term 'flying saucer' or 'flying disc,' because of its widespread and indiscriminate use, requires definition. Many definitions have been offered, one of the best being that originated by Dr. J. Allen Hynek. . . . Dr. Hynek's definition of the term is 'aerial phenomenon or sighting that remains unexplained to the viewer at least long enough for him to write a report about it.’” Is this an ironic evaluation of things that had to be kept secret, or pure scientific nearsightedness?

12. The speed of the pursuit is closely related to the operating characteristics of the F-51D Mustang fighter (Packard Merlin V-1650-7 supercharged piston engine developing 1630 HP and driving a four-bladed propeller), which could climb in 18.5 minutes to an altitude of 25,000 feet, there developing its maximum horizontal speed (450 mph), and had a service ceiling of 43,500 feet.

13. According to Le Courrier Interplanétaire of Lausanne, an almost exact repetition of the Mantell Case—this one known in ufological circles as the Merkel Case—allegedly took place on January 9, 1956. Toward dusk a number of UFOs appeared in the sky over southern Indiana. Several jets and one propeller-driven plane belonging to the National Guard and stationed at the airport in Louisville, Kentucky, immediately scrambled to intercept. The maneuver failed owing to the growing darkness and the fear that their fuel supply would give out. Nevertheless, Colonel Merkel—thanks to the greater range of his propeller-driven fighter (a P-51 Mustang)—continued the pursuit, radioing the control tower that he had observed without any possibility of doubt a mysterious shining object that performed evolutions along a bank of clouds directly above him. Still having sufficient reserves of oxygen and gas, Merkel climbed to 30,000 feet, trying to approach the UFO and reporting that it was flying at a considerably higher altitude. Merkel then climbed steeply at full throttle, but almost immediately radio contact was lost and after a dizzying dive, the fighter seemed to explode a few hundred feet above a farm near Bloomington, destroying the building and scattering fragments of metal over a radius of about 1300 feet. Since we do not have an official version of the fact, it would be hazardous to draw any conclusions; nevertheless, the ufologists’ conclusion that intelligent beings were on board the unknown craft and became hostile only when approached without invitation scarcely appears credible.

ENGINEER CLAIMS "SAUCER" PLANS ARE IN SOVIET HANDS;
SIGHTINGS IN AFRICA, IRAN, SYRIA

GERMAN ENGINEER STATES SOVIETS HAVE GERMAN FLYING SAUCER EXPERTS AND PLANS -- Athens, I Vradyni, 13 May 53

Vienna (Special Service) -- According to recent reports from Toronto, a number of Canadian Air Force engineers are engaged in the construction of a "flying saucer" to be used as a future weapon of war. The work of these engineers is being carried out in great secrecy at the A. B. Roe Company [transliteration from the Greek] factories.

"Flying saucers" have been known to be an actuality since the possibility of their construction was proven in plans drawn up by German engineers toward the end of World War II.

Georg Klein, a German engineer, stated recently that though many people believe the "flying saucers" to be a postwar development, they were actually in the planning stage in German aircraft factories as early as 1941.

Klein said that he was an engineer in the Ministry of Speer [probably refers to Albert Speer, who, in 1942, was Minister for Armament and Ammunition for the Third Reich] and was present in Prague on 14 February 1945, at the first experimental flight of a "flying saucer."

Aside from Alexander Lippisch the brothers Walter and Reimar Horten also pursued the idea of a flying wing. With their Horten IX B and Horten XIII jet fighter designs they came to the conclusion of stationing the pilot in the vertical stabilizer. Therefore, these birds bore some resemblance to the DM-1, although they did not progress beyond the project stage.

A Bit of Science Fiction

In the spring of 1949 a dozen reports filled with unimportant information that could easily be traced to ordinary phenomena having nothing to do with UFOs led the investigators of the Hynek Commission to hope that the wave of “sightings” would peter out naturally, since the affair had already lasted so long and crowds are notoriously fickle.

But their reasoning was faulty, for reports continued to trickle in; and in June something like a second Mantell Case almost occurred.

It happened in the space of a few minutes over the Tierras Calientes hills in Mexico. Its engines droning regularly in unison, a four-engined American military plane was crossing the Yucatan peninsula toward its base in Texas. Not a cloud was in the sky. Only a distant point of light stood out in the heavy tropical calm—obviously a motionless weather balloon at about the same altitude as the plane. As the distance between the two gradually shortened, the point of light began to take on a more definite shape, revealing the unmistakable characteristics of a saucer.

"Attention all crew members," the captain said distinctly over the intercom. "Unknown flying object at eleven o'clock."

The disc remained motionless in space at an altitude of about 8000 feet, with a light layer of vapor or whitish smoke hovering around it. When they had got within a mile of the object the flyers began to observe it attentively, hoping to make out some details of its construction that they could report to their superiors. But they hoped in vain.

After oscillating a number of times around its vertical axis like a top coming to rest, the mysterious machine suddenly started up, moving almost slantwise and quickly approaching the plane.

"What's he doing?" the co-pilot exclaimed apprehensively. "He's coming right at us!"

The disc almost brushed the left wing tip and then began to circle rapidly around the plane, bewildering the flyers. In order to escape this senseless, annoying maneuver, the pilot dived abruptly and took the plane down to about 3000 feet.

After stopping briefly at the original altitude, the disc also dropped down to 3000 feet and began to repeat its passes around the plane, gleaming like a mirror in the sunlight.

"He won't go away!" the captain said in alarm. "That damn son of a bitch is going to end up by crashing into our wing unless . . ." but he didn't get a chance to finish. His engines began to show a disturbing irregularity, either because of the violent eddies caused by the speed of the unknown object or because of some sort of interference with the plane's ignition system. As a result of the violent buffeting, the ailerons and the tail began to show signs of weakening.[1]

Having completely lost control of the plane, the captain regretfully had to order the crew to bail out. Under the umbrellas of their chutes, the flyers angrily watched the disc rise vertically to its original altitude and wait while the plane crashed into the swamp below.

When, after considerable difficulty, the flyers got back to their base and were being questioned, they declared among other things that, "properly speaking," the object had committed no act of aggression nor had it even indirectly employed a weapon. "We do not know if there were any men on board the disc, but it seems logical to assume that it was under human direction, because at first the machine hesitated slightly before dropping down to our lower altitude. An electronic device would have caused it to follow our plane from the moment we began to dive. . . . That flying in circles around our plane by that huge shining machine was truly frightening, blinding and bewildering us. . . . It was utterly impossible to maintain course."

The press did not learn about the results of the inquiry, for the exact place where the events occurred was kept secret and even the names of the flyers were never revealed.

What little trickled out about the episode—all, in fact, that has been reported—led Fantastic Stories buffs to proclaim: "The Martians are interested in our means of flight! When they're certain that our techniques are inferior to theirs and that we're no threat to them, they will undoubtedly land and establish friendly relations." And, encouraged by the circulation of stories about flying saucers piloted by tiny creatures, the wild speculation began on the best way to welcome them, what they would probably look like, the likelihood of their speaking English, the best ways of communicating with them in case they had no vocal organs, and other such subjects.

THE "JEKAMS CASE"

The permanent inquiry commission was getting ready to present the results of its fruitless two-year investigation when, on August 19, 1949, the Air Force itself was imprudent enough to nearly wreck the laborious edifice of arguments that was supposed to prove that the UFOs did not exist.

The Air Force command of Baltimore suddenly called a press conference and an authorized spokesman stated, to the understandable confusion of everyone present, that two different "prototypes" of airplanes which might solve the mystery of the famous saucers had been found on an abandoned farm near Glen Burnie.

The two machines had been built just before the war by one Jonathan E. Caldwell with the aid of a local mechanic, and one of the machines had even flown.

The Air Force statement said it was possible that Caldwell had conducted subsequent experiments with improved models based on the two inoperative prototypes that were discovered in the barn on his farm. The technical officer in charge of the Air Force's investigation said that in flight both models could resemble a flying saucer and could be prototypes of other perfected machines that might actually have been seen in American skies. Now the Air Force would have to locate Caldwell and find out if he had done any work on them since then, and for whom.

The two machines had been abandoned for years on that ramshackle farm and were falling to pieces along with it. Restoration was out of the question. Besides, Caldwell had conceded that it would be financially impossible to realize his ideas.

The builder had tried to combine the advantages and dynamic principles of the airplane and the helicopter and as a result the models had round wings and contrarotating propellers. But that was more than enough to stimulate even the most sluggish imagination. Hadn't the saucers remained motionless in the air just like helicopters? Weren't they perfectly circular like Caldwell's full-size models? And finally, didn't they seem to prefer the skies over the United States, the native country of the builder—who, incidentally, could not be found?[2]

The short official report started a sort of pilgrimage to the supposed "hatchery" of the first Yankee saucers, which was featured as the lead story in the picture weeklies.

It seemed that the mystery of the saucers was about to be solved in a way that would uphold the prestige of the United States. But then on August 20, less than twenty-four hours after the press conference, the same source that had announced the discovery demolished the myth that the saucers were made in the U.S.A.

The same command stated through another equally authoritative spokesman that the two experimental craft discovered in Maryland “have absolutely no connection with the reported phenomena of flying saucers,” that were supposedly observed in the two years 1947–1948. The Air Force now charged that when the two unusual craft that had been constructed before the war by an engineer who cannot now be located were discovered, the press had indulged in the most fantastic speculations, but unfortunately, said the Air Force, the mystery of the flying saucers nevertheless remained unsolved. Had some superior called the rash Baltimore command to order? . . .

In their fervor to investigate Caldwell’s creations—according to the press, other frustrated inventors claimed priority for similar ideas—the newspapers got sidetracked. Then they soon turned to more pressing subjects.

Russia was secretly overcoming its disadvantage in the field of atomic power. But in order to maintain its own undisputed mastery of this terrible power, America was multiplying its nuclear establishments and preparing new types of bombs. The growing industrial hunger for radioactive minerals had led American authorities to encourage prospecting for them on United States soil, and thousands of volunteers attracted by the prospects of wealth envisioned in their “uranium fever” began to crisscross the most inaccessible reaches of the country, armed with Geiger counters, patience, and, most of all, with hope. The principal scientific institutes also contributed to the prospectors’ efforts by forming expeditions specifically equipped for prospecting for minerals.

In 1949 one of these expeditions, headed by Professor Jekams and made up of five geologists and two Indian guides, had been hiking for several hours in a sharp September wind toward Mount Rainier, in the very area of the famous first sighting. The group crossed over the moraine of the Carbon River glacier, left the edge of the thick pine forest, and climbed along the bare, rocky ledges. As yet they had not found any trace of the precious mineral.

The sky was perfectly free of clouds and the sun beat implacably against the flanks of the mountain, probing into the lava beds. Exhausted by the long hike and the hot sun, Professor Jekams leaned back against the rock face. He was estimating how much farther they still had to go when a shadow appeared on the ground.

What kind of cloud can form in a few seconds in such a cloudless sky? the geologist wondered as he raised his head to investigate the curious phenomenon.

“Three flying saucers of exceedingly large dimensions,” he recounted later, “were banking in the clear sky. Two of them remained at an altitude of about 5000 feet. The third, which was casting its shadow on the ground below, was at only 1500 feet and almost directly above us. We estimated that it could not have been less than 250 feet in diameter.”

Frightened by that gigantic mass of metal which hung in the air as though suspended by an invisible thread, the group took refuge under some boulders and awaited developments.

“With a strange wavering motion, the nearest disc suddenly moved and slowly began to descend toward nearby Dome Peak, not stopping until it was about fifty feet from the summit. From the underside, which seemed to revolve around a central fixed part of the machine, came occasional flashes and sparks accompanied by a humming like that of a fan, almost as though the engine of the craft was idling. The enormous circular mass remained motionless for a few moments and then began to rise and fall laterally.”

“Did it rise and fall the way weather balloons sometimes do?”

“Not exactly. To be perfectly accurate, it wobbled like a top coming to rest, but much more slowly. The maneuver was also accompanied by slight gains and losses of altitude. It almost seemed to be dancing in the air and, through an association of ideas, the evolutions reminded me of the well-known dance of the bees. This curious maneuver lasted almost a quarter of an hour, then the craft rose vertically at fantastic speed.”

“What about the other craft?”

“After waiting at a high altitude for the first disc to return, the other discs also descended and repeated the same movements one after the other. All three regrouped at about 5000 feet in a triangular formation, and a little later they disappeared beyond the horizon,” that is, toward the Canadian border—as usual.[3]

THE SUPPOSED “NEGATIVE POLE” OF GRAVITY

When the public information office of the Department of Defense allowed the facts in the Jekams Case to become public, those who believed the flying saucers came from an extraterrestrial source found a simple explanation for the inexplicable maneuvers of the UFOs on the summit of Dome Peak in the operation of antigravity.

The hypothesis that the UFOs were using antigravitational energy was originally advanced by the versatile British writer Gerald Heard. He took it up from rumors making the rounds during the period of the first sightings in 1947. One of these rumors, for example, seriously reported that an American private plane had been mysteriously stopped in mid-flight and held suspended in the air by a flying saucer that then flew around it for a considerable time, apparently in order to study it! The antigravitational energy hypothesis found its most ardent champion in former Marine Major Donald H. Keyhoe, who, unable to perfect his theory by reason of the obvious lack of hard scientific data, broadcast it to the public at large through his best-selling books on flying saucers, which at first he claimed were of Martian origin and, after this claim was shaken by the attacks of astronomers, of unspecified interstellar origin.

According to Heard, magnetism was only the opposite pole of the gravitational force that keeps us attached to the planet, and the flying saucers could resist this force with a “counterforce, a negative reaction to the pull of the earth, as on the negative pole of the magnet objects are not drawn in but driven out.” Thus the discs could hover and move through the air as though held up by some mysterious gigantic magnet, and “maybe they go to the South Pole because, down there, at the end of the world-magnet, they can recharge themselves best?”[4]

Starting off from the convenient hypothesis that it is technically possible “somehow” to have an influence on the earth's magnetic field, producing a “precipitation” or a variation similar in concept to a current drop in electricity, Major Keyhoe hypothesized that the UFOs would cause continual magnetic precipitations in the zones they were flying over and would draw from them the power needed to stay aloft and move. In short, they could move on a sort of magic and invisible antigravitational carpet which unrolled in front of them and rolled up behind them as they flew along.[5]

Of course the inexhaustible energies of the cosmos, and specifically the direct transformation of the electromagnetic energy of cosmic rays into mechanical energy, was not forgotten among the rash of hypotheses put forward.

In 1953, Lieutenant Plantier was garrisoned at Blida, in Algeria, when his commanding officer, Captain Rougier, saw a flying disc and described it to him, making such an impression that the idea struck Plantier that it might be possible to realize something similar right here on earth. The technical-minded Plantier then sought to work out theoretically a machine capable of executing all the evolutions that had been attributed to flying saucers over a long series of observations. Finding the power sources then available to man to be inadequate, he decided to rely on cosmic rays, which develop far more energy than the complete disintegration of the atomic nucleus—a state impossible to achieve.

In September 1953 he published the results of his theorizing in the magazine Forces Aériennes Françaises under the title “La Propulsion des Soucoupes Volantes par Action Directe sur l’Atome.” Naturally, Plantier avoided sketching out the mechanical arrangements that could put the idea to actual use, considering them to be an undertaking beyond his capabilities. He merely imagined that cosmic radiation passing through the disc—simplistically conceived of in the form of a huge symmetrical biconvex lens surmounted by an elegant hemispherical glass dome—would activate a special internal “field force.” Reacting against the natural magnetic fields, whether terrestrial or sidereal, this field force would annul the force of gravity and inertia, enveloping the aircraft with something definable only as a kind of enormous boundary layer, and would develop those bright lights that keep changing color and so impress and perplex ufologists. The maneuvering of the machine in space would be effectuated by partial or complete masking of the propulsive "force field."[6]

A SERIES OF HOAXES

Thanks to the inexhaustible vein of ideas and speculations opened up by the notion of antigravity, as expounded by ufologists, the inflammable question of the "nationality" of the discs also found easy explanations in the lively imaginations of sensationmongers.

In September 1949 American papers published under large headlines the details of an unprecedented event. An enormous unknown airship had fallen in flames near the Mexican frontier. Buried in the wreckage, a tiny "magnetic radio" emitted incomprehensible signals at regular intervals. Probably—according to one reporter—the Martian base from which the ship had taken off was trying to reestablish contact with the members of the ill-starred expedition. The story went on to say that the body of one of the pilots had been recovered almost intact. He was only about three feet tall. He was humanoid in form, but he had huge eyes without eyelids, tiny pointed ears, and a mouth that protruded but otherwise resembled ours; his head was enormous in comparison to the rest of his body. According to the reporter, the tiny corpse had been promptly sent to the Rosenwald Foundation in Chicago for careful autopsy. The foundation naturally denied the story vehemently. And finally it turned out that the "eyewitness" of the event—and also the only begetter of the sensational news—was a certain Roy L. Dimmick—a salesman for the Apache Powder Company, a gunpowder firm—"a very respectable man from every point of view."[7]

A wild yarn about a disc flown by pilots from Jupiter who were dressed in the style of our great-grandparents got short shrift. Then there was the story that at the beginning of March 1950, in the Chilean Andes, a geographical expedition had found some fragments of a disc-shaped astro-ship that had exploded when it tried to force an entry into our atmosphere. A minor newspaper variant on this story had it that the fragments were found "in a wild region of the Rocky Mountains" and that there was no doubt they came from interstellar space, for "the pieces are made of a still-unidentified metal; moreover, the fact that they were immediately sequestered by a military scientific commission that has since refused to give any sort of report on them proves the importance of the find."

A newspaperman named Perry Heard declared that he encountered four policemen one evening along a deserted road in Missouri. They were taking in a strange dwarf who was babbling in an unknown language into a sort of small oval box. "Perhaps," wrote Heard, "he was a Martian transmitting news of his capture by the Earth people. I wanted to snap a few pictures, but the policemen brusquely ordered me away." Frankly, it must be agreed that this story of a Martian transmitting interplanetary news is a brain wave that tops them all. It was a natural for a freewheeling American reporter.

For a few more months an incredible number of hoaxes of the same sort kept the thick ranks of American UFO buffs in a state of continual agitation, for they were sure that they were in on the most wonderful event of the century. The time was now ripe for writing any sort of "scientific" nonsense. In fact, the so-called Scully Report was born in this atmosphere of hoaxes. It was a collection of improbable revelations put into book form by the humorist Frank Scully, who, however, masked his real professional identity. According to the publisher's preface, the book was actually written by "an American specialist in scientific research." Its first printing of 40,000 copies, which was quickly sold out, brought to every corner of the United States the marvelous story of the little men who came from the planet Venus on a disc-shaped astro-ship propelled by magnetic energy at speeds faster than light.

After the fantastic success of the report, Scully even claimed that the bodies of these little men could be seen in a secret room of the Pentagon preserved in hermetically sealed bottles of alcohol, and that President Truman had taken a personal interest in the matter and had shown privately a number of times a movie film that illustrated the mechanical details of several Venusian interplanetary ships recovered in the middle of the Arizona desert.[8]

NEW ADVANCE UNITS FROM MARS?

Only a few months after the Air Force's easygoing Report No. 102 was written—that is, in the spring of 1950—a third wave of UFO sightings heightened the atmosphere of comedy.

During the first two weeks of February, strange incandescent objects had appeared over Arizona and Florida, over Algeria and Denmark, off the Chilean coast, in the skies of Patagonia, and even over the frozen reaches of the Antarctic, where Captain Augusto Orrego made a number of photographs of three huge flying saucers that spun in echelon in the polar sky above the Arthur Pratt naval base.[9]

In March UFO activity intensified and extended over the entire Western hemisphere, showing special preference for Central America, where their flights over Chihuahua, Durango, and Mexico City were of spectacular proportions.

On March 18 a number of silvery saucers—perhaps twenty—invaded the sky over Farmington, New Mexico, continuously changing speed and direction. H. F. Thatcher, director of the local surveying institute, was able to determine the approximate altitude (fifteen to eighteen miles) and their average speed (between 950 and 1000 mph) by triangulation. For nearly an hour these mysterious flyers crisscrossed the sky in a complex geometric pattern, intent on some unknown mission.

But where on earth or in space had those machines come from? The answer was simple, according to ufologists. From the twenty-third to the twenty-eighth of March, Mars was at its closest distance to earth. These ships were only the advance units of the enormous flotilla of astro-ships that penetrates our atmosphere when Mars is in that position. And in fact, almost as confirmation of this strange idea, sightings of UFOs in the following days grew to an astonishing crescendo.

On March 27, one of those ships, which many people were now inclined to believe really were reconnaissance craft from the "red planet," was seen by a very well-qualified observer. Former civil aviation inspector Bertram Toten came upon the disc at an altitude of about 5000 feet some forty miles from Washington, D.C. At the moment of sighting it was spinning like a top in a slow but steep descent. Afterward he dove in order to follow it, but the unknown object suddenly stopped, wavered slightly and then sharply shot off, climbing, and disappeared into the clouds.

In the routine report he wrote for the authorities, Toten conservatively estimated the disc's speed as it flew off to be in the neighborhood of several hundred miles per hour; he gave its diameter as about thirty-five feet and its thickness in the center as about fifteen feet or perhaps a bit more and reported that it was followed "by a short, luminous misty contrail doubtless produced by some kind of jet engine."

At the end of the bloodless adventure, Toten also noted that he had seen no evidence of aggressive intentions in the behavior of the presumed pilots of the disc, and that "because of its fantastic agility it was impossible to learn anything about what kind of engine it had, whether rocket or turbine, or how it was able to maneuver, since it had no steering surfaces."

At this point, for the nth time, certain American papers wondered whether or not the military authorities were not hiding something—for example, some extraordinary national secret that might indeed be called a "flying saucer."

Taking the ball on the bounce, the well-known radio reporter Henry J. Taylor launched his sensational "trial balloon." On the evening of April 3, 1950, during a broadcast from Los Angeles, what later were sarcastically termed the "Taylor revelations" by ufologists threw the United States into a state of temporary euphoria.

The flying saucers, the well-informed reporter declared, were two types of highly secret American military inventions. The first was a genuine saucer that whistled through the air, could climb to 30,000 feet or more and dive to 1500 feet and disintegrate in the air. These machines were pilotless and varied in size from 18 inches in diameter (like the one found in Galveston Bay, in Texas) to a huge 250 feet, and they had been flying for three years.

The other objects that many people took for flying discs were really "Flying Phantoms," he said; that is, jet planes like the XF-5U that the U.S. Navy had admitted was now in development. They were wingless circular objects that could fly at fantastic speeds. Those who had seen them said they resembled flying cigars, but in fact any circular body that moved at a very high speed would appear to be elongated both because of the trail of air that followed it and because of other complicated optical phenomena.

There were alleged to be several types of flying saucer, just as there were several types of conventional planes, he went on. Experiments on them began on June 25, 1947, and since then the experiments had been conducted on an ever increasing scale. Some were really flat, with the outer edge raised like a saucer or basin turned upside down. Others were thicker at the center, like pies. One of the latter type had been photographed in Wildwood, New Jersey, and had been seen elsewhere. Some were piloted, others were not. They left no contrail or exhaust, gave no exterior indication of their method of propulsion, and were absolutely silent. They could stop momentarily in the air and move off again toward the right or left, fluttering and picking up speed, lazily at first, you might say—as airline pilots had unanimously reported—until they shot off like lightning.

The construction of the flying saucers had gone through several phases of development, reaching its most intense experimental stages coincidentally with the public sightings of July 1947, January 1948, and the present period. At each of these three phases the saucers had become bigger and better.

I know, said Taylor, what these so-called flying saucers are for, but am not at liberty to say what it is, for it is an important and wonderful military secret. When the competent authorities are ready to make the matter known to the public, I will be delighted to tell you the whole story, for it is a fantastic bit of news, something truly wonderful for our country.

The second mystery in our skies had not only been seen, it had been heard, he said. Generally this object hums through the night, with flames coming out of square openings around the edge of the body; at first sight these openings look like windows. This "Flying Phantom" is in reality a huge jet plane that looks like a cake. Its shape is more or less circular and around the edge of the disc is a row of jet exhausts. The engines are inside. In flight, it looks like a flat disc flaming through the air, and its speed is so great that I am not permitted to mention it. This disc is not from Mars or Russia but from Maryland. The U.S. Navy has confirmed it, and I have been authorized to release the news. But any further information must come from the military authorities.

If you find a flying saucer on the ground, he told his audience—which is not very likely, since most of them are made of a material that disintegrates in the air and disappears after a certain period of time—you would find stamped on it in black letters the following words, which were found on the small plate that fell in Texas: "Military secret United States of America Army Air Forces," then a number and this: "Anyone damaging or revealing description or whereabouts of this missile is subject to prosecution by the United States Government. For recovery, call immediately" (here follows a telephone number and the address of a military air base). "Non-explosive." The flying saucers did exist, he added, and that was really good news!

MORE "GOOD NEWS"

After the sensation caused by this story, a U.S. Navy spokesman—one who really was authorized to speak for the Navy—energetically denied that any research or experimentation on types of planes or missiles that could even remotely be mistaken for flying saucers was taking place under Navy auspices.[10]

By a strange coincidence (but is that all it was?), in 1945 McDonnell Aircraft had test-flown the first 500-mile-per-hour jet fighter, known as the Phantom, which was built specifically for the U.S. Navy: the XF-1H, which later received the designation FH-1 and became very well known in aviation circles abroad as the first American carrier-based jet fighter.

In addition, Taylor's XF-50 was identified as the V-173, the Flying Pancake, designed by Charles Zimmerman, which was flown in November 1942 as a test for the production of planes with circular wings for use on aircraft carriers. The perfected experimental version, the XF5U-1, known as The Skimmer, was built in 1944 but was, however, destroyed four years later, unbeknownst to Taylor, during a secret test flight. According to one writer, the intrinsic and incurable aerodynamic instability of low-aspect-ratio wings led the Navy technicians at the time to drop the development of a formula that had been superseded by new developments in wing flaps, and the surviving V-173 ended up in the Naval Air Station in Norfolk, Virginia, where it still lies in storage.[11]

On the heels of the Taylor "revelations," the technical press carried stories on the "total combustion" take-off rockets for heavily loaded planes that had been designed in Germany in 1944 by Professor Hermann Oberth; the sheaths of these rockets were made of nitrate of ammonia and disintegrated in the air after their fuel was spent. Nevertheless, it was immediately apparent that the radio-controlled antiaircraft devices that completely destroyed themselves and that Taylor mentioned in his report were launched from nowhere but his brain.

On April 4, while visiting the military base at Key West, President Truman himself unequivocally denied the Taylor story, declaring that he was completely in the dark as to the alleged facts. From Washington the Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson, doubled the dose, asserting jokingly that he would be delighted to have the department purchase a couple of squadrons of flying saucers if that would help national security in any way. Nevertheless, a few days later Taylor calmly reversed his field, falling back on a much more modest thesis. In a broadcast over the A.B.C. network he declared in effect: Official American denials of the existence of our flying saucers are worth a billion dollars to Russia and its "cold war." It will be a stroke of real luck if the Kremlin does not seize the opportunity to announce that Soviet scientists are launching flying saucers all over the world. With things as they are, the American people will have no other choice than to conclude that the saucers that are regularly sighted are produced by Russia—which is not the case—and that they are concealing in their mysterious womb the danger of a new Pearl Harbor instead of the proof of simple American activities.

The United States, he said, could raise the morale of the peoples of Western Europe, influencing them in its favor, whenever it simply declared that it had no other comment to make aside from the fact that America was creating a number of useful, if incredible, instruments. These were not dangerous instruments but good news for peace-loving peoples.

Near Minneapolis and elsewhere in the country, he said, we had for some time been launching balloons for the study of cosmic rays, enormous translucent things made of plastic that on the ground were only a hundredth of their size. At high altitudes expansion causes a balloon to blow itself up into a gigantic monster a hundred feet tall and seventy feet in diameter, as tall as an eight-story building, all in pulsating plastic. At an altitude of 100,000 feet some of these come under the influence of the high winds of the stratosphere and reach speeds of two hundred miles per hour. At sunset, because of their great height, they remain illuminated, assuming a reddish tint. The rays of the sun, angling upward and illuminating their undersides, give the balloons the appearance of flat, circular objects that are burning and flying in the sky.

Their instruments, Taylor reported, are then returned to earth by means of parachutes while the sphere, its job done, explodes and the large pieces of plastic material that fall to the ground cause great astonishment when they are found. The instrument basket has flashing lights that can be seen at incredible distances. These were apparatuses in normal use, he said, and he could not understand why the Air Force could not openly discuss them!

This statement—also appearing under the label of "good news"—brought to public knowledge the thesis of Professor Urner Liddel of the U.S. Navy's Research and Study Office, who claimed that the mysterious flying saucers were nothing other than the Navy's Skyhook balloons. The idea was not new, but the type of balloon was.

Yes, confirmed Professor Liddel, who at the time was in charge of the nuclear physics branch of the Office of Naval Research, the flying saucers were really blown-up balloons in the true sense of the word. They were simply the so-called Skyhook balloons used for research into cosmic rays. Nothing was more likely than that Captain Mantell had lost his life following one of these balloons.[12]

All these highly placed authorities entering the picture had the effect of leading many Americans to the inner conviction that "in spite of everything" the denials really threw a smokescreen over the existence of some American secret weapon.

On May 23 a Gallup Poll established the following: 92 percent of Americans still believed in Taylor's version of the flying saucers; 5 percent thought they were extraterrestrial; and three percent believed they were Russian.

The view that military circles supported—namely, that the UFOs did not exist—could not have been more thoroughly rejected.

Following the disappearance of the mysterious airships toward the end of 1950, the stocks of the most obstinate proponents of the Martian theory collapsed because all during the spring they had imprudently maintained that the space explorers would surely soon land. June came and the explorers remained completely indifferent and idle even in the face of the outbreak of the Korean War.

The failure of the American flying saucers to appear on the battlefields of Korea, when their intervention might have averted the hasty retreat of the American expeditionary force toward the port of Fusan, caused the percentage of Americans who believed that the U.S. Air Force had secret arsenals to fall practically to zero.

In the general confusion, the theory of an extraterrestrial source for the UFOs gained a few points. By consulting old almanacs and medieval chronicles, interpreting ancient myths in the most personal way, and rummaging among the dusty files of old newspapers, a number of "scholars" then discovered that more than once in the chronicles of the distant past there were references to the transient appearance of mysterious shining flying bodies. During 1951 this discovery allowed the ufologists to pass over their recent cropper in silence and to proclaim to the four winds that "flying saucers have visited the earth before and they are almost as old as mankind itself—perhaps even older!"

ALLEGED UFOS IN THE PAST

One of the first people to occupy himself in studies of celestial phenomena was Charles H. Fort, who died in 1932, fifteen years before the term "flying saucer" came into use. Having spent his life compiling books of strange air stories, he was convinced that supernatural beings from other worlds had visited earth through the centuries.

Today ufologists consider Charles Hoy Fort as a sort of illustrious precursor, so much so that in order to honor his memory (and to reap financial returns) his literary labors have been reprinted in a huge volume under the title The Books of Charles Fort.

It would be pointless to give here an example of the prose of this honorary ufologist, for the evidence he gives is of more interest to the investigators of ordinary celestial phenomena. But his methods of interpretation and research, transferred to the present day, have influenced many, among them, for example, the British writer Harold T. Wilkins, an avant-garde ufologist-archeologist-mythologist. In his heavily documented collection Wilkins has managed to list several hundred alleged UFO sightings in the past, the oldest of which goes back to 222 B.C.[13] On the basis of the same criteria, the American ufologist Desmond Leslie was the first to extend the "genealogy" of the UFOs to the remotest and most legendary times of prehistory.[14]

It is not very difficult to tear down the enormous edifice of ancient evidence that the ufologists have constructed. Examples prior to the eighteenth century are too vague to have any significance or determining importance and—if seriously examined—can be quite easily explained by ascribing them, case by case, to the appearance of ball or pearlitic lightning, multiple meteorites or the fall of large aerolites, to the sudden formation of lenticular clouds, or to some rare phenomenon of atmospheric mirage inexplicable to the ancients.

Almost all the more recent evidence falls perfectly in the area of the historical development of aerostatics.

If we add to this the fact that ufologists have often knowingly altered the texts of old accounts in order to better adapt them to their own ends,[15] we must agree that, despite the newness and complexity of the UFO problem, it was not necessary to expend so much imagination. Human technology, especially when directed by the military—who, within broad limits, don't have to worry about money—has advanced much more than seems apparent or than is publicly known. And we must also admit that there was no reason to think up forms of propulsion capable of shifting at will and to their own advantage the so-called "neutral point" that exists between the various planets.[18]

Some ufologists, seduced by the idea that this "neutral point" actually exists, have indeed proposed starting practical research into the field of antigravity propulsion; and some ingenuous experiments have been carried out with "promising" results—promising only because of the enthusiastic researchers' happy ignorance of certain physical laws.

It was maintained that levitation as practiced by mediums is without doubt a verified physical phenomenon and that it acts against the force of gravity. We know very well—the enthusiasts proclaimed—that long ascetic practice and possibly some still-unknown drug can induce it in normal subjects as well, and who knows but what this may not be precisely the right way to arrive at the formulation of the mysterious basic laws of antigravitational flight, just as the study of the flight of birds revealed to man the first rudiments of mechanical flight![17]

In any case, even though a number of world powers were already beginning to conduct special research into subatomic particles in order to isolate hypothetical "gravitone"—research that was undoubtedly serious but that still has not yielded any practical results—in the field of this new science (called electrogravitics in the United States), the evidence for antigravity as the means of propulsion for the discs was completely negative at the beginning of 1952.

PRELIMINARY RECAPITULATION

In the spring, when the UFOs reappeared over a number of states and over neighboring Canada and Mexico, the press as usual gave a good deal of publicity to the most clear-cut episodes.

The argument over whether they were Martian discs or Soviet discs—the United States having now been ruled out—started up again, and the investigation that had gone under the successive names of projects Sign, Grudge, and Twinkle was hurriedly exhumed and given the conventional unromantic name of Project Blue Book.

The direction of the new inquiry was taken over by the Air Technical Intelligence Center (A.T.I.C.) of Wright-Patterson Field, which proclaimed that it wanted to get "to the bottom of the question."

For a start, more than 1300 sightings reported between the fateful June 24, 1947, and March 25, 1952, were carefully reexamined, with the result that: "23.54 percent of the reports speak of disc or spherical shapes; 8.25 percent of spindle shapes resembling cigars or rockets; 2.55 percent of flying wings; 0.6 percent of groups of lights." Whence it was deduced that "38 percent (of the sightings) can be attributed to astronomical or atmospheric phenomena; 13 percent to research balloons; 22 percent to flocks of migratory birds or airplanes flying in the stratosphere; 10 percent to other phenomena that cannot be explained because not enough details were reported; and 15 percent to unexplainable phenomena."

While the preparatory work for the new inquiry was getting under way fast and furiously in the offices of the A.T.I.C., for the fourth time unknown flying bodies began to reappear, the sightings growing in intensity with a frightening rhythm.

It is at this point that the first "contactees" appear, that is, those fortunate mortals who boasted of being in friendly communication with the superhuman visitors from space by means of direct contact, telepathy, light signals, or small personal radio transmitters. And the story of the supposed extraterrestrial origin of the UFOs became terribly complicated.

NOTES

1. See article in the magazine Ali (Milan), May 12, 1952. And cf. American press reports, March 29, 1950: Pilots John Power and Miguel Angel Delgado of the Venezuelan Air Lines encountered over Caracas a mysterious flying body resembling an enormous tortoise surrounded by whirling gases. Quickly approaching their DC-3, it passed by, nearly touching the plane. The air turbulence was so violent that Power, who for a moment was afraid that they were going to be hit by the "tortoise," was able to keep the plane on its course only with great difficulty and with a quick acrobatic maneuver. (Clearly a supersonic shock wave was formed on the wing involved as the object flew past and was caused by the differences in speed between the aircraft and the propulsive jets of the "tortoise.")

2. In 1932 Caldwell had built a full-size flying model of a plane with circular wing of the "parasol" type, so called because it was raised above the fuselage. The first product of the Glen Burnie "factory" was an agile and interesting machine for the time, but it had the advantages and, above all, the serious defects of all low-aspect-ratio wings—lateral instability. Its characteristics were tested the following year by Professor J. Owen Evans in the large wind tunnel in Los Angeles. Then the noted American flyer Jimmy Doolittle flew it and established its modest speeds (top speed of 97 mph, landing speed of 23 mph). Thereupon the builder optimistically announced to the press the future preparation of a plane with a circular wing thirty-five feet in diameter, fifty tons in weight and with a speed of 225 mph, which would be followed by a "flying circle," with a wing diameter of seventy-five feet and thirty tons in weight, for transatlantic flights. In the meantime he had constructed a slightly modified second prototype that ruined him. In 1936 it crashed, killing the test pilot. After this incident Caldwell could no longer find any pilot willing to fly his strange machines. He unsuccessfully tried to interest the armed forces and a number of aircraft companies in his projects. In 1940, before leaving Glen Burnie, he gloomily told Evans that only the lack of $5,000 stood between him and "an astonishing result." (Could it have been a kind of helicopter with a central cabin and contrarotating rotors?)

3. Later on, one member of the Jekams expedition who was interviewed by the press let slip a detail that the investigatory authorities had classified as "top secret": during the entire period of the strange "dances" the Geiger counters "kept on clicking, picking up repeated signs of intensified radioactivity in the area." The hypothesis that the three UFOs had refueled with some invisible energy—obviously still unknown to science —gushing from the top of the mountain, as ufologists later declared, or that the craft had carried out "a complex operation of electrostatic diselectrification, assisted in this perhaps by the weakness of natural radioactivity of the local lava," as suggested by another member of the expedition, must be excluded. On the other hand, it is possible that the aircraft one by one dumped atomic slag or "ashes" that were somehow related to the propulsion system of the devices, or to the operating cycle of UFOs in general, into the crater of the extinct volcano or into some deep neighboring crevasse. That would also explain the "dance" in the air, which would have been started by weight shifts of the mass in the air and the crosswind. (Professor Jekams reported that an annoying wind was blowing that day.) Turning partially on themselves (the propulsion band), those enormous masses were doubtless subject to the violent phenomena of gyroscopic precession. Like gigantic tops the aircraft spontaneously oscillated in the air in order to dampen the forces disturbing their hovering above the mountain receptacle.

4. See Gerald Heard, The Riddle of the Flying Saucers (London, Caroll and Nicholson, 1950). By applications of the well-known laws of electrophysics, Heard seriously thought that he had solved the mystery, or rather the various mysteries, of the UFOs. (Coming from the two moons of Mars, piloted by a sort of superintelligent bee, they had been carrying on a discreet strategic reconnaissance of the earth for at least a couple of centuries.)

5. See Donald H. Keyhoe, The Flying Saucers Are Real (New York, Fawcett Publications, 1950); Flying Saucers from Outer Space (New York, Henry Holt and Co., 1953); The Flying Saucer Conspiracy (New York, Henry Holt and Co., 1955).

6. The French ufologist Aimé Michel—a fanatical supporter of Plantier and the author of The Truth about Flying Saucers (New York, Criterion, 1956), a book especially rich in reports of UFO sightings throughout the world—calls this mechanical reduction in the force field "decentering" and explains it as follows: This reduction "would be accomplished by means of a movable screen, which would nullify or attenuate the effect of the field on the surface covered by it. Since the ionization effects would vary according to the field strength, the position of the screen would be visible from the outside—to any observer on the ground, for instance. The spot in question could be seen quite clearly on a photograph taken on July 18, 1952, by the geologist Fregnale in the vicinity of Lake Chauvet" (p. 204). Simple reasoning reveals that the explanation has no basis: if the aircraft, engine, and passengers are permeated by the force of the field, only a miraculous and very special substance can disengage them from its influence. Moreover, the "Plantier screen" reminds us of the solution Wells thought up in The First Men on the Moon to regulate and render inactive his famous "cavorite." He, however, was writing an adventure story, and in an adventure story anything goes. Although ufology has for the most part become a frivolous science or science fiction, UFOs are certainly not subjects limited to novels. The Plantier screen has, therefore, the same scientific basis that cavorite and Newtonium have. In fact, starting from the assumption of new transuranium substances produced in physicists' laboratories, one American ufologist proposed some years ago that the synthetic element capable of neutralizing the earth's attraction be called Newtonium. "An element that is still completely unknown to us," he hastened to add, "but undoubtedly well known to our Brothers in Space for some time." While waiting for our brothers to decide to let us in on the secret of their productive process, it might be a good idea to call the hypothetical antigravity element with the more appropriate name of Unobtainium, as the technicians of the U.S. Air Force University in Maxwell, Alabama, ironically proposed for this sort of futuristic chimera. Cf. also Dr. D. C. Peaslee, "The Nonexistence of Gravity Shields," Science (Washington, Vol. CXXIX, No. 1292, 1956).

9. Despite the Chilean authorities' ban on the publication of the photographs, which is still in effect, this sighting led the American ufologist Gray Barker to launch the "Antarctic Theory," which hypothesizes that the extraterrestrial explorers had chosen that remote part of the planet far from prying eyes for their way-station. See Gray Barker, They Knew Too Much about Flying Saucers, (New York, University Books, Inc., 1956).

10. And in fact the letters XF (which in 1950 stood for "experimental fighter") with a numerical designation greater than a unit did not even belong to the Navy but to the Air Force! In addition, the real XF-50 was an old experimental model produced by Grumman, with a piston engine, a propeller, and a lengthened nose; in other words, a modified Grumman Skyrocket.

12. In February 1951, Professor Liddel, publishing his theory in Look, pointed out that launches of Skyhooks had always been kept secret, and that the first balloons of this type had been released in 1947, precisely when the first flying saucers also appeared. A truly perfect coincidence. These statements immediately received the unconditional approval of military circles, which for obvious reasons could not support the adherents of the extraterrestrial source theory.

16. As suggested by the American ufologist M. K. Jessup, for whom the “saucerians” are the inhabitants of a number of artificial satellites that have been in permanent orbit for centuries at the neutral point of gravity between the earth and the moon. See his The Case for the UFO (New York, Citadel Press, 1955). After two decades of tight military secrecy and a decade of profound ufological studies of Mars and Venus, the planets which were first proposed as the most probable starting bases for the UFOs, we now have, with just about as much foundation, the following: Saturn or its principal moon Titan; Jupiter’s third satellite, Ganymede, populated by people who are said to live on bacterial cultures now being depleted; the remote twin to earth, Uranus, or some other of the still unknown “dark planets” that perhaps gravitate beyond the orbit of Pluto; an earth belonging to the hypothetical planetary cortege of Wolf 359 or the extragalactic planet Clarion, ruled by an admirable matriarchy; the moon with its legendary troglodytes; lunar caverns where Nazi scientists who evaded capture by the Allies have their last refuge; other Nazi survivors developing their final “secret weapons” in the frozen Antarctic or in the solitude of remote regions of Patagonia or, again, in the impenetrable forests of the Gran Chaco or the Mato Grosso; the unplumbed depths of Time, the Fourth Dimension, with future Humanity that now explores its most remote past; the “wanderers of space,” that is, the inhabitants of the destroyed planet Hsiu-chiu, a part of whom reached the earth in prehistoric times and populated present-day China; the star space explorers (sideranthropoi) who left the star Proxima Centauri centuries ago; the research voyagers hailing from Macrocosmos, a complex of “stellar systems” forming an organic whole of which our solar system is but a living “atomic cell”; the immaterial Ethereans living in the Fifth Dimension or in the burning shell of the sun; the Uranians coming from the outer edges of our planetary system or a highly evolved pre-Flood humanity (of the Atlantan or Lemurian or Tyrhennian race) that escaped its fate by flying into space; the biblical fallen angels; the descendants of the Incas who took refuge in impenetrable recesses of the Peruvian Andes with the secret of a primordial form of superenergy obtained from volcanoes; the mythical "Children of the Red Earth" living beneath the Amazon jungle; the Hindu telemobile, the duracapalam launched into Hyperspace by mental energy and in behalf of a mysterious oriental sect. . . . And the list of these delirious ravings could be continued at length. When there are no concrete details that permit us to make a sound evaluation of the facts, any discussion, whether serious, semi-serious, or facetious, can without distinction aspire to the honor of being an "hypothesis."

The True Story of Project Blue Book

At the beginning of June the A.T.I.C. was forced, albeit unwillingly, to face the “big flap” of 1952. In Pentagon jargon, according to Edward Ruppelt, a flap is a condition, situation, or mental state of a group of persons that is characterized by an advanced stage of confusion which has not yet reached panic proportions.

In fact, a flood of reports engulfed the A.T.I.C. experts. By December 31 there were 2018 reports, not counting sightings that were reported only to local newspapers and those from foreign countries. Were the American people—indeed, the whole of humanity—perhaps showing unmistakable signs of progressive mental imbalance? Or were flotillas of disc-shaped space ships really intensifying their exploratory missions?

Even the high command of the U.S. Air Force had to take the problem seriously, simply because some of the detailed reports ("good UFO reports") had come and were continuing to come from far-off Korea, where military operations were taking a somewhat critical turn. More than one American pilot had encountered fast, silvery spheres or flaming aircraft with the strange roundish shape, and radar installations in Japan, on Okinawa, and in South Korea had repeatedly picked up unknown objects flying at high speeds. Comets? Self-propelled devices that the Russians had supplied to the Chinese and North Koreans? Or were they the notorious UFOs that serious people had relegated to the realm of fantasy?

No intense meteor activity was reported in June. The Aquarids shower (July 28) did not coincide with the bulk of the sightings reported, and, as we know, meteors are extremely punctual. Well, then, were the aircraft devices manufactured behind the Urals? The Air Force regarded this possibility with deep-seated skepticism. How could Russia, which was just taking its first steps in the area of modern aeronautics, have already developed such things?

Nevertheless, those "things" continued to crisscross "Western" skies, sorely trying the patience of those who should have been able to puncture the myth, which was particularly galling to the U.S. Air Force because it threatened its proclaimed air supremacy at a time when Soviet MIG-15 fighters on the Korean front had demonstrated that they were superior to the American planes.

The content of the reports was often disconcerting and sometimes even annoying. Different witnesses rarely gave the same descriptions of the UFOs: they were shaped like a ball, or they looked like falling stars, or they were flying triangles or rhombuses, or they floated in the air like jellyfish, or they were shapeless . . .

With justifiable consternation the A.T.I.C. personnel wondered how it was possible for a mechanical, metallic device not to have a well-defined and definite shape. How could it change so rapidly from a jellyfish into a comet and then into a sphere and a rhomboid and finally just fade away into something without any definite contours?

A "GOOD UFO REPORT"

One event in particular attracted the experts' attention. It took place on July 14 in Virginia, a few miles from Newport News, near Norfolk. The eyewitnesses were two veteran pilots of Pan American Airways, W. B. Nash and W. H. Fortenberry.

At 9:12 P.M. six large, silvery discs, proceeding horizontally in echelon, with the lead ship (or presumed squadron leader) on the bottom, appeared over the horizon and were soon within a mile of a DC-4 which was flying to Miami at an altitude of about 8000 feet. The objects were perfectly circular from plane view, and about seventy-five feet in diameter; they appeared to be enveloped in large reddish halos that at times changed to orange streaked with red, and they glowed like red-hot coals.

With the aid of a Dalton Mark 7 computer, the American pilots calculated that the formation was flying at a speed a little better than a thousand miles an hour.

Having evidently sighted the DC-4, the leading disc suddenly slowed and its glow dimmed markedly. The two farthest discs continued at high speed, catching up with the lead ship, as if their order to execute the maneuver had been received a bit late. At the same instant the lead ship flipped over on its edge and changed course. Immediately the five other discs imitated it in unison, clearly revealing their conformation—that of a sort of shallow cone with a maximum width of about fifteen feet in the center.

After another abrupt change in direction—of more than 150 degrees—their light grew brighter as if due to a sudden increase in propulsive force, and in fact they quickly removed themselves from the path of the DC-4, resuming their horizontal position and their curious echelon formation.

Moving westward, the formation was joined by two other discs that had been hovering at a lower altitude during the whole of the strange maneuvers, as if waiting for some specific command. In the few seconds during which they speeded up to reach the formation, they gave off a red glow that was brighter than usual.

Suddenly all the discs went dark, and a few seconds later, when they became bright again, the eight machines appeared in an even line. At this point, accompanied by a series of short, regular, blinding flashes, the formation climbed for about 3000 feet and finally disappeared rapidly toward the west.

"They are piloted!" some newspapers wrote. "Or at least many of the ships must be piloted, and the probability that this is correct increases the bigger the machines get."

In addition, some ufologists called attention—correctly, for once—to the fact that the evolutions the discs went through seemed to rule out the possibility that they were radio-controlled or had special electronic sighting or repulse devices. For with the radio impulses traveling at the enormous velocity of 186,000 miles per second, the craft would have had to be spaced at intervals of about a hundred yards or so; if not, carrying out strictly simultaneous maneuvers would have been impossible. For if, let us suppose, the receiver of one of the discs had not been properly tuned, the delay in the answering maneuver would then have had to show up during successive maneuvers also. Instead, as we have seen, the discs flipped on their edges in unison.

UFOS OVER WASHINGTON

On April 17, 1952, near the Canadian air base of North Bay in Ontario, several "red spheres" flew by at supersonic speeds and subsequently crossed over some of the southeastern states at the same high speeds.

The next day air defense headquarters for the eastern United States released a statement to the press from Newburgh, N.Y., saying that the detection system had developed a "pattern of unknowns in both the northeast and northwest which appeared potentially dangerous." An alert had been ordered when unexplained vapor trails were sighted at a high altitude near Nome, Alaska. Later, the period of emergency was lifted after the "unknowns" were identified.

No details were furnished as to the identification. Who had involuntarily caused that—fortunately groundless—fear that aggression was coming from the sky? And with what kinds of machines? And for what reasons?[1]

This haphazard approach to vigilance, if we can call it that, on the part of the American authorities did not, however, last long, and a foretaste of what was to come took place on July 17.

That night the radar installation at the Denver airfield sent its exploratory beams into the sky and caught a distant group of “things” moving along the horizon at a speed of nearly 3000 mph. Alerted by radio, Captain Paul L. Carpenter, flying an American Airlines DC-6, turned down his cockpit lights and waited. Shortly afterward four bright objects sped by at a fantastic speed. They were at his altitude, about 25,000 feet and a few miles off.

Three days of relative quiet obtained and then “incredible” things happened—incredible to the men at the A.T.I.C.

At 12:40 A.M. on July 20, the radar screen at the C.A.A. traffic control center in Washington, D.C., revealed the presence of eight unknown objects flying at about 100 to 130 mph in the vicinity of Andrews Air Force Base, in Maryland, about fifteen miles southwest of the capital. From time to time the radar blips showed that the objects shifted course rapidly, often moving against the wind, and that when they climbed, they rose absolutely vertically. The possibility that it was a squadron of jet fighters could, therefore, be ruled out. Toward one o’clock the blips disappeared as suddenly as they had appeared (that is, they moved out of the area covered by the radar beam), only to reappear some minutes later in the northwest, over the capital.

The controller on duty then informed Senior Controller Harry G. Barnes. He was skeptical concerning these moving lights in particular and UFOs in general. At the time he supported the ideas of Professor Menzel, author of a clever if useless theory that the saucers were “mirages caused by thermal inversion.” Barnes insisted on personally checking the radar apparatus and found that it was functioning perfectly.

During this interval the control tower at the National Airport also got a fix on the mysterious apparitions and computed their speed, finding that one of them had flown through the upper stratosphere for about eight miles at the astonishing speed of 7200 mph.[2]

Some of the lights suddenly seemed to swoop down over the White House, the Capitol, and the Pentagon, areas prohibited to overflights. A number of people working on the outskirts of the airport later agreed that there was a large, round glowing object followed by others flying at higher altitudes, all variously colored and flying toward the south.

A WELL-GROUNDED SUSPICION

Two jet fighters that were immediately sent out from New Castle, Delaware, ranged through the sky over Washington unsuccessfully looking for the "lights." But they meanwhile had disappeared from the radar screens, probably because they rose vertically to a very great altitude when the fighters arrived. After the fighters returned to the base the lights reappeared, "dancing in the air like young deer."

At this point Barnes had the distinct impression that the mysterious visitors were able to hear and understand him when he radioed the pilots to intercept the objects, because more than once the UFOs darted away as soon as he gave their exact position.

Receiving a radio message about the strange things in the sky, Captain H. Dermott, who was piloting a civilian plane toward the capital, caught sight of an intense white light of vaguely globular shape following him at a distance in the dark. Then when it "saw" that the plane was coming in for a landing, the shining phantom sped off at a high rate of speed.

Strange things were also seen from the ground. At 5:30 a radio engineer named E. W. Chambers watched the evolutions of five huge, clearly circular objects that "shone like headlights in fog" and crisscrossed the sky in a loose formation over the outskirts of Washington. For no apparent reason they suddenly climbed and disappeared in the night. It was then—that is, shortly before dawn—that the squadrons of luminous bodies finally disappeared from the radar screens as well.

During the next two days there were no local reports of UFOs, but during the night of July 22–23 a number of objects passed over several states in New England, giving off a silvery glow in the moonlight. For three days there were no new sightings; but at 9:08 P.M. on July 26 the sky over the District of Columbia was again favored with stratospheric incursions.

Twelve unknown objects suddenly arrived from the northeast and the radar of the C.A.A. control center picked them up lazily cruising at about forty miles an hour, an unusually low speed even for ordinary aircraft—stalling speed, in fact.

At first the C.A.A. staff thought a swarm of weather balloons had been caught by a current of air and were accidentally crossing over the city. They were soon disabused of this notion. The pilots of a plane that happened to be flying by radioed that the “balloons” flew off rapidly as the plane approached, almost as though they were afraid they would be attacked. Besides, they weren’t balloons, but white-hot objects.

Again the base at New Castle fielded a pair of jets that sped toward Washington. The first one flew toward a white globular mass that was giving off a blinding brightness, but when the pilot came within a half mile of it the light mysteriously went out and he flew about in the dark looking for the elusive light.

At 10:30 the second fighter just as unsuccessfully followed three bluish globes; then he followed five others that had turned completely white in the meantime. As on the preceding Saturday, at dawn the UFO formation suddenly climbed away and did not reappear.

UFOS RETURN EN MASSE

On July 28 the radar screens in the capital caught no evidence of any unknown object. The scene of the new story this time was the Great Lakes area, near the Canadian border. At 2:30 A.M. Ground Control Intercept (G.C.I.) radar at the Osceola military base in Wisconsin caught a number of shining objects of indiscernible shape flying at a slow sixty miles an hour in a loose formation at about 80,000 feet, east of St. Paul, Minnesota.

The enthusiasm of the pilots who bravely took off to hunt down the slow invaders soon changed to disappointment. As soon as they became aware that the jets had taken off, the UFOs accelerated in a few seconds to over 600 mph and easily outdistanced the American fighters, vanishing toward Canada. Everything returned to normal for that day.

And that day only. For between 1:30 and 6:00 A.M. on July 29 Senior Controller Barnes noticed with annoyance that the notorious "lights" were reappearing over Washington in numbers varying from eight to twelve at the same instant.

Flying at 100 to 110 mph, they swarmed about within a radius of about ten miles in the air space between Andrews Air Force Base and Herndon, Virginia.

At 3:00 A.M. the blips disappeared from the radar screens, and instead there appeared the characteristic blip of a large transport plane heading for the field.[3] Informed of what was happening on their course, the pilots of the Constellation could only report that the sky was utterly empty, although visibility at the time extended for a radius of at least fifteen miles. Again the craft had made themselves invisible by climbing perpendicularly into the stratosphere. They did not come down again, probably having completed their mission.

During the day isolated discs also appeared over other parts of the United States, and twice they overflew the experimental atomic center of Los Alamos, New Mexico, at a very high altitude.

The A.T.I.C. thus was able to collect a conspicuous body of evidence that had been set down by observers free of any sort of censorship. Other equally accurate and important evidence came at the beginning of August.

The lunar eclipse of the night of August 5–6 had been over for a few hours when a large number of UFOs giving off the usual changing light again crossed over Washington. A spokesman for Andrews Air Base later declared that they had been observed "unmistakably" on local radar screens shortly before midnight, flying about for a considerable time before the eyes of a large crowd of observers, and that the fighters that were sent up from two fields in the vicinity had unsuccessfully tried to intercept the shining objects. But they were flying too high and too fast.

These nocturnal appearances of moving, lighted objects were, in any case, about to come to a close, at least over America. Early on the morning of August 20, the radar screen at Congaree Air Base in South Carolina picked up the track of a very fast UFO about sixty miles away. Flying a perfectly straight course and covering seventy miles in a minute (over 4000 mph), this late-appearing UFO showed how eager it was to regain its base. It was the last to be seen in that series of sightings.

Since the UFOs had not dropped anything explosive or damaging to the interests of the United States (i.e., neither bombs nor subversive propaganda sheets), the public once again quickly forgot them, and the newspapers gave their time and attention to the many leaks concerning Project Ivy, which was preparing the first American H-bomb.

Thus the A.T.I.C. could proceed undisturbed in winnowing out all the material it had collected. Besides, even outside U.S. Air Force circles, the hypothesis advanced by the astronomer Donald H. Menzel a few months before was then receiving some favor.[4] The idea that the UFOs were only mirages caused by temperature inversions had come along at the right moment. Everything was accounted for, and all the lights—disembodied, of course—that had appeared over Washington during those summer nights were nonchalantly explained as balloons reflecting the moonlight or as recurrent mirages. After all, according to the most reliable local meteorologists, masses of cold air from Canada had reached the environs of Washington a number of times during that period, thus creating "the proper conditions for temperature inversions."[5]

POLICY GAPS IN THE A.T.I.C.

One does not know whether to believe the Air Force's top-ranking officers when they repeatedly profess their ignorance of UFO matters. It is certain, however, as Captain Ruppelt states so frankly in his volume on the work of the A.T.I.C., that at the beginning Project Blue Book did not deviate a fraction of an inch from the policy directives that had shaped the previous fruitless military inquiries.[6]

In fact, the staff reexamined all the intelligence reports on the Nazis' latest aeronautical experiments in order to establish whether the further development of any of these projects could have resulted in a type of aircraft having precisely the characteristics ascribed to the flying saucers. The essential data were then submitted to the aerodynamics experts at the Wright Field Aircraft Laboratory and to the best-known aircraft designers for their judgment, along with the anxious routine question: "Could the Russians have further developed these ideas?"

"No," they were reassuringly answered in each instance. "At present there is no possibility of making flying machines that can maneuver in the air like the UFOs."[7]

The Air Force's Aeromedical Laboratory added the weight of its authoritative opinion: "If piloted aircraft of this sort were constructed, the human body would not be able to withstand the violent accelerations reported by various witnesses."

The personnel at the A.T.I.C. boasted of being the immediate successors if not the heirs of the Air Matériel Command T-2 Intelligence Office, a secret organization that during the war had developed "highly efficient methods for getting all kinds of technical information on enemy aircraft production." But if the UFOs were really space ships commanded by a race of supermen, or, even worse, beings completely different from ourselves—as Captain Ruppelt quite properly suggested—all the ingenious procedures that T-2 had worked out would have been perfectly useless.

From the specific point of view of the UFO question there was, however, another and much more serious gap in the powers and conduct of the A.T.I.C. It continued, in fact, to concern itself with enemy aircraft production or, to spell it out, with the United States' only large potential enemy, the Eastern bloc. And what about the other world powers? England, for example? Only statesmen have the power to form alliances and issue ultimatums. Military men, however, have the indelicate and difficult but necessary duty of knowing everything about everyone, for today's friend may, through unusual circumstance, not be tomorrow's or he may even go over to the camp of the adversary.

It is astonishing, therefore, that in reviewing German war inventions the A.T.I.C. did not remember that certain inventions were missing from the list of booty of German inventiveness that had been transferred to the United States. These inventions had been lost track of since the earliest days of the Nazi defeat.

To cite a few examples: Where were the designs of the gigantic A-14 multistage torpedo rocket? Or the blueprints for the piloted, rocket-engined Triebflügel? Who got hold of the plans of the "H.M.B. radio-immobilizer," whose heavy and still unperfected machinery was destroyed by the Germans themselves at Frankfurt-am-Main, just as it was to receive its first field test, because of the sudden collapse of the Rhine front? The working model of the first rocket turbine powered with liquid air and the anti-radar Feuerball device that had already been secretly used in battle were also both missing from the list. Again, how can anyone seriously think that the meticulous German researches on the "control of the boundary layer in its application to high speed aircraft" would not have found someone capable of recognizing its value?

To judge from appearances, then, in 1946 the experts of the A.T.I.C. had not divined the importance of British statements —exceedingly brief but, be it noted, official—mentioning that certain new types of "frighteningly fast" airplanes that would "astonish the world" were in an advanced state of preparation. The A.T.I.C. should have indexed, weighed, and analyzed these statements word by word.[8]

A good investigator would not have missed the special significance of all those reports that showed that the UFOs consistently flew a general course in the direction of western Canada. Is it possible that they were completely in the dark as to the "rumors" that had been circulating years before in Ottawa, Toronto, and Vancouver about the erection of aircraft centers in the semipopulated, forested areas of western Canada? Obviously when one hides something so carefully, one is hiding something important.

In any case, at the beginning of August 1952, 40 percent of the reports that reached Project Blue Book were stamped "unknown."

The contributions from certain foreign areas (France, England, and South America), where American military attachés collected reports of local flights for the Air Force, were not insignificant. Nevertheless, Captain Ruppelt says that these reports were neither investigated nor considered, because Blue Book had its hands full with its own. This was a strange attitude. While denying categorically that the UFOs were aircraft built somewhere on earth, the A.T.I.C. wanted to limit the sensational phenomenon of the UFOs (real or imaginary) to the United States.

The best sightings—best because of the wealth and novelty of the details reported—had been and would continue to be precisely those from foreign countries. The A.T.I.C. rejected them deliberately. Given the irrational basis of the investigation, the "big flap" was doomed to turn into a big flop.

RADAR DOESN'T LIE

"Flying discs: radar's gone crazy too! U.S. Air Force experts have established that the bright images mistaken for mysterious flying machines are produced by a rare but natural phenomenon of atmospheric refraction," an illustrated weekly proclaimed in August 1952.

Actually radar hadn't gone crazy. Instead, people who did not believe that the UFOs existed irrationally and hastily tried to pass radar off as error-prone in order to buttress their own inability to interpret observed facts correctly. Indeed, radar was too smart for that; it allowed a photographic film to register one of its UFO blips—strangely enough, for the A.T.I.C. experts—that had precisely all the characteristics of the UFOs, which, in any case, had already been photographed a number of times.

Ufologists, who are not extraordinarily subtle, accept all the material furnished by a score or so of episodes as authentic. Science rejects the lot. The attitude of the U.S. Air Force remains that of the "Fact Sheet" distributed to the press by the Department of Defense at the beginning of 1954 concerning certain "unusual aerial phenomena," which concludes with the following unqualified negation:

"The Air Force does not possess photographs which prove the existence of ‘flying saucers.’ Because still photographs can be so easily faked, either by using a mock-up or model against a legitimate background, or by retouching the negative, they are practically worthless as evidence. Innumerable objects, from ash-trays to wash basins, have been photographed while sailing through the air. Many such photos have been published without revealing the true identity of the objects.

“More attention is given to moving pictures of unidentified flying objects since they are more difficult to fake. However, only a very few movie-type films have been received by the Air Force and they reveal only pinpoints of light moving across the sky. The Air Force has been unable to identify the source of these lights. The images are too small to analyze properly. Since ownership of these films remains with the persons taking them the Air Force is not in a position to give them out. The owners may do with them as they please.” Too fast and furious, O iconoclast!

Captain Ruppelt had, in fact, among other things, subjected two fragments of movie film known as the “Montana Movie” and the “Tremonton Movie” (called the U-Film in A.T.I.C. circles) to the photographic laboratories of the Air Force at Wright-Patterson and of the Navy at Anacostia.

The first had been filmed by Nick Mariana, manager of the Great Falls baseball team, on August 15, 1950. Two large white lights had rapidly crossed a cloudless sky, one above and behind the other. Since it turned out that some F-94 fighters had flown over the other side of the city, the experts of Project Grudge—set up to continue the work of Project Sign, which had been dissolved—filed away the report, stating that it had been produced by reflections from the exhausts or the wings of the fighters. A kind of artificial parhelion.

Reexamined in 1952 at the request of the Pentagon, the hypothesis that the fighter planes had anything to do with the production of the phenomenon collapsed for various reasons. The true nature of the two moving spots remained unexplained, but as compensation the report was returned to the files, this time labeled “unknown,” and so became part of the few bits of evidence of UFOs officially recognized as such.

The second film has a more complicated story. On July 2, 1952, Warrant Officer Delbert C. Newhouse was taking a trip with his wife and children in Utah. Some seven miles from Tremonton he caught sight of an irregular formation of shining, circular objects whirling about in the sky at a very high speed. It took him only a few seconds to stop his car at the edge of the road and aim his 16-mm Bell and Howell movie camera fitted with a telephoto lens in the direction of the UFOs.

THE INVESTIGATION OF THE U-FILM

The dozen blue-white objects flying west in an irregular but compact formation occasionally carried out strange maneuvers in the sky. Some seemed to pair up edge to edge for a short time; others seemed to be flying in tight circles, darting out to the edges of the formation or catching up with the leaders. Suddenly one of them reversed course sharply and drew away from the group, passing almost directly above Newhouse, who filmed it several times.

The attention of a considerable number of generals, admirals, and G.S.-16 men focused on the Tremonton film, and they flowed into Kelly Air Base in Texas, where the staff of the U.S. Air Force intelligence had their headquarters. A secret, high-level conference was held, and the pictures on the movie frames were identified as all sorts of things: balloons or known aircraft, reflections of the sunlight (for at 11:10, when the film was made, the sun was almost directly overhead), or a shower of meteorites, migratory birds, or gulls, a scientist present having reminded everyone that a species of white gull was native to the Great Salt Lake area. The term “spacecraft” was mentioned briefly, but merely in order to rule out any hypothesis along that line, and to be put in the same category with nonexistent supersecret airplanes of either American or Soviet manufacture that had the characteristics attributed to UFOs.

After countless showings of the film, no single view prevailed. Those bothersome spots vaguely resembled many things, but no single known thing in particular. Some of the assemblage complained that the film was without details and points of reference. The methods of the Navy photography analysts were criticized on the grounds that they had not used the densitometer correctly, and Newhouse found himself charged with having, perhaps unwittingly, changed the sequences of the film. After which, the film was rejected as documentary evidence of the existence of UFOs.

Captain Ruppelt did not, however, admit that he was beaten and he made a wise decision—to have a chat with Newhouse. The conversation lasted for two hours and brought out an interesting particular: When Newhouse and his family saw the UFOs for the first time, they were close to the car. "If they had been the size of a B-29 they would have been at 10,000 feet altitude," he said. And he added that they looked like "two pie pans, one inverted on the top of the other."

By joining two bodies having approximately the shape of pie pans, we again get the already reported characteristic biplanar structure of the flying saucers.

THE END OF PROJECT BLUE BOOK

In November 1952 Captain Ruppelt asked the Air Technical Intelligence Command for permission to release the films to the press. General Garland forwarded the request to the Pentagon for approval.

No films and no statements to the press, was the reply, even though the scientists whom the Department of Defense had sent to Kelly Air Base a few months before had suggested that the most likely explanation for the white spots on the U-film was that they were Salt Lake seagulls.

The seagull theory, continued the Pentagon's letter of refusal, was too weak. In addition, a new approach to keeping the public informed would be employed from now on. And in fact the periodic releases known as "Fact Sheets" did appear, quickly bogging down the whole affair.

Captain Ruppelt, who firmly believed that he had material of the greatest importance in his hands (could they really be space craft?), had repeatedly asked that his staff be increased. At no time did it have more than ten active members, many of whom were continually absent on trips all over the country to collect or check on reports. Requests to have special movie cameras set up in areas where UFOs were frequently sighted and to have experts in electronics, meteorology, photography, physics, and mechanics assigned to the project were turned down. It became very clear in the autumn of 1952 that the Air Force intended to write finis to Project Blue Book.

In fact, instead of strengthening the project, the Air Force decided to turn direct investigation over to a specialized intelligence operational unit, the 4602nd Air Intelligence Squadron. This substitution was at first passed off as a collaboration between the two units.

In December the somewhat embittered Ruppelt asked to be transferred to other duties and in April 1953 the staff was reduced to two members, Lieutenant Bob Olsson and Airman 1st Class Max Futch. Nevertheless, Ruppelt remained officially in charge until September, when, with “a simple ceremony on the poop deck of one of the flying saucers that I frequently have been accused of capturing, before a formation of the three-foot-tall green men that I have equally frequently been accused of keeping prisoner,” he turned the office over to his successor, resigned from the Air Force, and went to California to work for Northrop Aircraft as a research engineer.

With this melancholy farewell, Project Blue Book virtually ceased to exist, and all the documentary material on the UFOs —more than four thousand reports—was buried in the files of the public relations office of the A.T.I.C. After the organizational matters were settled, a brief press release announced the transfer of power.

AIR FORCE DECEPTION

Ruppelt had directed Project Blue Book with passion and perseverance, though more than once he had given the distinct impression of being shackled by outside directives. In all probability the highly placed supporters of the project had created it specifically to put an end to the newspapers’ and public's demands for information by gradually convincing them that the UFOs did not exist.

On May 8, 1952, after a long and detailed briefing on the project, Air Force Secretary Thomas K. Finletter had only a vague general comment to make: "You're doing a fine job, Captain. It must be interesting. Thank you."

This lukewarm interest in a subject that obsessed much of the country made it very clear that Captain Ruppelt, who had thrown himself into the investigation seriously, had completely failed to carry out the secret (or possibly merely implied) premises of the project. No wonder, then, that a few months later the Air Force began to press to have the project dropped.

On the other hand, the exceedingly small number of men assigned to the project certainly did not justify the outcry raised against it by both the press and ufologists, who frequently charged it with hiding the truth and, in effect, weaving a kind of conspiracy against the "Brothers from Space." The small and exceedingly busy staff of military ufologists simply could not have done that even if they had wanted to.

As for the A.T.I.C., it then got ready to put an end to the whole "UFO problem," and in its report of August 1954 declared: "The Air Force would like to state that no evidence has been received which would tend to indicate that the United States is being observed by machines from outer space or a foreign government. No object or particle of an unknown substance has been received and no photographs of detail have been produced."[9] This press release said in effect that the flying saucers were a myth, if by that term we mean something different from mistakenly identified natural phenomena.

When Project Blue Book was deprived of authority, science became the moral heir to the UFO problem. The Air Force would have been very happy to have the whole thing forgotten, but since people were still occasionally "seeing something" and getting excited about it, if science wanted to get into the act, then the Air Force had nothing against it. After all, hadn't past experience guaranteed that science would be a trusty ally?

Suspecting trickery from that part of science which was serving the military, Professor A. Aula, an Italian expert in aerodynamics, in a radio talk in 1954 spoke about certain nations that were secretly in the vanguard of progress. The United States repeatedly denied that it merited the honor of being in this vanguard until the first Sputnik removed America's comfortable laurels and Washington began to release a blizzard of statements on its formidable missile system. But United States policy on the UFOs never wavered.

Indeed, on January 1, 1955, the remaining staff of Project Blue Book (two members) was ordered to turn control of direct investigation over entirely to the 4602nd Air Intelligence Squadron, an organization created during the Second World War for the methodical interrogation of captured enemy airmen and subsequently charged with the study of "simulated problems"—for example, airborne invasion of hostile elements, the identification of preparations for an air attack on the United States, and so on.

As had been foreseen from the start, the decision had a double result. First, the now long inactive Project Blue Book was ditched. Second, the 131 sightings reported in the first six months in which the two units worked together, plus all the previous material, were so thoroughly studied that the percentage of "unknowns" suddenly dropped from 20 percent for 1952 and 9 percent for 1954 to 3 and 1.8 percent respectively. This computation was arrived at in 1960 with the reevaluation of the 6312 reports collected by various military and civilian bodies, beginning with the notorious first sighting of 1947, which cost the U.S. Air Force so much money in committees, conferences, investigations, and counterpropaganda in the press.

In reproducing the final official bulletin (Fact Sheet No. 812, dated July 21, 1960), the American newspapers added a comment that closed the matter: "Flying saucers totally debunked!"

In fact, for over five years since then, the American press—imitated by its sister publications throughout the Western world—no longer demanded to know the truth about the UFOs and limited itself to reporting briefly and without comment the increasingly rare news of sightings of unknown flying objects, which had been supplanted in public interest by the more sensational, more visible, and less mysterious space exploits.

Finally the U.S. Air Force could consider that it had won its long battle against the UFOs.

NOTES

1. UFO formations had, however, already previously appeared over the northern states without attracting press attention because of the small number of witnesses. In fact, on April 11, 1952, while launching some weather balloons, meteorologists at the Minneapolis Air Base were looking through the theodolite and followed a flight of “unknown aerial objects that moved in the stratosphere, reaching frightening speeds in a matter of seconds.”

2. Other radar measurements of one of the objects moving at a high altitude established its speed at 4500 mph. In addition, it was observed that during some of the abrupt maneuvers one of the UFOs accelerated from 125 mph to 500 mph in only four seconds, while other objects seemed to reverse their direction sharply in seconds. For a more detailed recounting of these sightings see Major Donald H. Keyhoe, The True Report on Flying Saucers (Greenwich, Conn., Fawcett Publications, 1967), pp. 51 and 95–96; or the exhaustive and well-documented report of R. C. Borden and T. K. Vickers, Preliminary Study of Unidentified Targets Observed on Air Traffic Control Radars (C.A.A. Technical Development Report No. 180, Indianapolis, May 1953).

3. Blips, in radar jargon, are the responses received, that is, the band of radio waves bounced back by some object impervious to the waves. In the same jargon “angels” are pseudo blips, or the false pictures produced by some natural phenomenon (temperature inversion, storm centers, highly electrified clouds, hail clouds, and so on) that can influence the radio bands and that show up on the screen as irregular or evanescent spots, generally stationary.

4. See Menzel, Flying Saucers, p. 139 and especially pp. 300–310.

5. Major Keyhoe writes about this in his second book on the UFOs (Flying Saucers from Outer Space, p. 100): "For the next two weeks I talked with Barnes, Ritchey, Copeland, and most of the other Control Center men. Though they had cooled off, some were still bitter about the Air Force inversion answer. For years they had been guiding airliners through fog, snow, and rain without an accident. When the weather turned sour, thousands of lives were in their hands. As expert radar men, they were proud of their record—a record that depended on their ability to analyze and track blips in a split second. Then, overnight, they had been, in effect, called fools—deceived by a simple atmospheric condition they'd known for years. 'Every man in here knows temperature-inversion effects,' Barnes told me. 'When an inversion's big enough, it picks up all sorts of "ground clutter"—water tanks, buildings, shore lines, and so on. But anybody can recognize it. You'll see huge purplish blobs, but nothing like those things we tracked. In the six years I've watched the scopes, absolutely nothing—high-speed jets, storms, inversions, or anything else—has ever caused blips that maneuvered like that. And we've had identical weather many times.'"

7. See the Department of Defense press release of April 27, 1949: "The possibility that these flying objects may be foreign aircraft was also taken into consideration, but the reported speeds are so much greater than those of any kind of airplane that we have technically approached to date that only an accidental discovery so new that it has only now been reached could sufficiently explain them."

8. Perhaps they had done so and the information was later simply forgotten, thanks to the postwar crisis in the British aircraft industry—the civilian portion thereof, of course. And perhaps in the euphoria of the recent victory—which had virtually lifted the United States to the political leadership of the entire world—those in military circles allowed themselves to relax slightly in their investigations, convinced that they had now made war impossible thanks to their exclusive possession of the atom bomb.

Mysterious Night Lights Over the Rhineland

The clock in the plane read 8:25 P.M. when a "strange red light" appeared some ten miles off. The first person who saw it was the hostess, Gloria Hinshaw. It glowed in the night far to the rear, looking like the landing light of a fast interceptor.

The Trans World Airlines DC-3, en route to Chicago, was flying over the outskirts of Goshen, Indiana, at an altitude of about 2000 feet, and her captain, Robert Adickes, was checking the flight plan when the alarmed hostess reported that a very fast-moving light had climbed to the altitude of the airliner and was now pursuing it. Indeed, it had almost overtaken the plane.

The co-pilot, Robert F. Manning, immediately looked out the side window and gave a startled exclamation. Although the plane was flying at about 175 miles an hour, the mysterious shining object was then overtaking it at a speed of at least 400 miles an hour, gradually, however, losing altitude.

"It's going down. . . . But the light is getting bigger and brighter! . . . It's bright orange, like a ball of red-hot metal. . . . It looks like a giant pinwheel rolling down a slope. . . . It's gone!"

A few minutes went by and the bright object again appeared toward the rear of the plane. Visibly slowing down and its light markedly decreasing in intensity, it began pacing the plane about half a mile away.

Nervously handling the controls, Adickes banked to approach the unknown object, but even before he cut the original distance in half, the invader began an unexpected maneuver: suddenly the underside of the object grew brighter and the UFO seemed to veer over on its edge and leap back, quickly reestablishing its distance.

"It veered away from us, as if it had some sort of radar-repulse mechanism," Lieutenant Manning observed with surprise.

Captain Adickes tried three times to approach the UFO, and three times the object moved back from the unwanted approach by veering over on its edge again. For a short while, however, the American pilots were able to observe it edgewise, and in the flight report dated April 27, 1950, they wrote that when viewed from the bottom it was perfectly circular in form, with a maximum thickness at the center equal to about a tenth of its diameter, which was probably a little more than fifty feet.

After the third sudden edgewise withdrawal, the flaming body took off northward, passing over South Bend and diminishing rapidly into the distance until it disappeared entirely.[1]

The Adickes report raised a basic question: did the UFO have some sort of automatic anti-collision mechanism? In principle it did not seem that the idea should be excluded. During night bombing raids on Germany, the Allies themselves had used such mechanisms widely.[2]

THE “MAGIC EYES” OF INFRARED

The British had made notable progress in liaison techniques that employed invisible infrared radiations, through their development of a very light high-tension storage battery, thanks to a clever application of the old Zamboni pile.

During the year 1942 the R.A.F. had mounted infrared “headlights” and receivers on its night fighters and they proved to be very useful—so useful, in fact, that the Germans became aware of them, for they allowed the British pilots to recognize one another during convoy missions. Subsequently, when the R.A.F. was equipped with its first radar-guided cannons, the infrared apparatus was also mounted in bombers so that they would be able to identify their convoy planes by night and open fire only on the enemy fighters.

With the thoroughness that characterizes their scientific research, the Germans had also considered the military applications of “invisible light.”

The Spanner was a reflector that was supposed not only to pick up radiations from the exhausts of enemy engines, but, by illuminating the objective from a distance and receiving its reflection like a radar receiver, to trace the invading aircraft successfully even if too great a distance or an unfavorable position of the exhaust with respect to the reflector masked normal radiation. The technical authorities of the Luftwaffe judged the apparatus to be highly efficient but too bulky to be installed in its night fighters; the Spanner was therefore shelved, and the experience was profitably used in the construction of the Gaertner infrared phototheodolites for antiaircraft rocket stations and in the project to develop the antiradar automatic search mechanism known as the Feuerball.[3]

In addition, during the year 1944, Section D of the Deutsche Forschungsanstalt für Segelflug (D.F.S.), of Ainring, near Salzburg, was working on various apparatuses for infrared night television using a network of ultrasensitive thermocouples that would permit distance vision even through clouds.[4]

When Albert Speer, the Minister of War Production, assumed the reins of the entire German war economy (August 1944), the highest priority was given to a D.F.S. apparatus (a small number of which were built in the plant of the Viennese firm Kepka Werke) equipped with a simplified type of photoelectric "magic eye" inserted in the center of a parabolic scanning mirror. This apparatus was also supposed to be mounted in the cone of the Enzian antiaircraft rocket, but just then the war suddenly took on a catastrophic rhythm.

After crossing the Po, the Allies forced Field Marshal Kesselring's divisions to surrender, and moving up from the south the British Eighth Army occupied the still undefended recesses of the Alpine Redoubt, which was then under construction. There, among hundreds of inventions of inestimable value, the men of the Eighth Army's T Unit found a number of pieces removed from the mysterious Feuerball together with the Enzian rocket and its deadly fuse, the minuscule Mücka detector, which was supposed to enable the pilots of the very fast night fighter jets to "see" their squadron mates by means of infrared lights mounted on their wing tips and tails.

The war ended but research continued. In fact, in 1948 the American Air Force experimented with a bomb (V.B. 6 Felix) whose trajectory was regulated by an apparatus sensitive to the heat given off by the target (ships, factories, petroleum refineries, steel mills, urban areas).[5]

In addition, they found on the drawing board items that a number of years later would result in the Sidewinder air-to-air missiles (similar to the British Firestreak), which were supposed to seek the hottest point in their cone of action: either the exhausts of aircraft engines—but only if the plane was attacked from the rear (wasn't that what the "strange red light" over Goshen did?)—or the propelling nozzle of a jet plane or missile (it was probably a rocket of this sort that downed the American V-2 over Russia), or the sun, if they were launched by mistake at a target against that star.

All this was well known at the Air Matériel Command, and the grotesque wall of secrecy that surrounded new military designs being separately worked out by the three American services was equally well known. Could the "ball" over Goshen have been some radio-controlled device belonging to the Army or Navy? The Pentagon immediately clamped the lid on such suspicions. A denial was also issued to the press. Then American newspapers "rediscovered" the Foo Fighters.

THE "KRAUT BALLS"

A former flying officer, who had been in the intelligence section of the Eighth Air Force during the final days of the war in Europe and did not wish to be named, apparently because he was still working in some section of the U.S. Air Force, declared to the New York press:

"It is quite possible that the flying saucers are the latest development of a 'psychological' antiaircraft weapon that the Germans had already used. During night missions over western Germany I happened to see on several occasions shining discs or balls that followed our formations. It was well known that the German night fighters had powerful headlights in their noses or propeller hubs—lights that would suddenly catch the target, partly in order to give the German pilots better aim but mostly in order to blind the enemy tail gunners in their turrets. They caused frequent alarms and continual nervous tension among the crews, thereby lowering their efficiency. During the last year of the war the Germans also sent up a number of radio-controlled bright objects to interfere with the ignition systems of our engines or the operation of the on-board radar. In all probability American scientists picked up this invention and are now perfecting it so that it will be on a par with the new offensive and defensive air weapons."

Then other flyers who had taken part in the opening of the second front also reported to the press that toward the end of the hostilities, in the area between Hagenau in Alsace-Lorraine and Neustadt an der Weinstrasse in the Rhine Valley, there were certain phenomena that oddly resembled the present-day reports of flying saucers. Convinced that they were faced with a new German secret weapon, the American flyers called them Foo Fighters (fire fighters, from the French feu, fire) and, jokingly, "Kraut balls." Subsequently, something similar but on a far smaller scale was seen by bomber crews over the Japanese islands.

Former war correspondent R. Palmer, for example, has related how one of the Foo Fighters followed an American plane over the Rhine Valley for about eighteen miles.

The incident began at 10:00 P.M. on November 23, 1944. Lieutenant Edward Schlueter of the 415th U.S. Night Fighter Squadron, stationed at Dijon, was flying a heavy night fighter toward Mainz. After carrying out a large-scale diversion along the northern edge of the Black Forest, the pilot began to follow the long ribbon of the Rhine. At about twenty miles from Strasbourg, Lieutenant Fred Ringwald, an Air Force intelligence officer who was taking part in the mission as an observer, glanced out the side window of the darkened cockpit and saw in the distance about ten small balls of reddish fire flying in formation at an amazing speed.

"I wonder what those lights are over there in the hills," Ringwald said to Schlueter.

"Probably stars," the pilot replied.

"I don't think so."

"Are you sure they're not a reflection from us?"

"Positive."

Puzzled, the pilot looked hard at the lights, which were now coming straight toward his plane. Without further delay, he radioed the American ground radar station:

"There are about ten Heinie night fighters around here, in the sky. Looks as if they are chasing us, and their speed is high."

"You guys must be nuts! Nobody up there but yourself," replied the radar station.

The radar observer, Lieutenant Donald J. Meiers, then got on the plane's radarscope to scan the fiery balls, but although the danger zone and the entire sky in the vicinity was scanned, there was no evidence of enemy aircraft: "Sure, no enemy planes showed up on the screen! And yet those red lights. . . ."

They continued to glow in sinister fashion a few miles off. Schlueter moved toward them at full throttle. As if they had foreseen the attack, the glow of the bodies rapidly dimmed, and without changing position, after a few moments they became completely invisible. The American plane crossed that part of the sky without encountering any moving body.

No more than two minutes went by and the globes, glowing red as before, reappeared but somewhat farther off, as though regrouping for a counterattack. Instead, six minutes later, after having completed a very long glide, they vanished into the night toward the German rear behind the Siegfried Line.

At this point the plane's radar began to give evidence of serious malfunctioning and the pilot had to give up his train strafing for the night.

Discussing what had happened during the flight back to the base, the flyers came to the conclusion that what they had seen were experimental devices (which explained the malfunctioning of the radar) on the order of the small multicolored rockets that earlier used to be fired at German antiaircraft batteries in order to confuse their aim during the great night bombing raids. Since they had not been able to identify the lights with any degree of certainty, and since the lights themselves had given no indication of aggressive intention, the flyers decided not to mention them in their flight report to the Dijon command for fear of being considered lunatics or victims of war neurosis.

REPORTS AND RUMORS ABOUT THE FOO FIGHTERS

On November 27, 1944, two pilots, Henry Giblin and Walter Cleary, encountered an enormous, burning orange light in the vicinity of Speyer. It was flying at about 250 mph about 1500 feet above their fighter plane. The radar station in the sector again radioed back the equivalent of "Nuts!" when the pilots queried the presence of this threat.

The plane's own radar almost immediately began to malfunction, and they had to return to base. A detailed report—the first acknowledgment in official form—confirmed the existence of the inexplicable lights, and the two men who reported them became the butt of many jokes.

Subsequently other flyers encountered the mysterious Foo Fighters, but having learned their lesson from the fate of their colleagues, they never mentioned them in their flight reports.

Pilots McFalls and Baker were the ones who broke this imposed silence. They too were from the 415th Squadron, and their very short but detailed report forced Air Force intelligence to consider the matter seriously:

"At 0600 [on December 22], near Hagenau, at 10,000 feet altitude, two very bright lights climbed toward us from the ground. They leveled off and stayed on the tail of our plane. They were huge bright orange lights. They stayed there for two minutes. On my tail all the time. They were under perfect control [by operators on the ground]. Then they turned away from us, and the fire seemed to go out." The rest of the report was censored. Apparently it went on to mention the plane's radar and its sudden malfunctioning.

Two nights later the same pilots were flying over the Rhine when they were "attacked" by a glowing red ball that suddenly "changed into an airplane which did a wing over! Then it dived and disappeared." Additional censored lines.

Knowledge of these facts, which were being increasingly repeated, finally caught the attention of military publications. During the last days of December 1944, stories were leaked to the American Legion Magazine, which published the personal opinions of several U.S. Intelligence officers and suggested that the Foo Fighters were radio-controlled devices that the Germans sent up to baffle the radar of the night raiders. Picking up the story, the newspapers dug up Hitler's threatening speeches boasting of the imminent use of certain secret weapons capable of compromising or at least delaying the Allied victory.

In an effort to dissipate apprehension, on January 1, 1945, the science editor of the Associated Press, Howard W. Blakeslee, gave a radio talk in which he accepted the official view of Intelligence and assured his vast audience that the balls of light reported by flyers over France were simply St. Elmo's fire—natural and spontaneous lights produced by mutual electrostatic induction by the very craft flying the missions. And since the lights were immaterial, radar could not pick them up.

Echoes of these inconclusive discussions reached the American bases in France that were directly concerned with the question. Then the pilots themselves, most of whom had already been flying for a number of years and were quite familiar with St. Elmo's fire, decided to clear up the mystery.

The crew of a bomber that for a short time was being followed at a distance by an irregular formation of about fifteen fiery balls then reported that each of them gave off a strange light that went on and off at intervals and seemed to be related to clear variations in speed. At a certain point "one by one the balls approached so close that they almost touched the wings. They were huge, spinning balls, and for a short time we felt an intense sensation of heat." Naturally, the plane's radar ceased functioning.

The pilot of another Flying Fortress also reported that he had encountered a fiery ball over German territory. He was so ridiculed by his comrades, who declared that he had seen the celebrated Rhine maidens, that he was almost convinced that he had seen nothing at all when, two nights later, while flying back to the base, he saw a fiery mass similar to the one that had caused his discomfiture moving a few miles off. Aided by the fact that their paths were converging, he decided to fly right up to it. When he was a few hundred yards from the Foo Fighter, he heard a strange sound, like the "backwash of invisible planes." He continued on his flight path and the flying fire seemed to go out or to fly off. Resuming his interrupted flight to the base, the pilot saw the same shining, motionless ball at a high altitude off in the distance.

The suspicion that a German counteroffensive was imminent in Alsace to complement the one in the Ardennes led the Allied authorities to a close check of the most insignificant Nazi activities.

On January 12 several bombing squadrons simultaneously reported to the command at Dijon that they had seen the balls of light; some had seen one, others two, still others four or more. In the following months the reports on the Foo Fighters—and they were all alike in content and conclusions—formed a voluminous dossier that justified opening a special investigation, but it was at once noted that the balls showed no aggressive intentions, and since the territory over which they were operating had been occupied, the investigation was shelved toward the end of April 1945.

From the very beginning, the British showed not the least interest in the phenomenon. No hint of the facts recounted above appeared in the British press. But, in fact, Section T of British Intelligence was looking into the matter.

In early May, cruising on a free mission near the eastern edge of the Pfalzerwald, where French and American forces were still wiping out one of the many small pockets of isolated German units, yet another pilot from the 415th Squadron saw five orange balls in the distance proceeding in triangular formation. This was the last episode in the series. After the war was over, the Foo Fighters were forgotten for five years.[6]

Undoubtedly some of these manifestations could have been induced by the spontaneous, intensified production of natural phenomena, not electrostatic as Blakeslee had it but electro-atmospheric (ball lightning), arising out of the change of the German rear lines (as well as parts of Japanese territory) into a vast brazier and out of the violent daily movement of the land and the air above it.

But the Germans had brought into action various war devices that, examined one by one, could explain many of the things the American pilots had reported. For example, the Germans launched fluorescent balloons of moderate size. Released in the vicinity of the presumed point of ballistic contact between the raiders and the interceptors, they were supposed to fool the escort fighters and cause them to break away from the formation, thus permitting the attacking fighters to speed into the bomber formation.

Whole series of balloons were used to lift all kinds of shapes and sizes into the air in order to fool Allied radar by altering the apparent conformation of the land they were flying over. The shapes of the little lakes of Wannsee and Müggelsee, which were basic points of navigational reference, were frequently moved about in this manner.[7]

In addition, the Germans repeatedly sent up their Aphrodites, special black balloons that released sheets of tinfoil during enemy raids in order to confuse Allied radar.

Finally there were the first German jet and rocket interceptors for day and night combat, with their well-known white-hot circular exhausts and special fighting tactics; blueprints for these were subsequently sent to Japan in large transport submarines from a collapsing Germany.

THE ANTIRADAR FEUERBALL

With the news of the third massive appearance of the flying saucers, in 1950, the Foo Fighters reappeared on the scene, this time cited by ufologists as proof that Martian observers were present in the skies during the last war.

Since the idea of extraterrestrial observers clashes with the most elementary horse sense, let us rummage about for a while among the German secrets of the last days of the war, with special reference to that category of secrets which, for reasons of military expedience, even today preserves in whole or in part its shadowy and malefic character.

In the autumn of 1954, in Oberammergau in Bavaria, the O.B.F.—an experimental center run by the Luftwaffe—had completed a series of researches into electrical apparatuses capable of interfering with the operation of an engine up to a maximum distance of about a hundred feet by producing intense electromagnetic fields. If the ignition system of a plane's engine could be shortcircuited, the plane would be bound to crash. In order to make the invention a practical proposition, the German technicians proposed to at least triple the radius of action of this weapon, but when the conflict ended, researches along those lines had been barely sketched out.

In the meantime, as a by-product of these researches that could be put to immediate use in the war, another center, run by Speer and the S.S. Technical General Staff, had adopted the idea of employing "proximity radio interference" on the very much more delicate and hence more vulnerable electronic apparatuses of the American night fighters.

Thus a highly original flying machine was born; it was circular and armored, more or less resembling the shell of a tortoise, and was powered by a special turbojet engine, also flat and circular, whose principles of operation recalled the well-known aeolipile of Hero, which generated a great halo of luminous flames. Hence it was named Feuerball (Fireball). It was unarmed and pilotless. Radio-controlled at the moment of take-off, it then automatically followed enemy aircraft, attracted by their exhaust flames, and approached close enough without collision to wreck their radar gear.

The fiery halo around its perimeter—caused by a very rich fuel mixture—and the chemical additives that interrupted the flow of electricity by overionizing the atmosphere in the vicinity of the plane, generally around the wing tips or tail surfaces, subjected the H2S radar on the plane to the action of powerful electrostatic fields and electromagnetic impulses (the latter generated by large klystron radio tubes protected with special antishock and antiheat armor).[8] Since a metal arc carrying an oscillating current of the proper frequency —equal, that is, to the frequency used by the radar station —can cancel the blips (return signals from the target), the Feuerball was almost undetectable by the most powerful American radar of the time, despite its nighttime visibility.

In addition, the builders of the device hoped—and their hopes were fulfilled—that when the Allied flyers, not knowing their nature or purpose, noticed that the fiery balls were apparently harmless, they would not fire on these enormous-looking (because of their large halos of fire) “inoffensive” devices for fear of being caught in some gigantic explosion. More than once, in fact, as they fearfully watched those huge lights close in, the American pilots thought that some German technician on the ground was perhaps getting ready to push a button and cause the Foo Fighter to explode.[9]

Project Feuerball was first constructed at the aeronautical establishment at Wiener Neustadt, with the help of the Flugfunk Forschungsanstalt of Oberpfaffenhoffen (F.F.O.) in so far as radio control of the missile was concerned (but was it really a missile?).[10] One person who saw the first short test flights of the device, without its electrical gear, says that “during the day it looked like a shining disc spinning on its axis and during the night it looked like a burning globe.”

Hermann Göring inspected the progress of the work a number of times, for he hoped, as in fact it happened, that the mechanical principle could later also be used to produce an offensive weapon capable of revolutionizing the whole field of aerial warfare.

When the Russians began to press on toward Austria, the construction of the first Fireballs was apparently continued by a number of underground plants in the Schwarzwald that were run by the Zeppelin Werke.[11] The klystron tubes were supplied by the section of the Forschungsanstalt der Deutschen Reichpost (F.D.R.P.) of Aach bei Radolfzell on Lake Constance, and later also by the F.D.R.P. section of Gehlberg, whose products, however, were not as perfect as those delivered by the F.D.R.P., a fact that caused a number of Fireballs to be used simultaneously in formation.[12]

THE JÄGERSTAB

After the "miraculous" failure of the July twentieth attempt on his life, Hitler was convinced that divine providence favored him; in August 1944, despite serious reverses in the field, he refused to admit that the war was now lost. He threatened harsh measures against anyone who dared speak of defeat, and in the military conference held on September 1 at Rastenburg he astonished the few generals who remained faithful to him with certain mysterious allusions to "the magnificent opportunity offered by the coming winter, with its fogs, snows, and long nights," which would finally bring the Allied operations to a halt. Through bitter experience he was well aware of the fact that the rigors of winter would stabilize all fronts, saving Germany for the moment. He was quite right, but, allowing himself to be carried away by excessive euphoria concerning that "magnificent opportunity" —or perhaps by an inner, growing desperation masked by euphoria—he ordered his generals to undertake the Ardennes winter counteroffensive. Because it was conducted with a forced economy of means, this maneuver could not achieve its objectives and ended by giving the coup de grâce to the exhausted German army.

At the same time Hitler's hopes for complete cessation of Allied aerial activity on the Western Front were disappointed. On the heels of the advancing troops, Allied service units had in fact set up field radar stations in the French rear, which by now was equivalent to the German border. These stations furnished the fighter and bomber formations with various kinds of information on the thin German defenses.

But the worst blow to Hitler's hopes was struck in October, when an enormous British air raid reduced to rubble the great radio jamming station that had recently been constructed on the Grosser Feldberg in the Taunus range. This station, equipped with the finest German devices, was built in an area from which it was able to protect the industrial regions of the Ruhr and the Saar, whose production, together with that of Silesia, had become vital to the prosecution of the war.[13] From that moment on, German skies, which had already been inadequately defended for some time, were completely opened to the enemy's so-called saturation bombings—in the last quarter of 1944 they accounted for 80,000 victims—and to the great air offensive against German transportation and communication designed to choke her war production at the source.[14]

To support the preparations for the Ardennes offensive and hinder the Allies from bringing up extensive supplies of troops and matériel along the Rhine axis by night, the Fireballs were thrown into action prematurely, and under the pressure of events unfavorable to the Germans, they were unable to have a decisive effect.[15] In addition, their development and subsequent use had paralleled the vicissitudes of German aeronautical production.

Notwithstanding the terrible Allied bombardments, German factories had continued to produce arms of all sorts, particularly air weaponry. In September 1944 they reached the amazing record of 4103 aircraft, but the greater part of this number never even flew because of the chronic shortage of fuel. The planes were destroyed on the ground at the airfields or during rail shipment from the factories to the flying fields.[16] The foundations for this undeniable but thoroughly useless achievement were laid down two years before.

Beginning in 1942, in order to meet the by now obvious threat of a long war against a powerful bloc of enemies, the German Air and War Production Ministries had encouraged every kind of proposal and experiment in the field of jet propulsion and related matters and had permitted a part of the regular assembly lines to be converted. Increasingly feeling the weight of Allied air mastery, the various services and technical groups each began to exert direct pressure on manufacturers and ministries in order to receive the lion's share of the allotments. The metropolitan air defense—supported principally by the air ace General Galland—requested fighter planes, especially jet fighters, in order to halt the air raids which were mounting to a crescendo and reducing the country to ruins. The Heereswaffenamt (Army Weapons Office) worked secretly to get fighter-bombers and antitank planes for the Eastern Front. Uncertain what to do and soured by the failure of "his" Battle of Britain, Göring wanted heavy bombers, mostly to support his imminent retaliation with V-1s and V-2s and restore the now eclipsed prestige of the Luftwaffe, and thereby his own. Hitler wanted nothing but bombers, in order to pay the British back in their own coin for the pounding that he had to take with angry impotence, and to give air support to the various counteroffensives that he was planning on paper. The most powerful leaders in the party and the propaganda office took Hitler's side, declaring that the United States, too, was ripe for a "good lesson."

In this atmosphere of senseless differences and disillusioned by Göring's many empty promises, Hitler acted as a clumsy mediator and irreparably delayed the production of the excellent ME-262 jet fighter, which was already well advanced.[17] Nevertheless, the production of conventional fighters was at the same time speeded up, although not to the degree demanded under the circumstances; indeed, in February 1944 the Jägerstab (Fighter General Staff) was set up and achieved a formidable increase in the single-engined ME-109 and FW-190 interceptors.

In April, Dr. Sauer changed the Jägerstab into a real rearmament office (Rustungsstab), and for the first time civilian authorities interfered officially in questions that had always been the province of Luftwaffe officers.[18] The Rustungsstab set up an immediate program of emergency production, although it also gave a free hand to the development and implementation of new projects so long as they did not interfere with the realization of the base program.[19] This plan, which would certainly have restored Germany’s air supremacy, at least over her own territory, was accepted only in part, and in the final analysis this was the reason it failed.[20]

By means of complicated internal maneuvering Göring sought to reestablish his shrunken authority, and by October he succeeded in launching the Wehrforschungsgemeinschaft, a kind of research weapons pool of particular interest to the air arm. But he had to accept the unwelcome presence in its councils of Professor Osenberg, a high functionary under Minister Speer, and finally of the extremist wing of the regime, the dreaded S.S. The S.S.’s fighting formations in the ranks of the Wehrmacht had meantime grown to the proportions of a small army, battle-hardened and obviously destined to grow even larger if circumstances permitted.

S.S. DOMINANCE

Once he had consolidated his power and in 1934 got rid of the opposition of part of his collaborators through a bloodbath, Hitler dissolved the original storm troopers (the S.A.), who had become unreliable. He replaced them with a permanent organization, the Gestapo (Geheime Staatspolizei, Secret State Police), which created a black uniformed militia, the Schutzstaffel (Elite Guard), later better known simply as the S.S., and infamous for its political terrorism and its cruelty in the death camps.

An offshoot of the same command, but organized for other purposes, was the Waffen S.S., the military body that fought side by side with the army. It was quite apart from Himmler’s political militia, but it was tending to transform itself into a kind of gigantic national militia. When the war broke out, the Waffen S.S. Korps accepted into its ranks large numbers of ardent young Nazis, who received a mixture of military and political training and then, formed into autonomous S.S. divisions, took part in the military campaigns, distinguishing themselves not only for their admitted courage but also for the bloody reprisals they carried out in occupied territory.

The slow backstairs intrigue that the highest S.S. leaders engaged in in order to assume the reins of military operations began in 1943, when so many fronts were broken through that it became clear that the "inevitable victory" was neither so close nor so inevitable as Doctor Goebbels' political oratory would have one believe. But the right time came only with the unexpected assassination attempt of July 20, 1944, which revealed the latent enmity between part of the Wehrmacht and Nazism and resulted in a large, grim harvest of victims. It was the same antagonism that in Italy had set the monarchy against Fascism, but in Germany—given the time, place, and circumstances—the rival forces acted according to a kolossal plan, one that was really typically German.[21]

Furious at both the insult and the danger he had been in, Hitler turned control of planning, construction, and in some cases even the use of the "new weapons" over to the S.S.—without, however, taking away all authority from his ministers. Previously the S.S. had exercised only a more or less hidden control in this area to prevent production slow-downs, sabotage, and treason.

Reichsführer S.S. Himmler named Dr. Heinz Kammler, a Gruppenführer (Lieutenant General) of the S.S., the director of secret war production, which now included the famous V-series flying bombs and rockets. The effects, which from all reports were relatively beneficial to the Third Reich, were soon visible. The famous V-2 torpedo rocket, with its final bugs still not eliminated, was dragged—and that is exactly the right word—onto the launching areas and fired on London in salvos despite the bewilderment and resistance of the directors of the experimental center at Peenemünde. The S.S. wanted weapons, not promises. And in order to impose its growing authority in that sector, it requested and got control of the launching and even the firing of the bombs.

Another important skirmish in the S.S.'s growing intervention in the conduct of the war was its manifest interest in certain unusual weapons that promised dangerous but certain victories.

In August 1944 the Bachem firm in Waldsee began its project for a single-seater, rocket-armed, rocket-engined fighter, the Bachem 8-349-A.1, which was completed in record time. Called the Natter (Viper), this was a vertical-take-off plane controlled by a metal pylon.[22] In the spring of 1945 the firm received the following orders: for the Luftwaffe, 50 machines; for the S.S. Air Arm, 150 machines. The S.S. seemed bent on surpassing the Air Force in the defense of the Reich![23]

Then, since the weapons for active defense were delayed in leaving the underground assembly lines in the requisite numbers, the S.S. Technical General Staff prepared its own radar and radio antiaircraft interference units. By the clever use of "artificial objectives" and antiradar apparatuses that it had commandeered while still in the experimental stage, it succeeded in confusing the flight officers of the Allied bombers. But the greatest success of their most trusted technicians in this sector was without doubt the whirling antiradar airplane, the Fireball, which they had launched in squadrons and were still able to keep fairly secret until the very end.

To understand the rest of the story better, we must understand that the S.S. had a number of scientific research and testing centers that are best described as "private." One of the oldest of these was located in Grossendorf, where rocket studies were carried out under Captain R. Engel. Another center for similar testing was in operation at Jenbach, in Austria. A third and very well equipped center, and perhaps the most important of all, was also in operation in Austria, in St. Aegyd, a small city north of Vienna. Although it went under the name of the Kraftfahrtechnischenlehranstalt (K.T.L.)—in other words, a public technical institute, or a polytechnical school, for the S.S.—in the last days of the war it was in reality mostly concerned with unusual applications of jet propulsion and the first gas turbines for all sorts of war vehicles such as tanks, motorboats, gliders, and other such offensive vehicles. At the beginning of 1945 the S.S. high command moved the institute because it was located too far east. It took fifty trucks packed with documents, projects, blueprints, and experimental apparatuses and models to move the center to Sulzheim and the surrounding villages by night. It resumed operations on April 8, but a month later the British experts of the T Department were rummaging about in that precious heap of papers.

THE INDUSTRIEKONTOR

The full power that had been given to General Kammler also opened the door for the S.S. to those governmental and private centers that at first had resisted direct collaboration. Thus the Forschungsinstitut of Lindau am Bodensee, which was conducting researches into liquid air and "special weapons" only a short distance from the Black Forest, fell under S.S. control. Likewise the various departments of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institut; the remnants of the famous Baltic experimental center of Peenemünde, which had been evacuated to Kochel, Garmisch, and Oetzal in Bavaria; the research and development departments of industrial firms; and the laboratories of universities and technical institutes.[24] Nevertheless, the S.S. was unable to enjoy all the advantages from the new situation that it would have had earlier: namely, complete industrial and economic control of the whole nation. The links between the various centers and between the centers and the factories became increasingly precarious. Evacuating entire industries and setting them up again in underground quarters required time and manpower that was out of all proportion to what was available.[25]

Notwithstanding the self-sacrifice of the fighting men, the disciplined resignation of the civilians, the iron regimentation of the workingman, and the pitiless slave labor extracted from an immense number of war prisoners, the situation got worse and worse. In the east, Russian armies were already trampling the edges of German soil, while the Anglo-Americans were hammering deeper and deeper into Germany not only with the giant air raids but also with the intensive use of saboteurs, who were even more dangerous than the bombs because they struck silently and penetrated the underground laboratories, interrupting vital research.

The job of putting the industries and the new experimental centers underground (in order to save time and transport facilities, these two areas tended to be treated as one) had, until October 1944, been arranged between the competent government offices and the individual firms or directly between the latter and various private excavation contractors. Subsequently it was unified by Speer under a state enterprise, the Industriekontor G.m.b.H. (Industry Office), which controlled who was to use the underground complexes and the contractors under the Todt organization, which had the job of adapting already existent caves or excavating the underground facilities.[26]

The manpower (political and war prisoners) for the job of excavation was supplied and overseen by the S.S. It was therefore inevitable that in the end the S.S. would take over control of the entire operation. Indeed, it operated certain areas of industry for its own ends, ousting the Industry Office and taking over from Todt. Sometimes it took them over for reasons of private speculation, other times in order to better hide secret laboratories of particular interest to the S.S., like the one in Linz St. Georgen, in upper Austria. But the usual ideological differences and the well-known intransigence of the new bosses so delayed the work that in December 1944 only three-fifths of the underground facilities had been completed.[27]

General Kammler apologized to Himmler for this partial failure, pointing out in his defense the unfavorable progress of the war and the shortages of machinery, fuel, and manpower. Strangely (but perhaps there was some sort of secret understanding), Reichsführer S.S. Himmler did not take it badly; he did not fire or threaten his subordinate. With a red pencil he wrote in the margin of Kammler's report simply: "Sehr gut" (Very good).[28]

In fact, most of the establishments that had been set up underground during the course of the previous spring were already operating in or would soon be operating in the German rear lines, and Himmler grew more and more enamored of what he called the "Bavarian Redoubt," out of sheer chauvinism, for it was to include the Austrian Tyrol and the Italian Dolomites as well.

The southern Reich was not overlooked. S.S. technicians and Speer's trusted functionaries, though they both acted independently, had transferred or were in the process of transferring the better part of the scientific equipment for the rearming of the Wehrmacht to the south and they set about feverishly to get it into operation again.

OPERATION ALPINE REDOUBT

Following the complete reorganization of February 1, 1945, Speer, who was under secret surveillance and in some cases even forcibly subordinated to the S.S. Technical General Staff, assumed direct control of carrying out all the research and implementation of new projects, which were chosen and developed with a speed that seems miraculous to anyone unfamiliar with the means of coercion employed in the final phases of the war. The fundamental objective of the Nazis was, however, to speed up work on the so-called Operation Alpine Redoubt. But at this point we must introduce, in a necessarily condensed form, a bit of history prior to the above, for a final judgment on the aims and events of this controversial operation has a bearing on the likelihood of a German origin —"paternity" would, perhaps, be too strong a word—for the new secret methods of propulsion that in later years would be manifested with the appearance of various types of UFO.

The history of Nazi Germany is well enough known from its beginning to its end. We know how and with what means Hitler took power and we know in the most minute detail that "warlord's" victories and defeats. Although disagreeing on certain particulars, various authors have described how he swept both himself and the Third Reich into the final tragedy. Nevertheless, except for the unsuccessful Ardennes counteroffensive and the detailed picture of purely military operations, the period between the intensification of the Anglo-American heavy bombing raids and the battle of Berlin is not yet perfectly known. Fragmentary bits of information throw only a few flashes of light on the varied and complex aspects of the titanic industrial effort that Nazism made in order not to succumb.

In fact, of the numerous revolutionary “new weapons” that the Germans developed in that period, we know only those—fortunately, they comprise the majority—that fell into the hands of all, or at least more than one, of the four occupying powers. And little or no information on the enormous labor required to put German industries underground has been placed before the public at large, for the retention of the data collected by various Allied commissions, notwithstanding the more than twenty years that have passed since then, offers a textbook lesson in military secretiveness.

“I will win the Battle of Time!” Hitler proclaimed as he took leave of the experts from the Party and the Waffen S.S. who were planning their resistance in the south of the Reich. Now it is a historical fact that he lost that battle without ever having fought it when he decided not to leave his Berlin bunker, but no official report has so far illuminated that particular incident of the Nazi twilight, thus leaving the field free to the personal opinions of the writers of war memoirs.

In his book A Soldiers Story, the commander of the United States XII Army, General Omar Bradley, declares, for example: “I was eager to clean out the Ruhr and with every division that could be spared from that task push on to the Elbe and Mulde. Once we had closed to that river line, I would spread two of my Armies behind it and turn southeast with the third, down the Danube to link up in Austria with the Red army then nearing Vienna. After having completed that movement we would have cut off the enemy’s retreat into his National Redoubt. . . . Months before, G-2 had tipped us off to a fantastic enemy plot for the withdrawal of troops into the Austrian Alps, where weapons, stores, and even aircraft plants were reported cached for a last-ditch holdout. . . .[29] Troops for the Redoubt, we had been told, were to come primarily from S.S. units and a swift check of the battle order on both our and the Russian front revealed a suspicious concentration of S.S. divisions on the southern flanks. Not until after the campaign ended were we to learn that this Redoubt existed largely in the imaginations of a few fanatic Nazis. It grew into so exaggerated a scheme that I am astonished we could have believed it as innocently as we did. But while it persisted, this legend of the Redoubt was too ominous a threat to be ignored and in consequence it shaped our tactical thinking during the closing weeks of the war."

Hanson Baldwin, author of Great Mistakes of the War, is another skeptic, although in his final sentence he partially admits the existence of the Redoubt: "[Eisenhower's] overemphasis on the 'National Redoubt' [was], it is now clear, mistaken. Intelligence failures again played a part in this mistake;[30] the 'National Redoubt'—fortifications and supplies supposed to have been prepared by the Nazi S.S. formations in the German-Austrian Alps for a last stand—was grossly overrated in our estimates. We learned later that relatively little work on the 'Redoubt' had been done; the scheme was more an idea than an accomplishment."

In Top Secret, Ralph Ingersoll, an American liaison officer at S.H.A.E.F., gives a version of the facts much more in line with German intentions: "Bradley was complete master of the situation, . . . in full command of the three armies that had broken through the Rhine defenses and were free to exploit their victories. Analyzing the whole situation, Bradley felt that to take battered Berlin would be an empty military victory. (It was not known at the time that Hitler was to make his last stand there.) The German War Department had long since moved out, leaving only a rear echelon. The main body of the German War Department, including its priceless archives, had been transferred to the Thuringian Forest, and an advance echelon was already near Berchtesgaden to prepare for a possible last stand in the mountains.[31] Berlin had been almost blown flat and was contributing practically nothing to the German war machine. The same Thuringian Forest that hid the German High Command was also known to be Hitler's secret factory area.[32] Moreover, Bradley felt that if he drove northeast from the Frankfurt gap to Berlin, he would be simply squeezing the German Army southward, forcing it to just where the Nazi Party leaders might want it to be. In the south the German Army had ideal terrain for a last stand."[33]

One final quotation, but this one is decisive, for it comes from a British source and is therefore much better informed in "secret matters," thanks above all to the information collected by Intelligence Service and S.A.S. agents who in the final days had daringly operated in the very area of the then abuilding redoubt:

"When our invasion armies were threatening his 'Fortress of Europe,' Hitler promised that if the German people would only hold out, and give him time, German scientists would provide them with new weapons which would change the course of the war.

"Again when the Reich was crumbling under the final onslaughts from West and East, Nazi propaganda laboured to create a vision of the Southern Redoubt, an inner fortress from which in a few months Germany would strike back with terrible weapons which would snatch victory at 'one minute past twelve.'

"In these respects they were not entirely lying. In the course of two recent visits to Germany, as leader of a technical mission for the Ministry of Aircraft Production, I have seen enough of their designs and production plans to realize that if they had managed to prolong the war some months longer, we would have been confronted with a set of entirely new and deadly developments in air warfare. . . .

"There is some reason to believe that Hitler had been promised atomic explosives by October of this year, and if Germany had been first to use them the idea of changing the whole course of the war from a small base in the south German mountains is by no means so far-fetched" (according to Sir Roy Fedden, in The Nazi's V-Weapons Matured Too Late, London, 1945).

It would be superfluous to quote the few other remarks that can be found in the memoirs of the actors in the final assault on the Greater Reich. These quotations, all having about the same degree of vagueness of content and differing in their conclusions, constitute the entire "literature" that exists today on the controversial question of the Alpine Redoubt. It will be worthwhile, however, to examine the sequence of events that preceded the Alpine Redoubt.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE ALPINE REDOUBT

Just before the surprise Ardennes offensive, Allied propaganda was making much of the continual military reverses of the enemy and proclaiming that 1944 would be the year in which the Germans would be pushed back home. Indeed, after the Anglo-American D-Day invaders had disastrously broken through the "invulnerable" Atlantic Wall, the German armies had had to yield immense territories running from the whole of France to central Italy, from three-quarters of the Polish plains to the whole of Rumania, from the spontaneous evacuation of the Balkans to the forced evacuation from Finnish territory adjacent to Norway, which was still under firm control but now isolated and inactive.

The area of Europa Festung (Fortress Europe; i.e., the various continental countries that had been occupied since September 1939, and that the Nazis boasted of having transformed into an armory of men and weapons that would guarantee their inevitable victory) had been virtually reduced to the territory of the Reich itself, with a few border areas of foreign soil soon destined to become a battlefield on which the Germans would try to stave off the collapse of Nazism.

The Vaterland Plan sprang from the premise that the ideal bastions of the great German quadrilateral would withstand the shock of enemy offensives until the various secret weapons that were supposed to reverse the fortunes of the war could be got ready. These weapons were variously called weapons of revenge, victory, or desperation, depending on whether Nazi leaders, German soldiers, or the Allied General Staff were referring to them.[34]

Mindful of the recent attempt on the Führer's life, and despite the liquidations that followed it, a small group of important leaders in the higher spheres of the Nazi Party were still worried about new treacheries hatching in the so-called "generals' clique" in the Wehrmacht, and they did not care to run irretrievable risks. Moreover, various contretemps—changes in plans of construction, bombardments, sabotage, political interference, lack of special raw materials and petroleum, decentralization and putting industries underground—kept postponing the development and production of the new weapons to an increasingly indeterminate future.

For this reason, while more and more private, ultrasecret feelers for a separate armistice with the Western powers were sent out without the Führer's knowledge, the possibility of being forced to give up most of the national territory was being studied. Of course, the land would be defended foot by foot and would be stripped of all war and industrial installations that could in any way help the invader, as the Soviets had previously done so successfully.

After the sensational climax to the Battle of France, among the many who began to doubt Hitler's farsightedness was the Gauleiter (regional president) of the Tyrol, Franz Hofer. He was rightly fearful that the Anglo-Americans would immediately launch the final Battle of Germany in order to try to bring the war in Europe to an end as soon as possible. With the strength of their air mastery and the exceptional mobility of their armored forces, they would easily swarm over the vast flatlands of northern Germany.

The hasty reactivation of the West Wall—the famous Siegfried Line, which had been inactive since 1940—seemed to him inadequate to stop the enemy onslaught after the poor showing offered by the far better equipped Atlantic Wall. The Rhine is, of course, a broad and deep river, but the far broader English Channel had not stopped the invaders! It was necessary, then, to think in terms of some natural barrier that would be more efficacious than a mere river and where one could form a bridgehead and hold out until the day when large numbers of the secret weapons could be employed. Given its central position with respect to the crumbling fronts, the formidable complex of peaks, valleys, and glaciers of the Alps appeared to be, if not the only, certainly the best adapted for a long-drawn-out stand. Besides, by a fortunate coincidence—if it could be called that—the direction of march of the Allied armies advancing on the French, Polish, and Italian fronts in the late autumn of 1944 made it almost certain that the German armies, retiring according to plan, would all converge precisely in the Alpine area.

Judging by the technical and military resources of the time, this was an ideal region in which to attempt prolonged resistance, provided the necessary defenses could be got ready in time. And it would also be the ideal place from which the victorious—as Hofer saw it—counterattack could be launched when the situation was ripe.

From private sources among his friends in the upper ranks of the S.S. and the Party, he had come to know about the proposal to evacuate the Italian peninsula secretly—which, it was rumored, Marshal Badoglio himself had suggested in August 1943. He had also learned that a number of generals commanding combat units had repeatedly requested that a kind of East Wall be constructed in the rear, running unbroken from the Baltic to the Black Sea across Polish territory, in order to immobilize the Russian front until hostilities could be ended in the West.[35] Moreover, he had for years followed with ill-concealed annoyance the work that the Italian army engineers were doing back in 1941 to complete the Littorio Wall, a chain of forts and communication trenches that in part dated back to the First World War and were aimed toward Austria.

But the impulse for the final working out of his Alpenfestung (Alpine Redoubt) plan came to Hofer from his knowledge of the measures that the Swiss had adopted in order to resist possible aggression. These measures had principally taken shape in the preparation of a great National Redoubt in the mountains of the southern part of the Confederation. The information secretly furnished by pro-Nazi members of various Swiss National Socialist cultural associations that, with German support, sprang up between 1938 and 1941 provided a detailed rundown of the various preparations: blocking mountain passes, mining tunnels and bridges, planning extensive destruction of roads and highways to prevent the movement of traffic outside the National Redoubt, building makeshift airports, digging trenches, camouflaging communication trenches, and transforming new tunnels into storehouses for food, arms, ammunition, medical supplies, and fuel.[36]

If little Switzerland with its limited resources, working seriously and diligently before the Normandy landings, was able to protect itself so well that the Germans were finally dissuaded from undertaking such a chancy adventure, could not big Germany with its far greater resources do the same thing? Or, even better, protect itself against the Allies' inevitable attack in depth?

After the Italian armistice, Hofer, now suddenly appointed Gauleiter for the South Tyrol and Reichstaatshalter (civilian high commissioner) for the pre-Alpine zone of operations, had extended his political jurisdiction to the Italian provinces of Bolzano, Trento, and Belluno. This development made it possible for him to gain more exact knowledge of the military possibilities of the Italian side of the Alps.

Inspecting the Littorio Wall installations, he immediately saw that only simple detail modifications were required to alter it successfully for a defense against an army approaching from the Italian plain. But since at that time it was unthinkable that the Littorio Wall should be reconstructed in order to meet an attack from the south, the whole complex of forts, caves, and tunnels, which was especially well developed in the area of the Dolomites, was quickly transformed in the spring of 1944 into a sort of arsenal for Marshal Kesselring's army. After his successful defense of Cassino, however, Kesselring decided not to abandon the peninsula.

Like many other minor leaders on the Nazi Olympus, Hofer was completely in the dark about Hitler's hopeful but highly secret plans for a counteroffensive in the Ardennes. He believed, not without reason, that the Wehrmacht's new divisions, with their reduced and demoralized effectives, and the very formation of the Volkssturm, that sort of people's militia made up of fifteen- and sixty-year-olds (the "army of grandfathers and grandsons," as Allied propaganda derisively put it), could only be a mask for reorganizing a "real" army far from the deteriorating fronts and rear lines.

THE HOFER PLAN

In November 1944 Hofer delivered a long memorandum, the Alpenfestung Unternehmen, to Bormann, asking him to show it to the Führer. Maps, photographs, and geostatistical data demonstrated the possibility of quickly creating an enormous camp, complete with communication trenches, in the Alps, in order to concentrate and reequip the remaining forces, principally elite troops and the Waffen S.S. The original sketch of the plan restricted the area of the "fortress" to the mountainous territory of western Austria, with a few edges projecting into the Po Valley to make use of installations already in existence.

The shock perimeter—taking advantage of the long Swiss border that the Allies would not, he thought, violate—beginning with the Ortles massif, would follow the Littorio Wall (rebaptized Süd-Wall for the occasion), excluding the high eastern plateaus to avoid possible encirclement from Croatia. Bordering the Hohe Tauern range, running along the Salzach River up to and including Berchtesgaden and then proceeding westward along the spurs of the Bavarian Alps until it reached the southern tip of Lake Constance, the gigantic defensive ring would have practically encircled, except at the Voralberg and part of Salzburg, the entire Gau (district) of the Tyrol, in which Hofer exercised, according to rumor, a personal dictatorship.

To carry out the plan with all the speed that the circumstances demanded, he offered the Nazi Party about 70,000 Austrian construction workers, already enrolled in the Labor Front and especially expert in building in mountainous terrain and in bombproof constructions, to add to the 250,000 prisoners that would be available if the work of putting industries underground in the remainder of the territory of the Reich were, as proposed, halted. Because of their familiarity with the area, the 30,000 men of the Tiroler Standschützen, the Tyrolean Territorial Militia, were to act as a police force and be responsible for defense against invading paratroopers in the rear areas of the Redoubt.

We don’t know quite why Bormann considered this emergency plan to be “mad and defeatist” and refused to present it to the Führer. Perhaps he genuinely believed that the military situation was about to be reversed with the imminent resumption of German offensives on the French and Belgian fronts.

The reception of the plan by the highest political levels of the secret services was equally negative. S.S. Gruppenführer Walter Schellenberg, who had—secretly, of course—opened armistice negotiations with the Anglo-Americans, opposed the plan in a number of ways, tacitly approving what Bormann had done, for he was afraid that if this project, which was judged to be completely useless insofar as obtaining a favorable armed solution of the conflict was concerned, were carried out, it might prejudice the outcome of his secret negotiations. Indeed, to take advantage of the inevitable gaps in Allied intelligence, some of the information presented in Hofer's memorandum was cleverly manipulated and falsified by German counterespionage experts—the AMT VI, under the direction of Schellenberg himself—and then circulated among Allied informers who sent it on to Allied headquarters in Paris, thereby nourishing the fear of prolonged German resistance. By rattling this skeleton, Schellenberg hoped both to speed up the negotiations and to get more advantageous surrender terms from the Allies. It was doubtless a very clever trick, but the Allied formula of "unconditional surrender" rendered it useless from the start (except for the "mysterious" postwar rescue of a number of Nazi personalities with somewhat compromised histories).

When the winter offensive in the Ardennes—which began to peter out because of a shortage of planes, firepower, and gasoline—finally failed, the tormenting question of the defense of the national territory (already violated in Aachen and east Prussia) once again became the prime concern. While Dr. Goebbels on Radio Berlin was entreating the soldiers to resist at all costs because something sensational was in the offing, Bormann, under the pressure of unfavorable events and cleverly maneuvering so as not to be held responsible for his obstructionism, allowed the head of national security, S.S. Obergruppenführer (General) Ernst Kaltenbrunner, to report to Hitler the Allies' concern about the defensive possibilities of the Alpine Redoubt.

A discussion between Hofer and Hitler was immediately arranged. The Führer became convinced, albeit reluctantly, of the utility and urgency of the operation. Then and there Hofer was charged with seeing to the defensive reinforcement of his district on the basis of the facts contained in his memorandum, the plan of which, however, would have to "undergo certain modifications in order to increase its efficacy."

THE MILITARY CONFERENCE OF JANUARY 27, 1945

The modifications were subsequently spelled out during one of those daily meetings that took place at the Führer's headquarters, which had been moved under the Berlin Chancellery.

It was January 27, 1945. In addition to the ever present darlings of the regime—Göring, Goebbels, and Bormann—twenty-five officers from the General Staff of the Wehrmacht and an unrecorded number of unidentifiable S.S. "experts" were also present. At first Hitler discussed aimlessly and at some length certain indications that had appeared in the neutral press concerning a coming rupture in the Allied camp and the consequent possibilities of offering a separate peace with Germany, in order to thwart the danger of Soviet occupation of eastern Europe. After finishing his absurdly optimistic political overview, the unconquerable warlord made it clear, however, that should the Anglo-American demands prove to be unacceptable, the alternative suggested by Gauleiter Hofer should be seriously considered. This would either induce the stubborn Western Allies to take milder counsel or enable Germany to continue the war in the unfortunate case that the Allies did not propose to reverse the front. The second part of the meeting was in fact dedicated to examining and perfecting the secret plan.[37]

Gauleiter Friedrich Rainer, High Civil Commissioner for the coastal zone of Croatia, was assigned the responsibility, which remained on paper owing to the swift development of events, of extending the eastern frontiers of the fortress to the district of Carinthia, where atomic research was being carried on by a number of Viennese experts who had been evacuated to the south the preceding spring and were working under the supervision of the S.S. Technical General Staff. The defensive perimeter was also to include western Styria and most of Salzburg—the latter because of the possibilities offered by its intricate network of lakes and the numerous abandoned salt mines in the Saltzkammergut, some of which had already been used in 1944 to hide certain essential war industries.

The Alpine Redoubt thus came to include the following: Upper Bavaria, the Allgäuern Alps, the Vorarlberg, the Tyrol, Berchtesgaden, Salzburg, Carinthia, western Styria, Trentino, and the Dolomites—much too large an area, considering the crucial factor of time. Other minor “islands,” either for a last-ditch stand or for holding up the gigantic Allied pincers movement on Germany and causing confusion, were set up in Norway, the Harz Mountains, the Böhmerwald, the Bayerischerwald, and the Schwartzwald.[38]

In spite of the well-known conformism in the Hitlerian entourage, there were nevertheless some differences of opinion. The Chief of the General Staff of the Wehrmacht, General Jodl, was flatly opposed to the idea of fortifying the areas bordering on the Swiss frontier, fearing an unfavorable reaction from the Swiss government. (He later reiterated his view in a personal letter to Himmler.[39]) In the end it was decided to furnish that delicate sector with tiny prefabricated concrete forts, called Kugelstände, which would be dug into the earth by night in such a way that they would be practically invisible even from quite close.[40]

After the general plan of operations was laid out—including a plan for the simultaneous withdrawal of fighting units and the assignment of special jobs to various persons attending the conference—Hitler made it clear as he was leaving that if the deteriorating situation made it necessary, he would assume command of the Alpine Redoubt on April 20, the day of his fifty-sixth birthday.

UNDERGROUND AIRFIELDS AND FACTORIES

In order to protect the north-central edge of the fortress, which ran along flat land for a certain distance west of the Ammersee, it was decided to construct three gigantic underground airfields in the Iglingerwald in record time.

What with the coming of vertical take-off, this Cyclopean enterprise will probably remain unique in the annals of military engineering. It was planned by the Führer as a corollary to the decisions taken with respect to the Alpine Redoubt. Headed by Speer, the principal persons in charge of war production were called to the Berlin Chancellery. Hitler discussed in detail the "U Plan," which the Todt engineers had prepared fourteen months earlier. This plan provided the blueprint for putting the factories of the vast Messerschmitt aircraft complex of Augsburg, which had already been hard hit by Allied bombardments, completely underground.

The modifications made necessary by the new war situation dealt principally with the extension of the enormous roof so that it would also cover the runway opposite the opening of the original construction in order to protect the jet fighters at take-off and landing, since it had been noted that at these times the planes were so vulnerable that their superiority in the air over ordinary enemy fighters was virtually canceled.

For several years no fewer than 120 ammunition dumps of the Waffenamt had been operating completely undisturbed in the Iglingerwald, camouflaged with topsoil and planted with bushes and pines. This circumstance, together with the possibility of being able to use some of these bunkers as advanced forts, weighed in favor of choosing the same locality. The go-ahead was given, first for the excavation of the underground areas and then for the erection of bombproof armor consisting of concrete reinforced with millions of steel rods.

The northern portion of Construction No. 1 was supposed to hold the assembly lines for the ME-163 jet fighters and the ME-262 turbine fighters, with a combined projected production rate of 900 units a month. In this same area, and enclosed by a thick vertical block of concrete, were also installed the tools for repairing and refitting the aircraft, which were normally kept in the southern portion. In the center a cement runway would permit the ME-163s, with their short runs, to take off, while for the ME-262s, with their longer runs and auxiliary rocket boosters for take-off, it was planned to lengthen the runway outside and protect it with the bombproof canopy.[41]

The S.S. summarily selected the prisoners who were still capable of heavy work from Dachau and neighboring concentration camps. In all, the S.S. collected more than 20,000 laborers and quickly brought them to the new grouping center of Kaufering. Hidden by thick trees and working mostly by night—one of the aims of the increasing appearance of the Foo Fighters (alias Feuerbälle) was to hamper Allied night reconnaissance, which was fanning out dangerously close to Bavaria—these masses of ill-fed unfortunates, bitten by the winter cold, finished the excavation of the first airfield in the second half of February.[42]

With the work still proceeding under cover of darkness, cement for the foundations began to be poured on March 1, but a time study then showed that the work would not be completed until the first part of August. Construction on the other two airfields, side by side about a mile away, was slowed down in order to concentrate most of the workers and material on the first, and so improve the schedule.

One of the secondary airfields was supposed to serve also as the operating base for the pilotless rocket fighters in a state of advanced preparation at the Messerschmitt factories in Oberammergau, and for other revolutionary types of antiaircraft weaponry “related” to today’s UFOs that were being developed by the Zeppelin Werke under contract to the S.S. Technical General Staff but were still not ready for large-scale use.

On the southern boundary of the Redoubt, which was especially protected by the jagged slopes of the Italian side, the attention of the German General Staff focused on the Dolomite caves, which could be further developed quickly and easily.

Nevertheless, in an area that should have been only a neutral strip, maintained as a kind of no man’s land by the constant deterrent barrages characteristic of positional warfare—which was precisely the type of warfare that the Redoubt entailed—the Germans continued to operate, and indeed, to develop, right up to the end what their accidental discoverer (an officer of the Eighth Army) justly called “two of the most ingenious war factories in Europe.” They “operated within 100 yards of the Allied Armies for several months, yet were never discovered, even though Allied aeroplanes passed over the area almost every day.”[43]

The seventy-four tunnels of the highway on the west side of Lake Garda, which had been dug out of the living rock overhanging the lake, had been transformed under Speer’s orders into an underground complex for the assembly-line production of piston engines and propellers for aircraft. In operation since the fall of 1944, the plant was put under the care of technical personnel from Fiat. In the six tunnels of the eastern branch of the same highway, that is, on the opposite shore of the lake, and similarly well camouflaged and protected, the Caproni industrial complex was busy turning out aircraft parts (air frames, fuselages, and other parts).

A tiny narrow-gauge railway (slightly under thirty inches) was constructed directly on the highway surface and connected the various tunnels with one another. It was so well camouflaged that it was almost invisible at a few yards' distance. Besides, the tunnels' protection even in the improbable case of being spotted from the air was perfectly insured by the mountains above. Most of them were in fact dug under a solid layer of rock sixty-five to a hundred feet thick.

The original industrial complex was supplied mainly by carefully camouflaged boats that linked it by night with Riva, Desenzano, and Peschiera, so that in case of necessity it could be totally isolated from the Po Plains.[44] This plant was supposed, consequently, to become the only supplier of conventional planes for the forces occupying the Redoubt, while jets would be supplied mainly by the underground factories in the Bavarian Alps and others that were already in operation in the planned "resistance island" in the Harz-Thuringerwald, in other words, by the enormous underground complexes of Nordhausen and Kahla.

In addition, the seven northern tunnels on the western side of the Garda highway in the area of Limone, which were still hurriedly being got ready at the time of the armistice, were earmarked for the production of certain special weapons that were about to be released from their final test phase at the experimental center of the Hermann Göring Institut (L.F.A.) in Riva del Garda.

In spite of the fact that its further development was not carried out, it has been demonstrated that in January 1945, for at least a part of the Nazi hierarchy—those inclined toward war to the last man—the Alpine Redoubt project became a dramatic alternative. In spite of the difficulties caused by the military situation and the culpable, lukewarm zeal shown by political leaders, an extremist minority of second-echelon leaders tried, in fact, to translate the Redoubt into reality. They began by transferring the most recent war inventions still in developmental stages to the Redoubt, where they would later be manufactured on a large scale and used to support the final counteroffensive. The reports of the British Intelligence Technical Staff on electronic, atomic, aeronautic, and rocket applications of Nazi science that were written immediately after the war, and that traced German industrial activity during the first quarter of 1945, frequently contain such significant annotations as the following: "Documents removed [or destroyed] by the S.S. before its retreat toward the Bavarian Alps," or "Plans [or models] removed by S.S. men to the mountain areas in the south of the Reich."

Nor was that all. Beginning at that moment certain secret devices that still required a few months or more of experimentation were used against the Allies in order to gain time and buttress those absurd hopes of a second chance.

NOTES

1. Cf. the following report from the American press on October 29, 1953: at 2:00 A.M. during night-flying exercises over Hempstead, Long Island, the pilots of two F-94 jet fighters sighted a large, motionless object glowing whitely some miles ahead. One of the fighters attempted to outflank it. But perhaps the occupants of the object spotted it, for the strange machine suddenly turned in a tight circle that would intersect the flight path of the pursuer. Already flying at full speed, the fighter tried to approach more closely by increasing its speed in the turn to a dangerous point, but the UFO continued on its intersecting line. The machine "allowed" itself to be followed for eight minutes, then it climbed at supersonic speed and disappeared. The two pilots were inclined to think that it was "some new revolutionary kind of invention, directed by something or someone that maintained visual contact with us and had on tap speeds and powers beyond any plane known in the United States." But it is more probable that what was involved was mainly greater maneuverability as a result of the different flight dynamics of the saucers.

2. The four-engined British Lancasters in operation over the Continent in 1944 carried no less than 1200 pounds of radio and electrical equipment, subdivided into fifteen different apparatuses—for communication in flight and on the ground with the crew and the different planes in the command, for blind flying, scrambling, ground-control approach (G.C.A.), flight toward the objective (G.E.E.), radar scanning of the territory being flown over (H.2.S.), in-flight survey of the direction-finder bearing, identification of enemy planes (I.F.F.), and radar sensing of the attacking enemy (A.I. Look-follow), in which the locating apparatus is locked in on the intercepting plane and follows its movements as long as it remains within the effective radius of this small auxiliary radar. Finally, there was the Mountain Goat, a sonic indicator of fixed and moving objects; it was later replaced by an electronic anticollision device that not only signaled the nearness or approach of any stationary or moving obstacle that could endanger the flight of the bomber, but also revealed the formation of distant storm clouds.

3. In 1943 the Spanner already provided an extraordinarily clear picture—greenish, as with all equipment of that type—within a radius of fifteen miles and was fairly efficient up to a maximum radius of eighty miles. Beyond that the picture quickly went out of focus.

4. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, German Infrared Telescopes (Report No. CXXXI-37, London, H.M.S.O., 1947); British Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, German Bolometers (Report No. 215, London, H.M.S.O., 1947).

5. In spite of fair results, the project was temporarily dropped because the "search head" was not sufficiently reliable.

6. A recent book exhuming these apparitions merits a few lines of comment because it gives a further sample of the wild thought patterns of ufologists. See Vincent Gaddis, Mysterious Fires and Lights (New York, Dell Publishing Co., 1968), pp. 25–27. The author writes: "The foo fighters that followed and teased World War II planes were tenuous, luminous balls or spheres that acted like curious, playful animals.

"The suggestion that some UFOs may be animals—i.e., life-forms or animate creatures indigenous to rarefied atmospheres or possibly space itself—may seem fantastic at first. Actually it is a logical theory that answers many questions about the behavior of some UFOs and strange lights.

"I have a friend, Curtis Fuller, who is president of two publishing companies. A friend of his, who for obvious reasons prefers to remain anonymous, is a top biologist at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Dayton, Ohio, headquarters of the Air Force's UFO investigation, the Air Matériel Command, and a number of scientific development projects.

". . . our biologist suggests that some UFOs are space creatures—a form of life new to man that may feed on pure energy, and has adapted itself to living high in the atmosphere."

The eminent biologist had, however, been preceded along this path by other eminent investigators who, with minor modifications, had put forth the same absurdities, although with fewer "scientific" details and consequently with less success. John P. Bessor "states that he evolved the theory in 1946 and presented it to the Air Force in July, 1947. An officer in the Press and Radio Section, in acknowledging the submission, said it was 'one of the most intelligent theories we have received.' . . .

"[Bessor] thinks at least some of the things we call UFOs usually make their appearance after some sort of disturbance like volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, or atomic explosions. 'Whatever they are,' he adds, 'I suspect they just come down to look us over. I believe they are harmless or we would have had trouble with them long ago.'" Apparently they "come down to look us over" in order to discover the causes of the disturbances; that is, to investigate us and our activities—and then take some kind of action with respect to the people causing the disturbances?

Gaddis' book lists various people who have thought up such theories, impartially giving each his due. It remains, however, to establish why in the world these "stratospheric dragons" or Foo Birds chose to dog American fighters and reconnaissance planes operating in the very limited southern sector of the French front.

7. See Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Interrogation of Professor Scherzer of the B.H.F. (Report No. XXXII-87, London, H.M.S.O., 1945).

8. By way of keeping the secret while it was still in the project stage, the name Feuerhall was also given to a ground radar apparatus constructed by the Post Dienstelle F of the German Ministry of Posts, which was actually used in the war—apparently in defense of the refineries of Leuna—even before the flying mechanism was perfected.

9. In fact, it was not an imaginary danger. The Foo Fighters did contain a strong explosive charge to destroy them in flight in case serious damage to the automatic guidance system made it impossible for the operators to control it. It seems, however, that during the time they were last seen, at least one American flyer opened fire on a Foo Fighter from a safe distance without succeeding in shooting it down, although he had it well within his sights. A convincing detail, this, especially in view of the fact that under the armored covering of the Foo Fighters there was a thin sheet of aluminum attached to it (but electrically insulated) that acted as a switch. When a bullet pierced the exterior covering, contact between the two sheets was established and the consequent closing of the circuit that operated the maximum acceleration device of the craft (generally in a vertical direction) caused the Foo Fighter to fly off, taking it out of the range of further enemy fire.

10. The F.F.O. was an important government institution in operation thirty miles south of Munich with about eight hundred technicians conducting research in the fields of high frequency, guided missiles, radar, infrared radiation, and electronics in general. It was under the direction of Professor Dieckman until the autumn of 1944 and under Dr. Ahrens afterwards.

11. Before it was decentralized in the Schwartzwald, the Zeppelin Werke had already done secret work in the field of radar. It had built parabolic reflectors for ground radio position finders, attracting the attention of the Intelligence Service and so of the R.A.F. to its Friedrichshafen factories near the Swiss border. (The first heavy bombing raid of sixty four-engined Lancasters was expressly ordered by Churchill on the recommendation of the Central Interpretation Unit, Photographic Intelligence, and took place on June 20, 1943.) The British Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee reports of British investigation committees in Germany (1945–1946) on the Zeppelin Werke’s production are still classified documents.

12. For information on the German klystron tubes see Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committtee, Establishments of the Forschungsanstalt der Deutschen Reichpost (Report No. XXX-1, London, H.M.S.O, 1946).

13. The radio-jamming devices installed on the Grosser Feldberg also operated in the field of the shortest waves, covering all the wave lengths used by the Anglo-American apparatuses for radar scanning of the terrain over which they were flying and for long-distance control of the course of their bombing formations (the H.2.S., Oboe, Rebecca-Eureka). Through the usual spy channels the news reached London that the first examples of the Roderich radio jammer, which represented the best that German radio technology could produce, had arrived at the center. These apparatuses—designed by the Austrian branch of the Ferdinand Braun Institut, in Gaisberg bei Salzburg, and built by Siemens—simultaneously covered the two shortest enemy wave lengths (nine and three centimeters), constituting a serious obstacle for bombers that operated over most of western Germany. The R.A.F.’s photographic aerial spotting and 120 four-engined Lancasters wrote finis to the matter. (For further information on the Roderich, see Report V of the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Institutes of the Bevollmächtiger für Hochfrequenz-Forschung [Report No. XXXI-137, London, H.M.S.O., 1945].)

14. The Tedder Plan, which was an additional support to the offensive that had been in action for some time against German fuel production, went into action, in fact, in the first weeks of November, after Germany had been divided into nine zones in which the total destruction of all transport was to be gradually effected. This proscriptive policy reached its culmination on February 22, 1945, when—within the framework of Operation Clarion, which was designed to break any Nazi will to resist to the bitter end—9000 planes swarmed over Germany, destroying over two hundred rail centers. Thus the entire production of the last two months of the war, which was about to be sent to the front or to assembly plants, was destroyed or lay unused in freight cars on torn-up roadbeds. This operation virtually guaranteed the collapse of the German war machine.

15. Although they had many well-equipped planes, in the fall of 1944 the German night-fighter squadrons entered into action only in defense of major objectives and without much success because they were short of fuel and nearly always “blinded” by the British antiradar devices, which members of the 100th Bomber Group operated with extraordinary skill. After the Grosser Feldberg was bombed, the low technical efficiency of their night fighters forced the Germans to throw all the electronic defense devices of the Feuer series (which was still in the experimental stage) into action prematurely. In addition to the Feuerball, this meant its ground operated equivalent, the Lorentz-Siemens Feuermolch (Fire Salamander)—a device designed by the technicians of the Irschenberg branch of the Ferdinand Braun Institut—and of the Feuerland (Fire Land), a subsidiary device manufactured by Blaupunkt in Berlin-Wilhelmsdorf, for jamming radio communications on board. According to Dr. Gunther Breukopf of Blaupunkt, it is doubtful that the Feuerland was used by any front-line units, while from the British intelligence reports on German industry we learn that during the last months of the war no fewer than fifty Feuermolch devices were in use on the Western Front.

They were destroyed one after the other by the personnel to whom they were issued on precise instructions from the S.S. Technical General Staff.

16. Altogether "38,000 aircraft of all types" were built in 1944, a figure never achieved in any other war year. In the month of September alone, "3013 single-engine fighter aircraft, newly built or repaired," were delivered to the German fighter branch.

". . . And this after a year of systematic raids! In the summer of 1944 alone the Allies dropped 18,500 tons of bombs on the German aircraft industry. After the 'Big Week' [February 19–25, 1944: Operation Argument], which was supposed to be the death blow to our armament, Speer had contrived the reconstruction and the dispersal of the industry. So far it had been concentrated in twenty-seven larger works arranged on production, technical, and economical lines. Now it was spread over 729 medium and very small plants. Some were situated in tunnels, caves, or disused mines, some were hidden in forests, ravines, and villages. . . . The unbelievable difficulties of bringing air armament to such heights by "home industries' are impossible to describe. . . ." See General Adolf Galland, The First and the Last (New York, Ballantine Books, 1967, pp. 192, 237–38). The attrition in aircraft and the reduced production caused by the military defeats were, however, absolutely appalling. In the summer of 1944, following the Allied landings in Normandy, the Luftwaffe lost on the average 5000 planes a week, either through bombardment on the ground or in air actions covering the retreat. Thus in August it had a force of 1500 fighters. In spite of intensive production, in January 1945 only 2000 fighters were delivered to the flying detachments.

17. It has been historically established that after the heavy British night raids during the spring of 1942, Hitler refused even to consider Field Marshal Milch's proposal to strengthen the fighter building program, ordering instead that all priority be given to bombers for reprisal against England. General Galland (see Chapter 28, "The Jet-fighter Tragedy," in the book cited above) declared that in mid-1943—after an exhilarating test flight in one of the preproduction ME-262s and the forwarding of a detailed report to Hitler—he had hoped the Führer would change his foolish stand, but when "the next days passed without any news or orders from above," he "had an idea that our hopes for a quick development of the German jet fighter would not be realized. Hitler had refused to give his sanction. He had already conceived a great distrust of Göring and the Luftwaffe, and wanted to convince himself personally about the soundness of our proposal. He told Göring—and not without justification—that the Luftwaffe had disappointed him too often in the past with promises and announcements of technical innovations and improvements. The heavy bomber, the HE-177, had been promised him not later than 1941, and even today no one could foresee when this aircraft would go into action. The fact that he did not call any member of the Luftwaffe to the conference of experts that he held showed how great Hitler's distrust really was. He even forbade their participation. [Göring] took this obvious affront quite passively. . . . [Hitler] ordered that the technical tests of the ME-262 should be continued with a few prototypes, expressly forbidding any kind of preparation for mass production. This far-reaching decision was taken without the agreement of the Supreme Commander of the Luftwaffe. Thereby the production of the ME-262 [which had already experienced a delay of nearly a year as a result of Hitler's personal order in the autumn of 1940 to suspend the research—because, according to him, the war was about to end with the "inevitable" surrender [of the British] received a further delay of six months. . . . I believe that in this way about eighteen months were lost in the development of the ME-262. . . ."

18. Sauer was director of the Armament Office under Speer.

19. At the time of the armistice there existed, in fact, some 138 different projects involving flying bombs designed for strategic bombing, tactical use, antiaircraft and antiship fire, and, to remain in the strictly aeronautic field, over seventy types of jet planes, built in restricted production runs, as prototypes or, mostly, merely designed by various firms and institutes controlled by Speer.

20. See General Galland, in the book cited in note 16: In April 1944 the program for emergency aircraft production was shown to Göring, who was in the Obersalzberg. "Bomber production had been curtailed, and the production of many other types was to be stopped. Night and day fighters were to be made as one unified type, which also had to meet the requirements of the other branches of the Luftwaffe. The quantities which were planned were absolutely adequate to the Anglo-American aircraft production. I was present at this memorable conference. I had the impression that Göring listened to Sauer's disquisition with a premeditated attitude, on Hitler's orders. He . . . replied immediately with many and definite objections. The radical curtailment of the bomber program, especially that of the HE-177 and JU-88 and their further development, was regarded by him as impossible and he rejected it; on the contrary he demanded an increase and a guarantee of a minimum production of 400 HE-177 and 500 Junker bombers a month. This was, of course, possible only if the originally planned fighter production were heavily cut. Speer's fighter program was changed according to Göring's directives and came into force eight days later in its diluted form. . . . The production of bombers went on at an increased rate. They could not prevent the raids on our synthetic petrol plants which started a little later, as a stronger fighter force could have done [by bombing airstrips in England and liberated France], In the end there was not enough petrol for the test flights of the bombers when they came from the assembly belt; they had to be wrecked on the benches where they had been built [in order to recover material that could be reused]. The Anglo-American air force crossed the bomber off the German armament plans." The same technological and strategic idiocy—disastrous because it reflected, if indeed it did not come directly from, the highest political source—kept even the field of German radio location, which might have wholly outclassed the adversary's, in a constant state of inferiority with respect to the Anglo-Americans. On August 8, 1942, General Wolfgang Martini had unsuccessfully requested scientists working on high frequency waves to prepare radar apparatuses that would work on centimeter waves. It was only when a British fourengined plane equipped with one of the first H.2.S. radars was shot down in the vicinity of Rotterdam during the night of February 2–3, 1943, that the General Staff experts were convinced that centimeter waves were deciding the outcome of the war. As with the jet fighters, the "counteroffensive" waged by German radio scientists was now also hamstrung because it was "too late," and the ingenious Feuerball, Feuermolch, and Roderick devices were only palliatives that could not improve a situation that had become desperate (cf. Caius Bekker, Radar-Duell im Dunkell).

21. See J. Nobecourt, Le dernier coup de dés de Hitler (Paris, Robert Laffont, 1962), Chapter II: "The politicalization of the Wehrmacht had, however, begun before July 20th. During the winter of 1943–1944, Martin Bormann was, like Himmler, conducting a personal campaign through his leadership of the N.S.F.O. (Nationalsozialistischen Führungsoffiziere, Party workers assigned to the army as 'political commissars'). After July 20th he had the ranks and prerogatives of combat officers conferred upon them. Their official job was to verify the officers' degree of Nazi fervor, but in reality they worked solely to extend the personal influence of Bormann in the land forces. [The Luftwaffe was Göring's "fief;" the Navy was traditionalist and did not put up with political interference.] Allied only in appearance, in the summer of 1944 both he and Himmler aimed at the conquest of power after their common enemies—Göring, Ribbentrop, the Wehrmacht generals, and their direct supporters—were progressively eliminated."

22. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Natter Interceptor Project (Report No. XXX-107, London, H.M.S.O., 1945). Because of an aerodynamic defect, the first test flight of the Natter ended in a disaster that brought about the death of the pilot, Lothar Sieber, but about a month later over Hannover on March 29, 1945, during the only attack made with the Natter craft—officially called the Bachem BP-20—Sergeant Ernest Hemmer piloted one of the first preproduction models against a formation of four-engined Liberators and succeeded in downing two and damaging a third.

23. The S.S. Air Corps had been formed in November 1944 with 150 volunteers—who became known as S.O.M. (Selbstoffer Manner, i.e., Self-sacrificers)—taken from the ranks of the Waffen S.S. and sent to the special training center of Friedenthal, run by the famous Colonel Otto Skorzeny, to be instructed in piloting the Reichemberg flying bombs (modified V-1s) against special objectives, with a (theoretical) possibility of escape before impact. Göring and Goebbels had enthusiastically approved the formation of this body, impressed by the actions of the Japanese Kamikaze. In October they had also supported with similar fervor the proposal of Colonel General Keller, commander of the Nationalsozialistichen Flieger Korps (National Socialist Aviators' Corps), to form assault squadrons composed of young men drawn from the ranks of the Hitler Jugend and equipped with the jet turbine HE-162 Volksjäger then under construction. Full-scale preparation of this "People's Fighter" having been delayed by technical difficulties, it was then decided—despite the outspoken hostility of Fighter General Galland and War Production Minister Speer, on the grounds of humanity and of the doubtful utility of the proposal—to use those sixteen-to-eighteen-year-olds, who had no serious military or flight training, in a series of desperate actions to support the air defense of Germany itself and the counteroffensives being planned for the Western Front. A number of aircraft firms were urgently asked to submit bids for the immediate preparation of light, simplified emergency planes, very fast but inexpensive, since they would be built mostly of wood, and relatively efficient though not very safe. Among the plans approved and in part already realized (but only in the prototype stage, of course) by April 1945 were the following: air-towed glider-bombers, tiny rocket interceptors (the Junkers JU-EF-128 Wally), assault planes (the JU-EF-126 Elli, derived from the V-1 and the ME-328 Messerschmitt with a double pulsejet), and rocket-engined glider fighters (the ME-P-1104 and the Heinkel HE-P-1077 Julia). In addition there were revolutionary types of piloted antiaircraft bombs and "flying rams," the latter designed to break off the tails of enemy bombers by ramming into them at high speed, without, in theory at least, harm to the pilot, who would be enclosed in a heavily armored cockpit (the rocket interceptor Arado AR Flugstosser, the Zeppelin plane-slicing rocket fighter, the Daimler-Benz DB-P-5 disposable fighter with a ramjet engine and auxiliary rockets similar in appearance to the flying bombs, and a modified version of the Natter). In addition to blocking the slaughter of the boys, the end of the hostilities fortunately prevented the S.S. Air Corps from being enlarged by enrolling these units, akin in duty and ideals, and from putting its semisuicidal plans into action.

24. Since it had been granted full powers, the high command of the S.S. secretly began to set up the S.S. Technical General Staff, modeled on the official body with the same name that Speer had created at the beginning of 1944 to plan war production and that had replaced the old system of ministerial orders to industry with the principle of direct military-industrial interdependence. Speer's Technical General Staff gathered into a sort of "industrial high command" the best talents from industry and technology, with long manufacturing experience, to whom the needs of the various armed forces were directly presented for immediate solution. It was made up of twenty-one special committees that controlled the production of raw materials and the distribution of work through twelve liaison offices. The entire technical body was comprised of some six thousand engineers and experts of various sorts (consultants), each one a specialist in a particular area. As a result, the whole bureaucratic compartmentalization existing between industries was broken down, along with manufacturing secrets and monopolies on patents and special processes, thus making available to all the firms manufacturing a given product any and all experience and progress achieved by any of them individually. Despite the delays caused by frictions that stemmed from by-passing ministerial ranks and stepping on the toes of powerful interests, the system in general worked quite well, and production became uniform throughout the nation, assuring identical products, interchangeability of parts, and stable production figures even during the heaviest phases of the Allied bombardments. In addition, very often some technical discovery that had previously been held exclusively by one factory and was turned over to one of the special committees was now not only mass produced but further improved by some other factory in the same field. (For example, the Junkers firm produced a markedly improved version of Messerschmitt's famous ME-163 rocket-engined fighter, the JU-263.) We have no information on the structure and composition of the S.S. Technical General Staff under Gruppenführer Hans Kammler, which doubtless had a smaller staff than and far different aims from Speer's organization. Nevertheless, from certain documents collected by the American "Alsos" Mission (an organization created to carry out the preliminary sifting of industrial and scientific—particularly atomic—information about Germany and German-occupied countries), it appears that during the war Kammler's group held its meetings at the S.S. command in Northeim in Hannover.

25. The slogan that was current in Nazi circles at the beginning of 1945 was that it was necessary to win "the Battle of Time." Because of a whole series of erroneous technical and military decisions that the Führer imposed, the Allies won it instead. To better understand the unfolding of subsequent events, let us examine a few examples of measures that came too late or that were counterproductive and thereby lost precious time. Only in the fall of 1943 was the entire textile production in the Reich stopped and the factories converted to arms manufacture. On the basis of an agreement between Speer and Bichelonne, Minister of Industry in the Vichy government, French textile manufacturers had to work exclusively according to German orders, thereby freeing German plants for arms production, which was being decentralized in order to escape bombardment. Thus some Berlin factories making radar apparatus were immediately evacuated to the textile plants in southern Silesia and part of the machinery that survived the attack on the Zeppelin Werke found a temporary refuge in spinning mills in the Black Forest. Other measures contributed to the dispersion of the ball-bearing industry. Again it was only at the end of 1943 that plans were made to move the giant Bayerische Motoren Werke (B.M.W.)—too late to keep a considerable part of the machinery from being destroyed or lying unused for some time in the new locations. Besides, the move did not get really under way until the late spring of 1945, a delay that led to the S.S.'s arrest of Dr. Zipprich, the director of B.M.W., who was held responsible. (Nevertheless, his successor, Dr. Bruckman, later declared that in his view "the best system of decentralization still remains a strong Luftwaffe"!) Cf. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Bavarian Motor Works (B.M.W.), A Production Survey (Report No. XXX-80, London, H.M.S.O., 1945). Besides, these efforts to decentralize manufacturing plants often truly became labors of Sisyphus. For example, following the stepping up of air attacks and after stormy internal arguments aggravated by S.S. meddling, the gas-turbine section of B.M.W., which was originally located in the Berlin suburb of Spandau, was transferred lock, stock, and barrel to the underground plant of Wittringen in the vicinity of Saarbrücken, but the liberation of France in the fall of the same year (1944) forced it to leave the area and disappear into seven abandoned salt mines at Neu Stassfurt in Thuringia and in the Harz Mountains. Cf. Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Gas Turbine Development: B.M.W., Junkers, Daimler-Benz (Report No. XXIV-6, London, H.M.S.O., 1945). Another significant example from among many is offered by the chain removals of the Steyr-Daimler-Puch A.G., which manufactured Daimler-Benz high-powered aircraft piston engines on license, beginning in 1944. After the main plant in Steyr was bombed, the machinery was set up in the suburbs around Vienna, but air raids on Vienna were resumed, and in May the firm moved to the underground warehouse of a large brewery in Budapest. When the move was completed and the factory was finally getting ready to produce large numbers of the new DB-605-D engine, the Russians began their push toward Hungary, forcing the directors to retrace the steps of their evacuation until the original main plant in Steyr was started up again—which was achieved just before the final collapse. Naturally, the whole thing was accompanied by a notable drop in production. See British Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Report on a Visit to Daimler-Benz A.G. at Stuttgart-Unterturkheim (B.I. O.S., Final Report No. 35, London, H.M.S.O., 1946).

26. See Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Underground Factories in Central Germany (Report No. XXXII-17, London, H.M.S.O., 1945).

27. Unimpeachable evidence is offered by General Galland, who writes: "Operation orders for the ME-262s now [in the first week of April 1945] changed daily. . . . The time of commissioners, special commissioners, ambassadors of the Führer, commissars, and special commissariats had started. All who were to increase production of the industry or to coordinate operations were appointed subordinate to each other, equal to each other, and over each other. From February until March the jet-fighter command went partly over to the SA. From their ranks came the so-called Commissariat of the Führer for Jet Aircraft, a general of the Waffen SS. Hitler had appointed him although Göring in his turn had appointed a Special Commissioner for Jet Aircraft."

28. See Samuel A. Goudsmit, "The Efficiency of German Industry," Chapter XV (pp. 214–231) in the volume Alsos (New York, Schuman, 1947).

29. William L. Shirer, the well-informed American historian of the Third Reich—see Chapter XXX, "The Conquest of Germany" in The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1959)—wrote apropos of this: ". . . Eisenhower and his staff at SHAEF were obsessed at this moment with the urgency of heading southeast after the junction with the Russians in order to capture the so-called National Redoubt, where it was believed Hitler was gathering his remaining forces to make a last stand in the almost impenetrable Alpine mountains of southern Bavaria and western Austria.

"The 'National Redoubt' was a phantom. It never existed except in the propaganda blasts of Dr. Goebbels and in the cautious minds at Eisenhower's headquarters which had fallen for them. As early as March 11, SHAEF intelligence had warned Eisenhower that the Nazis were planning to make an impregnable fortress in the mountains and that Hitler himself would command its defenses from his retreat at Berchtesgaden. The icy mountain crags were ‘practically impenetrable,’ it said. ‘Here, defended by nature and by the most efficient secret weapons yet invented, the powers that have hitherto guided Germany will survive to reorganize her resurrection; here armaments will be manufactured in bombproof factories, food and equipment will be stored in vast underground caverns and a specially selected corps of young men will be trained in guerrilla warfare, so that a whole underground army can be fitted and directed to liberate Germany from the occupying forces.’

“It would almost seem as though the Allied Supreme Commander’s intelligence staff had been infiltrated by British and American mystery writers. At any rate, this fantastic appreciation was taken seriously at SHAEF, where Eisenhower’s chief of staff, General Bedell Smith, mulled over the dread possibility ‘of a prolonged campaign in the Alpine area’ which would take a heavy toll of American lives and prolong the war indefinitely.

“This was the last time that the resourceful Dr. Goebbels succeeded in influencing the strategic course of the war by propaganda bluff.” Cf. also Chester Wilmot’s The Struggle for Europe (New York, Harper, 1952).

30. Cf. Wilhelm Hoettl (Walter Hagen), Die Geheime Front (Linz, 1950): “In autumn 1944 our central office in Berlin [the Gestapo] was informed of the existence of an American office in Switzerland that went far beyond the activities of a simple intelligence service. It turned out that it was run by the lawyer Allen Welsh Dulles . . . and his true activity had been camouflaged by accrediting him as the representative of Minister Harrison in Berne. . . . The men who ran the German Secret Service then tried to get in touch with this individual and succeeding in so doing thanks to support from a big Austrian businessman and the German air attaché in Berne.
. . . For us Germans it was important at least to try to convince the Americans that for the future of Europe we should not give up vital parts of the territories of Germany and Austria to the Soviets. And so it was decided that the Americans should be informed of how Russia was doublecrossing her

Western allies by turning over certain documents containing concrete proof. Subsequently the basis of the negotiations shifted to a completely different sphere. For some time we had been informed that the Anglo-American General Staff was very much afraid of continued German resistance in the so-called Alpine Redoubt. According to the information gathered by the Allied secret services, this réduit, as the Swiss called it, comprised large areas of the alpine massif of northern Italy and of Austria as well as a strip of land of considerable size in front of it. With reason, Allied military experts considered that it was possible for the Germans to hold off the Allied armies for a long time from that position. In fact, it would not have been able to seize this alpine region turned into a sort of huge fortress without serious difficulty, even in the period of atom bombs and rockets, without using special mountain troops, of which the Allies were almost totally devoid in 1945. . . . In any case, the Allies' worries were without foundation. They had arisen because of the rumors that German propaganda had spread and also partly because our intelligence service had succeeded in getting some cleverly falsified documents into the hands of the Allied secret service."

31. In fact, the files of the O.K.W. were subsequently captured more or less intact by the Americans in the Tyrol and parts of the documents were later presented in evidence at the Nuremberg Trials in order to incriminate Wehrmacht generals who were strong Nazis. Cf. Helmut Greiner, Die Oberste Wehrmachtführung (Wiesbaden, 1952).

32. This alludes to the enormous underground complex of the Mittel-werke factories (referred to in the German documents of the time as M-Werke), which was in operation in the Harz Mountains on the edges of the village of Dora, near Nordhausen. It was formed of two broad parallel tunnels each a mile long and connected to one another by sixty-two transverse minor tunnels, giving a total of about twelve miles of underground installations. Shortly before the armistice this complex had begun large-scale manufacture of the V-2 rocket, the V-1 flying bomb, and several types of antiaircraft rockets (principally the Taifun and Föhn types). With its four hundred yards of natural covering, the plant was virtually invulnerable to any aerial attack. In February 1945, the personnel and equipment of the Baltic experimental center at Peenemünde that had been evacuated was partially installed in the neighboring village of Bleicherode Ost, where the plans for the giant two-stage rocket-torpedo A-9/A-10, planned to be used for bombing the United States, were being speeded along. At first occupied by Assault Group B of the U.S. Third Armored Division on April 11, 1945, the zone and its priceless industrial complex were subsequently consigned to the Soviets on the basis of the Yalta agreement.

33. According to the strategic plan hurriedly worked out in February 1945, besides the Waffen S.S. and the paramilitary formations of the Hitler Jugend, what remained of the armies retiring on several fronts was also supposed to take part in the reinforcement of the Alpine Redoubt. These armies were: General Alexander Loehr's army from Greece, which was waiting on the Austro-Yugoslavian frontier; General Lothar Rentulic's army, which was bloodily confronting the Russians on the Austro-Hungarian frontier; Field Marshal Albert Kesselring's Army Group South, for some time dug in on the Gothic Line to guard the Po Plains; Field Marshal Ferdinand Schoerner's group of armies, which held out until the end of May in the mountains of Bohemia; and finally that of Field Marshal Gerd von Rundstedt, who was supposed to extricate himself from the Allied pincers in order to fall back to the Allgäuer Alps through the Black Forest. At the beginning of spring 1945, of the 300 divisions that the Wehrmacht had put in the field to oppose the 96 Anglo-American and 400 Soviet divisions, only 65 divisions, and most of those short of effectives and weapons, were available. A cautious estimate from Allied sources guessed that there were twenty remaining divisions in combat readiness that the Nazis could count on for the effective strengthening of the Alpine Redoubt. To this force, which would have to be reorganized and rearmed from top to bottom, would be added an indefinite number—perhaps twenty-five or more—of Waffen S.S. divisions and the very young soldiers of the Hitler Jugend. In all, a ten- or twelve-to-one disadvantage for the Germans. They held, at least theoretically, that this discrepancy would be mitigated by their taking advantage of the natural barriers hindering the large-scale use of armored units.

34. For an opinion on the reality of the Germans' industrial hopes and possibilities, see Chapter IV of Nobecourt's Le dernier coup de dés de Hitler, under the section entitled "Le mythe des armes secrètes." For greater detail and a more extensive review of the new types of weapons (except for the various aeronautical and antiaircraft discoveries that are described in the present volume and that have until now been wholly or partially unknown), see Major Rudolf Lusar, Die deutschen Waffen und Geheimwaffen des Zweites Weltkrieges (Munich, J. F. Lehmans Verlag, 1958), p. 239; or Colonel Leslie Simon, German Scientific Establishments (Report P.B. 19849, New York, Mapleton House Publications, 1947), p. 228.

35. W. Hoettl (Walter Hagen) has reported that "militarily [in August 1943] the best solution would have been to evacuate the Italian peninsula and create a new defensive line that would follow the Alps and the Po River to the Adriatic. This would require only a minimal force, thereby making at least 300 or 400 thousand well-trained and well-equipped men available for the Russian Front. The passive aspect of the operation would have been represented by the loss of an ally, who was in any case greatly weakened and tired and whose industry was not absolutely essential to our war effort. [All this is correct, but it does not take into account the fact that Anglo-American air bases would be dangerously close to the southern borders of Germany.] Hitler rejected the plan, which appears to have been proposed by a high-ranking Italian officer with Marshal Badoglio's concurrence, declaring that 'it could only be the proposal of an irresponsible defeatist who had betrayed his friend and ally Mussolini.' Revised and presented with the recommendation of the head of the AMT-VI, Gruppenführer S.S. Walter Schellenberg, the plan caused Hitler to explode with fury, and the person who presented it—Obergruppenführer S.S. Ernst Kaltenbrunner, head of the Reich's security services—had a hard job defending the work and person of his subordinate. But in March 1945 Hitler confided to Kaltenbrunner that he was very sorry that he had not accepted the suggestions of the AMT-VI for a 'solution to the Italian question.' Indeed, this solution would have avoided or at least greatly retarded the serious military reverses on the Russian front, insuring that Germany would for some time still receive priceless Rumanian oil, and it would have anticipated much of the plan for the 'Alpine Redoubt.'"

36. The extent and nature of these defensive countermeasures were well known to the Germans as well, thanks to information picked up in Berne military circles by the Reich's ambassador, Koecher. From the outbreak of hostilities in Europe—at the time, that is, of the general defensive mobilization (September 2, 1939)—Swiss military authorities had made a plan for a National Redoubt in the Alps. The plan was being put into effect and strengthened during the course of the war in such a way as to guarantee at least a two-year period of armed resistance against any aggressive act aimed at the Swiss Confederation. The various preventive measures also included the methodical dismantling of factories, the supplies and machinery of which—already accurately inventoried by General Guisan—were to be destroyed, hidden, or transferred to the Redoubt in secret locations when the time came, according to their importance or bulk.

37. Through leaks that were, it appears, fostered by the promoter himself, some of those present were in reality already more or less familiar with the proposal. Indeed, without even waiting for the Führer's approval, a number of moves had been made to sound out the practical possibilities of the plan. Göring was particularly interested in the Berchtesgaden region, perhaps because he was already secretly thinking of going there when military collapse seemed imminent in order to replace Hitler in the government of the Reich and to negotiate with the Allies from a position of strength. Because of his well-known political rashness (which gives us further evidence of the level of organizational inefficiency reached by this baffling personality who inexplicably allowed "his" Luftwaffe to be humiliated and destroyed after having so brilliantly created it), Berchtesgaden, together with the greater part of the Bavarian slope of the Alpine Redoubt, was from a military point of view practically defenseless, harboring only the villas of the Nazi bigwigs with their attendant S.S. men, and a few aircraft companies working on the development of truly revolutionary war discoveries. As for Himmler, he had sent a squadron of geologists from the Ahnenerbe—a sort of academy of sciences for the S.S.—to study the configuration of the mountains in the area insofar as they could be employed in a military defense system modeled on the Swiss National Redoubt. Finally, the staff of the army group operating in Italy, which for some time had been using the dumps in the Dolomite caverns, reexamined the possibility of adapting the military installations of the entire Italian slope of the Alps to resistance from attack from the Po Valley as an expedient in case the "Gothic Line" was broken through.

38. Because of its excessively open geo-strategic position, the Valtellina had been excluded from the plan for the Alpine Redoubt, although in the last days of the war the highest political and military leaders of the Italian Social Republic [Mussolini's government in the north of Italy, formed after he had been liberated by Col. Otto Skorzeny.—Tr.] had decided to make their own "Alpine Redoubt" there and carry on the fight while waiting for the military situation to be reversed, as the Germans promised. Without any genuine permanent fortifications, the Valtellina redoubt was supposed to serve mainly as a center for gathering together the Fascist formations being evacuated from the Po Valley.

39. The Swiss General Staff, which had a highly efficient intelligence network, had, in fact, reinforced the defensive measures in the area of the National Redoubt facing Germany, although after a careful evaluation of the information they had received, they judged the Alpine Redoubt plan as practically unrealizable, or at least as coming too late. Wilhelm

Hoettl reports that "the fact that in the final phase of the conflict a German center of resistance might arise in the proximity of the most delicate of its borders could constitute a serious menace for Switzerland. Especially when certain information obtained from S.H.A.E.F. circles gave them reason to believe that if the Germans were dug in in the Alps the Anglo-American General Staff would bring strong pressure to bear on the Swiss government to induce it to put its highly specialized mountain troops at the disposition of the Allies. Even if this belligerent act had been passed off as a simple, necessary police action, public opinion in neutral Switzerland would not have been able to accept it without serious internal conflict." These were well-founded fears, and they explain and justify the political conduct of the Swiss authorities which favored, with the discretion that the circumstances demanded, the approaches between the emissaries of S.S. General Karl Wolff and American Vice-ambassador Allen W. Dulles for the surrender in Italy of Army Group South (the so-called Operation Sunrise Crossword).

40. The Kugelstand was a hollow spheroid made of reinforced concrete weighing 3740 pounds, with an internal diameter of seven and a half feet, made by joining together six prefabricated parts, constructed according to the designs of the Bavarian firm of Dyckerhof and Widmann, which in November 1944 suggested to the Wehrmacht that these spheroids could serve as easily transportable small forts that could be buried, would not sink in marshy terrain, and were invisible to aerial reconnaissance. Despite their relatively thin shells (one and a half inches), the first experimental models were run over by heavy tanks without suffering any damage. Starting on December 4, twenty factories were supposed to produce them on a large scale with a monthly production of 2500 units per factory. Nevertheless, because of delays in every sector of war production, when the armistice was signed no more than thirty Kugelstand were in operation along the Swiss frontier in the Dornbirn zone. Cf. Section VII, "Fortifications," in the report by the C.I.O.S. Section Intelligence Division Office, German Underground Installations, of General Interest (J.I.O.A. Report No. 3, Washington, September, 1945).

41. To determine the minimum length of the take-off runway, hasty tests were made with the Messerschmitt fighters at the air base of Fürstenfeldbruck, and when the Luftwaffe reported the data requested, the following dimensions were adopted: length of the canopy, 1056 feet; width, 439 feet; height, 146 feet; thickness of the canopy in reinforced concrete, 16 feet, with a further covering of topsoil to bring the total depth of the protective layer to 23 feet. Thus small oblong artificial hills would be created, heavily covered with grassy and woodland vegetation, surrounded by irregular layers simulating natural elevations in the terrain in order to baffle aerial reconnaissance.

42. The almost incredible efficiency in camouflaging the work and the constructions themselves merits special mention, though the Germans were aided in this by a number of heavy snows. Some Intelligence Service agents operating in the Oberbayern area had heard rumors of the project, which the officers of the U.S.A.A.F. intelligence attached to S.H.A.E.F. had called "a wild exaggeration." A number of aerial reconnaissance missions were flown for the extraordinarily well-equipped sections E (recognition of enemy camouflage) and U (underground factories) of the R.A.F. Photographic Intelligence Section of Benson, but the results were completely negative, although the territory between Landsberg and Kaufering was photographed foot by foot. In their final report the British experts declared: "If the aerodromes really exist, they are completely invisible from the air."

44. At one point the work force at the factory had numbered 10,000, but it later tripled with the further influx of a great number of prisoners of war. When the Allies occupied the zone, a considerable quantity of industrial and technological material had been evacuated or hidden in the neighborhood, and some had been stolen or destroyed by escaping prisoners. Nevertheless, the material found in the plants and the complementary stores dug out along the Garda and in the neighboring Dolomites filled eight miles of freight cars.

LEICHTE BEWAFFNETE FLUGSCHEIBE (JÄGER); TYPE „VRIL"
(Schumann-Gruppe)

Durchmesser: 11,5o Meter
Antrieb: Schumann-Levitator (gepanzert)
Steuerung: Mag-Feld-Impulser 3e
Geschwindigkeit: 2900 Kilometer p.Stunde (bisher), bis zu ca. 12000 mögl.
Reichweite (in Flugdauer): 5 1/2 Stunden ((Flug-Aufladung mittels KS von Hauneb aus wird erprobt))
Bewaffnung: 1 8cm KSK, fernsteuerbar, unten, + 2 x Mk 108 u. 2 x MG 17
Außenpanzerung: Doppel-Viktalen
Besatzung: (je nach Einsatzart) 1 bis 3 Mann
Weltallfähigkeit: 100 %
Stillschwebefähigkeit: 12 Minuten
Allgemeine Flugfähigkeit: Wetterunabhängig Tag und Nacht
Grundsätzliche Einsatzreife: ca. Sept. 1944, ev. früher.

VRIL 2 und VRIL 9: Projektiert, aber nicht gebaut!

Some of the earliest forms of UFOs, reported during the 1940s, were the ball of light phenomena known as ‘foo fighters,’ as depicted here.

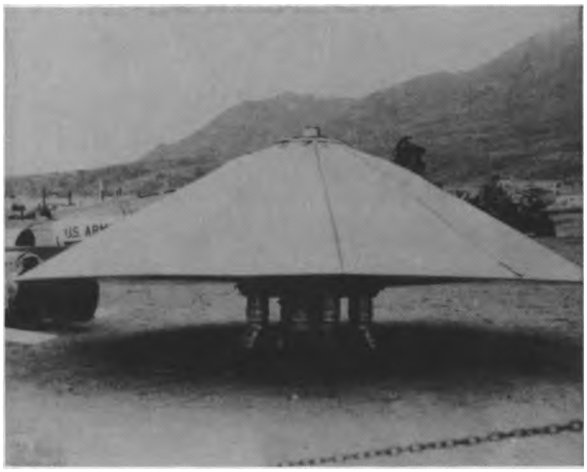
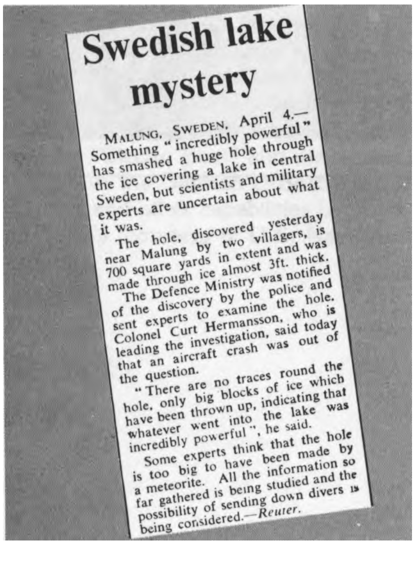
This photograph, taken in 1946, allegedly shows one of the mysterious ‘ghost rockets’ reported over Scandinavia, and indeed all of Europe, in the 1930s and 1940s.

March 1968. This picture was taken at a U.S. Missile Range in White Sands, New Mexico, by a newsman for the Columbus Dispatch. He reported that the device was at least fifteen feet in diameter and was used in a space testing program during the Mars tests.





Swedish lake mystery

MALUNG, SWEDEN, April 4.—Something "incredibly powerful" has smashed a huge hole through the ice covering a lake in central Sweden, but scientists and military experts are uncertain about what it was.

The hole, discovered yesterday near Malung by two villagers, is 700 square yards in extent and was made through ice almost 3ft. thick.

The Defence Ministry was notified of the discovery by the police and sent experts to examine the hole. Colonel Curt Hermansson, who is leading the investigation, said today that an aircraft crash was out of the question.

"There are no traces round the hole, only big blocks of ice which have been thrown up, indicating that whatever went into the lake was incredibly powerful", he said.

Some experts think that the hole is too big to have been made by a meteorite. All the information so far gathered is being studied and the possibility of sending down divers is being considered.—Reuter.

MYSTERY ROCKETS OVER SWEDEN "FOR PRACTICE"

SWEDISH military officials, who have been investigating about 300 reports of "fireballs" which they received from various parts of Sweden between 9 July and 12 July, are no longer in doubt that the country is being used for regular practice with steered rockets.

The authorities have promised a communique when their researches are complete.

Some reports indicate that the projectiles are furnished with a self-destruction device, since explosions have apparently occurred in the air.

This photograph, just received from Stockholm, shows one of the many rockets which have been seen flying over Sweden.

The longest line of flight over Swedish territory mapped by military experts covered about 625 miles. The first German V-2's made flights of only 175 to 235 miles. A.P.

An advanced submarine schnorkel. With this device German U-Boats overcame the necessity for surfacing to recharge their batteries. Raised above the surface by a telescoping tube, the schnorkel provided an outlet for exhaust gases and an inlet for fresh air. At first, allied radar was able to pick up the small schnorkel “blip” but German scientists countered with an anti-radar coating which appears on this model (a principle similar to that used by the U.S. B-2 bomber). The U-Boats again became invisible. While this advance was of great importance it was the development of the “Electro Boat” and the Walter motor, powered by hydrogen peroxide, which gave the German U-Boat a range of 30,000 miles or more, greatly increased speed and other capabilities far in advance of Allied submarines of the 1940’s and 1950’s (courtesy of U.S. Navy Archives).

Rudolf Hess, Deputy Führer of the Reich. This enigmatic man is said to have been murdered on two separate occasions. He was buried three times and held incommunicado in Spandau prison by four nations for nearly half a century because of the many dark secrets which he possessed. As a member of the mysterious Thule Society he knew things about Antarctica that others did not know.

Map of Antarctica showing relationship to other continents and location of Neuschwabenland. The dark vertical line represents a deep sub-sea trench discovered by German explorers. It was found to be of volcanic origin and runs through the new German territory where it reveals itself in the form of warm water lakes, caves, crevasses and ice tunnels, most of which were found to be suitable for human habitation with the simple addition of electric lighting. Hitler's treasure, the Holy Lance and other important items were hidden in one of the caves. The trench is an excellent deep sea route for U-Boats (courtesy of "Germany's Antarctic Claim, Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions" by Christof Friedrich).

As head of the Gestapo Section of the Reich Security Main Office of the SS he wielded immense power. His nickname was "Gestapo." He was important enough to be entitled to escape by the northern passage. Müller disappeared from Berlin on April 29, 1945 and sailed for Argentina on May 2 aboard the U-boat 530.

Life magazine reports on the "German space mirror." The Nazis, "the Army reported, hoped to use such a mirror to burn an enemy city to ashes or to boil part of an ocean." The mirror is based on the original idea Hermann Oberth published nearly 20 years earlier |see 1929], although the Life reporter is generous enough to point out that Oberth "had planned to use the space station not as a weapon but as a refueling point for rockets starting off on journeys into space." The finished mirror is shown in orbit in a painting by James Lewicki and its construction is illustrated by B. G. Seielstad. The mirror would be built by "ferrying prefabricated sections into space one by one." Thirty-foot holes in the circular mirror, which is to be made of sodium, accept incoming rockets. Inside the docking hole are airlocks for the passage of crewmembers and supplies. Pumpkin plants, grown under fluorescent lighting, generate oxygen, while electricity is provided by dynamos powered by solar-generated steam. The attitude of the mirror is controlled by small rockets. The whole assembly orbits at 5,100 miles.

When U.S. scientists first learn of the proposed German weapon, it is generally ridiculed. B. J. Spence, a professor of physics at Northwestern University calls it a "Jules Verne dream."

CHAPTER 5

Revolutionary German Antiaircraft Weaponry

"The circular German fighter without wings or rudder suddenly overtook the four-engined Liberator, crossing its flight path at very high speed. When it passed in front of the formation, it gave off a number of little bluish clouds of smoke. A moment later the American bombers mysteriously caught fire, exploding in the air, while the German 'rocket' had already disappeared over the horizon."

This astonishing combat—if it can be called that—between the very latest type of interceptor and a group of Flying Fortresses that had detached themselves from the main group and were heading toward southern Bavaria took place within a matter of seconds in the sky over Würtemberg. The date is unspecified, but it must have been around the end of March or the beginning of April 1945.

A sketchy account of the event had been included in a report on the latest developments of the German aircraft industry written by a Gaullist French diplomat living in Switzerland. This report, together with other restricted documents, was destined for the Intelligence Service of the General Headquarters in Algiers and was clearly the work of an informer operating on the German side of Lake Constance.[1] In the same report there was even a mention of certain "methane antiaircraft bombs" that the Germans had experimented with on Lake Garda against another formation of Flying Fortresses, with results about the same as those of the first.

Intercepted by Italian agents, the report was deciphered by the S.I.D. (Servizio Informazioni Difeso, Defense Intelligence Service) in Castiglione delle Stiviere while the Allies were pushing to break through the Po Valley defenses. Shortly afterwards it made up part of the loot seized by Intelligence Service agents following the British Eighth Army.[2]

The event was not completely unknown to the Allied investigators. When Dr. Goebbels attempted to allay the fears caused by the terrible bombardment of Dresden by resuming his propaganda campaign promising that powerful and still unknown antiaircraft weapons would soon be in use, both the Intelligence Service and the O.S.S. managed to obtain a short report of a test made with the sort of weapon that could perhaps explain the mysterious disappearance of a dozen four-engined American planes during their flight into Germany from a British base. This report, which also seemed to come from an informer in Switzerland, reported in fact that: "A strange flying machine, hemispherical or at any rate circular in shape, attacked them at a fantastic speed, destroying them in a few seconds without using any guns."

After the German surrender in May 1945, when the British examined the secret papers of the technical departments of certain factories hidden in the forested area of the Schwarzwald—another region earmarked as an "island" for a last-ditch stand—they discovered that some of the documents miraculously spared from the retreating S.S. units' destruction of papers concerned "important experiments conducted with liquid air as a power supply for certain new types of turbine engines capable of producing tremendous power outputs. At first the discovery led them to believe that a new system for powering submarines was under study,[3] but ancillary information about the construction of powerful apparatuses working on the principle of electromagnetic waves that would make it possible to exercise radio control at great distances, as well as photographs showing some parts of the new turbine, caused them to change their minds. Thus they got on the track of a preliminary preparatory stage for a new and very powerful type of armored, radio-controlled aircraft."[4]

Now, it cannot be denied that these bombs with their strange contents and that mysterious circular aircraft—armed, besides, only with tubes for spewing out a deadly gas that, blown against enemy planes with great force, caught fire from their exhaust flames and caused them to explode in the air —would certainly appear to noninitiates of military secrets to be the wildest science fiction, if proof to the contrary did not exist. Indirect proof, to be sure, but, one might say, irrefutable.

EXPLOSIVE GASES

In the spring of 1936 an odd story was making the rounds in international press circles. It was received with considerable skepticism and soon forgotten. After all, there had been a spate of similar stories before, dealing with death rays, superpowerful gases, disintegrating radiation, and other such weapons of the future. This one dealt with certain military experiments being carried out near the Hungarian border by an unnamed European power (but, for various reasons, it clearly appeared to be Austria). The experiments were being conducted with a colorless, liquefied gas, harmless to humans but lethal to engines.

The Italian press mentioned it, though under a misleading headline (ASPHYXIATED ENGINES?), reporting as follows: "While inventors of those famous ultrahighfrequency paralyzing rays appear from time to time in the newspapers declaring that they can short out the ignition system of any internal combustion engine from a distance, other inventors are trying other paths to achieve the same object, but with simpler and, apparently, more hopeful results. It is known, for example, that one foreign nation has been conducting experiments with projectiles containing a liquid gas that, when the shell explodes, forms a very extensive cloud that envelops the machine to be destroyed. Any engine whose carburetor breathes in the least amount of this gas will immediately and repeatedly self-ignite. This not only hampers the proper functioning of the engine but generally causes the pistons and connecting rods to break or the block to explode. A column of trucks is said to have been stopped by this gas from a distance of seven and a half miles with a deliberately inaccurate barrage, keeping about half the explosions at a considerable height above the road and off to one side. The gas used allegedly has the added advantage of being colorless, a very valuable characteristic for air defense. Finally, the fact that it is harmless to humans would encourage its use at low altitudes in warfare and for the defense of urban centers."[5]

The Anschluss that united Germany and Austria to form the Greater Reich came, and then came also the Second World War. But the explosive gas did not appear on the battlefields. Informers, secret agents, and prisoners nevertheless repeatedly confirmed after 1944 that a secret weapon of that sort was in an experimental stage.

Dr. Rosenstein, a Jewish collaborator well-versed in the problems of organic chemistry and with special competence in the production of synthetic gasoline, was the first to mention it. In the autumn of 1944 he was captured by the Americans and taken to Paris to be interrogated by members of the Alsos Mission. "The German chemists had succeeded in perfecting the formula for a new gas whose use would have caused strong vibrations and even breakage in aircraft engines," Rosenstein declared. "They refused, however, to employ it because it might possibly have adverse effects on the crews of the planes enveloped in it, and that, in turn, could have unleashed poison gas warfare, which was especially distasteful to the Führer."[8]

Independently of the research indicated by Rosenstein (which seems directly related to the development of the old Austrian experiments that were reactivated in Leuna or Brüx), other experiments were going on at the R-Laboratory of the Luftfahrtsforschungsanstalt in Volkenrode. While working with various oxidizing substances in July 1944, Dr. Hans Friederich Gold, a chemical engineer working in the rocket division of the institute, discovered accidentally that if he mixed 2 percent of myrol with air, internal combustion engines immediately began detonating irregularly; an 8 percent mixture stopped the engines completely in a matter of seconds.[7]

Other information dealt with liquid and gaseous chemical combinations of terrible incendiary power.

Undoubtedly the basic fact supporting the credibility of the above-mentioned matters lies in the Allies' discovery during the progressive occupation of German territory of a number of special "projectileless cannons" which were principally to be used against aircraft.[8]

BLOWER CANNONS

According to the French military press immediately after the war, the land-based version of these cannons—called Windkanone—were constructed by "a Stuttgart firm under the protection of the Luftwaffe" (specifically, it appears, the government-run Hermann Göring Stahl Werke of Heerte, which at one time had also undertaken experiments on rockets and ramjet engines). That is, the factory was about thirty miles, as the crow flies, from the secret factories in the Black Forest.

The cannon had been designed to protect specific secondary objectives and to be used against low-flying fighter-bombers and any other kinds of low-flying plane, "in other words, whenever it is difficult to use the classic type of cannon with any success."

The Windkanone looked like a capital L turned upside down and was pointed toward the sky at an angle; tongues of flame instead of the usual shells shot out of the muzzle. It was constructed of a thick cast-iron tube about three feet in diameter and about thirty-five feet long. The short upper extremity, at right angles to the remainder of the tube, had a large nozzle on the end. In place of the normal breech, the weapon had a combustion chamber loaded with an explosive mixture (hydrogen and oxygen or ammonia) that, after being electrically fired, produced a strong wind from the nozzle pointed in the path of the plane. The violent displacement of air was supposed to bring down the plane, or at least render it unstable, at a maximum distance of about 650 feet.

Mounted on a railway car, the weapon could also be used from the mouths of tunnels to defend hilly and mountainous terrain which concealed important military objectives. For this reason it seemed to be the ideal weapon for passive air defense in the Alpine Redoubt. Practically, however, it proved to be inefficient, because the high speed of the planes themselves and the very short duration of the wind stream, together with the inherent problem of aiming the cannon, had a negative influence on the number of successful shots produced.

Since the cannon had demonstrated in tests on fixed targets that it was capable of shattering a board one inch thick at a distance of 650 feet, the Windkanone was then relegated to infantry use. It was hoped that if this bizarre piece of artillery was used against troops attacking along such obvious routes as valleys, bridges, and tunnels, it would blow them away like chaff. But the weapon could not be used even in this way, since it was unwieldy and consequently highly vulnerable to enemy fire.

The unused and rusted prototype was later found on April 28, 1945, on the outskirts of the Hillersleben testing grounds, some eighty miles west of Berlin, by members of the Intelligence Technical Branch (C.A.F.T.) of the 12th Army Group.[6]

The American experts also came upon a strange device mounted on a strong frame that raised it about fifteen feet from the ground. It was basically a sheet-steel cylinder welded along its eight-foot length and with a large internal crown nozzle at the upper end. At first mistaken for the head of a small vertical heater, it turned out to be the experimental model of the Wirbelringkanone (whirlwind annular vortex cannon).

This strange cannon—which was also called, somewhat prematurely, the Himmelfeger (Skysweep) by the German experimenters—had been sent to Hillersleben in the winter of 1944 from its original home in Kummersdorf. According to Professor Maas, this weapon "fired" a gas ring that spun rapidly on its own axis, a kind of miniature artificial cyclone. It was activated by a charge of compressed hydrogen and was capable of producing considerable damage up to a distance of about 1400 feet. The German technicians hoped that by increasing the dimensions of the "cannon" they would soon be able to scatter bomber formations flying at 15,000 feet, buffeting the planes so violently that they would be thrown off course and be easy prey for the fighters.

OTHER "WIND CANNONS"

The government factory that had constructed the wind cannon had also prepared two other types of projectileless weapon.

The Wirbelkanone (whirlwind cannon) shot about a hundred pounds of pulverized coal soaked in kerosene a distance of some hundred yards. Automatically ignited as it left the launching tube, this mixture, which burned for about half a minute, was supposed to eliminate such specifically land objectives as advanced platoons, isolated tanks, machine-gun emplacements, forts and so on. Because of the difficulty of getting the bugs out of the launching apparatus, this weapon did not have its baptism by fire either.[10]

Finally there was the Vielfältigwindkanone (multiple blower cannon), much smaller in size, which could be mounted on airplanes. The steel tube contained a number of smaller tubes with slanted vanes that broke the wind up into a series of rapid gusts. Internally ignited by a charge of special powder or a gaseous mixture, the gases expelled from the arrangement of nozzles at a muzzle velocity of about 3250 feet per second were supposed to strike the enemy plane and render it unmaneuverable.

To supplant the machine guns and cannons already mounted on the German fighters, the new weapon had to at least be able to damage seriously or, better still, to down the enemy aircraft. For example, it would have had to envelop the enemy plane in a cloud of incendiary or explosive gas so as to insure its certain destruction.

Since East Prussia was about to fall into the hands of the Russians, the designers of the blower cannon feverishly pushed ahead the working out of the technical principle, drawing on the results furnished by the tests that had previously been carried out at the Austrian experimental centers.

At Lofer, in the Tyrolean mountains, the Waffenamt had an institute that at one time was assigned to develop mountain artillery. In addition, the Technische Akademie der Luftwaffe (T.A.L.) was running a station for secondary research on aerial equipment in the same region. In 1944 Speer took over direct management of the two institutes, radically changing the type of research and experimentation they were engaged in.

Colonel Leslie E. Simon, the American investigator who visited the zone after the armistice (and after the British T Unit had passed through), reported that the two institutes were working on different and completely heterogeneous sorts of fantastic inventions.[11]

The fact is that the buildings had also served as the technical nerve center for a far greater complex of research workers scattered about and hidden in the area, and if some of these weapons appeared to be somewhat bizarre and impractical (as, for example, the "ultrasonic cannon"), others, had they been completed in time, would doubtless have caused considerable annoyance to the Allies.

One of these was called the Luftwirbelkanone (air vortex cannon) and thus seemed to be related to the blower types, but in reality the launching mechanism followed traditional ballistic patterns and it was the content of the shell that marked the advent of a new antiaircraft technique.

AN INSPIRING DISASTER

Dr. Zippermeyer, an Austrian researcher, got the idea of reducing the normal explosive charge to the minimum necessary to fracture the shell, which was loaded with extremely fine coal dust. The explosion of the shell thereby produced a small, fiery cloud that burned up in the air it passed through in a matter of fifteen seconds.

At Lofer preliminary experiments fully confirmed the possibility of destroying a plane in flight by causing the wings or rudder to fracture after being struck by the violent, fiery gust, but difficulties in establishing the proper amount of the charge (efficacy diminished with distance owing to the decreased final density of the "cloud") and certain unforeseen problems in timing the ignition phase caused the staff to consider replacing the solid combustible with a gaseous one.

While Dr. Zippermeyer was busy perfecting his antiaircraft coal-dust clouds, the technicians of the Institute for Ballistics of the T.A.L. began a decisive line of research on the physics of explosions in rarefied media.

Flak gunners had reported a number of times that the efficiency of barrages against high-flying invaders fell off sharply above 15,000 feet. The T.A.L. experts explained this shortcoming as resulting from the fact that the intensity and density of the spherical shock waves as developed by ordinary explosives fell off by 50 percent at 15,000 feet because of tamping flaws and through the action of mass defect itself and rarefaction of the air.

In order to verify the exact extent of the phenomenon, in October and November of 1943 a hundred prisoners of war transported with backbreaking work the wings and fuselages of. German HE-111 bombers and four-engined American B-17s to the large T.A.L. experimental center at Zugspitzplatt, 10,000 feet above sea level. There the planes were subjected to the explosions of antiaircraft shells detonated at decreasing distances. New firing tables were computed for flak at the end of this unusual line of research.

Then, in the summer of 1944, a frightening series of consecutive explosions—with effects not unlike the American "saturation bombing"—devastated the synthetic gasoline refineries at Ludwigshafen. Although Allied propaganda immediately seized the opportunity to claim that the explosions were the result of successful delayed-action detonation of a new type of liquid air bomb-mine, the disaster had, in reality, been caused by the accidental escape of ethylene gas at the Athelane recovery center, the explosion of which spread to the gas containers and the whole surrounding plant.

Among the experts on the commission of inquiry was a small special group sent by the T.A.L. The tragic incident provided the opportunity to "reconsider a proposal made some time before for the study of liquefied gas antiaircraft rocket bombs."[12]

T.A.L.'s huge institute in the Bavarian Alps, working together with the neighboring experimental center of Garmisch-Partenkirken (run by the Waffenamt), repeated the tests on the wings and fuselages of large planes, this time using small cylinders loaded with ethylene in both gaseous and liquid states.[13]

The shock wave of ethylene launched with rocket bombs having an explosive core (the Zippermeyer system) maintained its destructive level virtually unchanged even at altitudes considerably above 15,000 feet. But practically it was necessary to take into account the difficulties of loading and preserving the projectiles, the intrinsic danger of the gaseous material, which was supersensitive to shocks and temperature variations, and also the too rapid exhaustion of atmospheric combustion. Tests in flight with the first rudimentary models of the Flugschnittel (Flying Scythe) made it clear that it would be necessary to stabilize the explosive or to replace it with some similar substance.

In the end the second solution prevailed. It was suggested by the Luftfahrtforschungsanstalt of Vienna (L.F.W.), which for some time had itself been conducting interesting experiments on the explosive properties of liquefied combustible gases with the help of some Italian technicians who had a great deal of experience in synthetic combustibles.

Continuation of the work thus became practically the prerogative of the L.F.W., which had it carried out in its Italian branch at Riva del Garda.

SYNTHETIC FIREDAMP

In working with gases it was desirable to use those that were physiologically harmless, for international sanctions had banned the use of poison gases. The idea of liquefying a nonpoisonous gaseous combustible to make it so concentrated that when it instantly resumed its original gaseous state it would envelop and permeate military objectives had occurred to Italian scientists at the time of the rumor about the Austrian experiments. In other words, in 1936.

Acetylene, which remains liquid at 1°C. under a pressure of 48 atmospheres, was immediately discarded as being too sensitive to shock; methane too, despite the fact that it was coming more and more into use, did not seem to meet the requirements, since it remains in a liquid state only at 0° C. and under a pressure of 150 atmospheres. After examining a number of similar gases, the scientists' attention finally focused on a fifty-fifty mixture of butane and propane—a mixture typical of the methane homologs—which was not poisonous and had a calorific power slightly higher than even that of gasoline and a very low liquefaction point (between two and six atmospheres, according to temperature), which meant it could easily be stored in welded steel containers only a fraction of an inch thick. Since the heat of evaporation of this methane mixture is very low, once it was fired an almost instantaneous volatilization of the liquid could be counted on and every cubic foot of gas would have burned about twenty-eight cubic feet of air.

For various reasons—not the least of which were the small capacity of ordinary antiaircraft shells and the promising development of thermite incendiary bombs—the idea did not reach the experimental stage until 1942, and the armistice found Italian scientists carrying out successful tests on additives to increase the explosive qualities of the substance.[14]

If the background of these researches is little known today, the outcome is even less known. Nevertheless, doesn't it seem significant that the Gaullist diplomat described certain mysterious antiaircraft bombs as containing methane? The notorious firedamp of the coal mines is, in fact, nothing but a natural mixture of saturated acyclic paraffin hydrocarbons composed mainly of methane with small percentages of ethane, propane, and butane.

Since the liquefied combustibles possess the important property of spontaneously being self-pumping and self-mixing, the idea immediately developed that the propulsive part of the bomb could be fueled with part of the explosive material itself. For obvious reasons, rocket propulsion was abandoned and a project was sketched out for a flying bomb with a simplified turbine that recalled in appearance and function the Turboproietto (turbine projectile), an Italian antiaircraft device that never left the experimental stage, and to a small extent the propulsive system of the Feuerball antiradar aircraft.

In spring 1945 the scientists at the Riva del Garda center were also perfecting the manufacturing process for a ceramic material for turbine blades—similar to the German Dug (70 percent $Al_2O_3 \div 30$ percent Fe)—which gave promise of withstanding continuously and under enormous pressures temperatures of around 1000°C.[15]

The proposal to increase the size of the turbine bomb in order to transform it into a genuine airplane of an entirely new concept—using the temperature-resistant ceramic for the parts subjected to high temperature—was, however, put aside by the L.F.W., which already had various special projects in the course of development.

When the pool for aeronautical research that Speer started in 1944 and the S.S. then implemented brought together and unified all the inventions of the same sort, artificial firedamp immediately proved to be the ideal explosive for the little blower cannon that fired deadly gusts of gas—the "little bluish clouds" released by the strange circular fighter plane against the unfortunate four-engined Liberators flying in close formation.[16]

"THEY'LL DROP BY THE DOZENS"

The howling of the last siren that signaled the end of the air raid—one of many which were reducing section after section of Berlin to rubble—had only just ended when the correspondents of the neutral press were urgently summoned to the Reichsluftfahrtministerium (R.L.M.) for a message of the greatest importance. Normally Dr. Goebbels, the minister for press and propaganda, handled press relations, but this time Marshal Göring—whose prestige was declining sharply and who for some time had been keeping himself on the outer fringes of the Nazi world “for reasons of health”—personally wanted to reaffirm the policy of “reprisal” and the imminent advent of new kinds of air defense:

“And then their bombers will drop by the dozens, like sparrows under the hunter’s gun,” he concluded angrily. “Our fighter pilots will only have to press the trigger!”

The correspondents diligently wrote down everything that was said and took leave of the powerful personality, masking their growing skepticism. In fact, it was not the first time that spectacular countermeasures were announced, but the months passed and they never appeared.

The press conference took place toward the beginning of November 1944, just before the so-called Great Council of the Luftwaffe was convened at Berlin Gatow. The V-1 flying bomb had been in large-scale use against England since June, but this had not thrown back or even stopped the invasion forces. On September 8, 1943, the V-2 rocket bomb had made its appearance, but although it was certainly an extraordinary device, as the Allies themselves admitted, the Allied bombing raids continued.

And yet Göring was not lying. His angry impatience caused him to suggest that the weapons were closer to production than they actually were. In fact, the designers at the various government institutes had planned with special care every possible kind of scientific apparatus, system, and principle capable of conducting German technology step by step to the final realization of the ideal antiaircraft weapon: the supersonic fighter under remote television control.

Ever since the spring of 1941—that is, when the Luftwaffe understood that it had irremediably lost the “Battle of England”—its high command (O.K.L.) had been seriously considering the possibility of intensive bombardment of London by means of flying bombs and remote-controlled pilotless planes.

In order not to overload its own radio industry, which was already engaged in a heavy production, the Nazi authorities placed their first order for two hundred transmitters for airplanes with the Paris firm of S.A.D.I.R.-Carpentier, which was supposed to build them at the Puteaux factories under German supervision. After the plans were completed, sabotage and delays of all sorts became evident. A year later it turned out that hardly a single apparatus had been built.[17] Since this was a derivation from the prewar British E.M.I. transmitter, the Germans decided, on second thought, that the British were quite familiar with it and would easily be able to jam it. So they let the contract expire and in July 1943 approached the Lyons firm of Radio-Industrie, asking it to design a top-secret television receiver that could be installed in airplanes flying at an altitude of 40,000 feet. A team of German electrical scientists headed by Dr. Neiss remained at the Lyons factory for a long time, but sabotage and passive resistance on the part of the French again held up the work until the American troops arrived.[18]

Back home, of course, things went much better. Two large industrial complexes (Telefunken and Fernseh-Blaupunkt) had been investigating the possibilities in the military applications of television since 1939, in strict collaboration with the principal government experimental centers.[19]

TELEVISION-GUIDED BOMBS

The Telefunken laboratories were trying to perfect apparatuses for strategic use (that is, with a radius of action of about two hundred miles) and were working closely with the B.H.F., the Institute for High Frequency Studies.

Fernseh G.m.b.H. of Berlin, on the other hand, applied itself to apparatuses for tactical use. In 1939, with Professor Herbert Wagner of the Henschel aircraft company as a consultant, Fernseh undertook to develop a television installation that would enable pilots to control both planing bombs and rocket bombs after they were launched. The installation used a wave length of between seventy and a hundred centimeters and the images received appeared on a tiny screen about three inches square.

Beginning on June 10, 1942, an extensive series of laboratory experiments coupled with numerous flight launches was carried out at the Hochfrequenzinstitut D.F.S. at Aiming in the Bavarian Alps, and in the autumn of 1943 this still experimental equipment made it possible for the Henschel HE-263-A flying bomb to sink the torpedo-boat destroyer Egret in the Bay of Biscay and an American transport ship in the Gulf of Salerno. The immediate countermeasures taken by Allied radio branches had already been established for some time, thanks to data furnished by espionage, and the Germans were forced to modify the guidance system.

Type B was used with modest success along the northern coastline of France until this too was jammed.[20]

Type C was supposed to have an installation derived from the preceding model, but with a cathode tube of 221 lines and twenty-five pictures per second. It was developed by Section F of the very active experimental institute run by the Postal Ministry (F.D.R.P.). When the institute was transferred to Aach-am-Bodensee in October 1943, however, the work was temporarily interrupted.

Meantime, the Hochfrequezinstitut D.F.S. scientists had experimented with the apparatus for the Type D bombs, and in July and October of 1944 they successfully carried out remote control of shots against land and sea targets in Garz and Karlshagen.

After the F.D.R.P.'s activities were resumed in full, it completed the plans for the Tonne project, and the new television apparatus was ordered from Fernseh, which began series production at its factories in Obertanwald-bei-Reichenberg, in the Sudetenland. But the Russians continued advancing, and in April 1945 Fernseh moved to Taufkirchen in Bavaria, continuing to work on the Tonne, four-fifths ready for industrial assembly, as well as on one of Dr. Moller's projects, the Sprotte, which had very recently been laid down. This project was concerned with the development of a microtelevision camera to be installed in the nose of an antiaircraft rocket to guide it precisely to the center of the Allied bomber formations.[21]

At the beginning of 1945 the balance sheet of German radio-television technology in the field of missiles read more or less as follows:

In Bayreuth Dr. Rambauske, director of the Institut für Physikalische-Forschung (I.F.P.F.), was completing an apparatus for antiaircraft missiles, flying bombs, and naval air torpedoes for the Luftwaffe. Among other things, this apparatus offered the possibility of being able to supply periodic corrections to the "automatic pilot" of planes or boats, regulating itself by the light of the sun, a star, a lighthouse, or any other light source. Tested in autumn 1944, the device accurately guided a motorboat through a complicated series of remote-controlled evolutions on the Madu See, a lake in Pomerania. Nevertheless, it apparently aroused only very lukewarm interest in the technical circles of the Luftwaffe.[22]

At Aiming, the latest model in development promised to have an effective radius of action of twelve miles on land and sixty miles at sea. At the time of the surrender, however, it still needed at least another six months of work to perfect it and bring it to large-scale production. The laboratory for the military applications of high-frequency radio waves had also completed a remote-control system for bombs, rockets, and aircraft that "resisted all known enemy systems of 'jamming.'" This was the Mosaik project developed by Professor Folske from an idea that had occurred to him in 1943; in May 1945 it was ready to go into the preproduction run.

At Oberammergau, in addition to its radio and television researches, the Oberbayerische Forschunsanstalt (O.B.F.), under the direction of Dr. Konrad, was working on infrared detecting devices based on the principle of the bolometer. In reality a laboratory under the aegis of Messerschmitt, the O.B.F. was responsible for the study of a number of special projects that it was considered necessary and prudent to keep confined to the Bavarian mountains.

The antiaircraft Enzian missile, with an infrared automatic search head (project Madrid), was also included among the high-priority projects of 1944. The development of this missile had been divided up and distributed among the various government institutes equipped for that sort of research. The part dealing with the flight-control mechanism of the device had been assigned to the Reichenhall section of the D.F.S., which was responsible for aircraft equipment, through the subcontractor Holzbau-Kissing, A.G., of Sonthofen-im-Allgäu, which had also worked on the Feuerball.

In December 1944 the O.B.F. resumed control of the entire research program on the Enzian, basing its decision on the greater local availability of the scientific equipment considered necessary for completing the work rapidly. But when the D.F.S. scientists arrived in Oberammergau to take part in the project, they learned to their consternation that the whole program had in the meantime been shelved. And yet test flights of the Enzian had been very encouraging and the device was well worth being completed in the shortest possible time.[23] What could possibly have been the reason for that apparently self-inflicted wound?

There were two good reasons.

In its underground factories at Nordhausen, the Henschel firm, which had always been relatively more concerned with missiles than with airplanes, was about to begin large-scale production of the excellent antiaircraft rocket, the Schmetterling (Butterfly).[24]

The other and perhaps even more decisive reason was that Messerschmitt, which had always been more concerned with airplanes than with missiles, had completed in the greatest secrecy the fighter plane that Göring had dreamed about for so long: the radio-controlled interceptor rocket plane.

PILOTLESS FIGHTER PLANES

Göring had repeatedly inspected the work in progress, following the explanations of the scientists with absorbed and enthusiastic attention and occasionally making suggestions of his own.

In the euphoria of the moment, reinforced by the thin, bracing air of the Alps far from the dismal rumble of war, a foretaste of the bitter surprise that awaited the enemies of the Greater Reich was already on his lips. And he thought that in order to insure that "thousands" of those fantastic fighters would be built, he would increase the productive capacity of Messerschmitt by giving it the support of "his own" Reimahg-Bau G.m.b.H.[25]

Two types of Raketenflugzeuge ohne Pilote (pilotless fighter rockets) were designed.

The Krache (Crack) was about sixteen feet long and armed with a battery of eight 55-mm R-4-M rocket projectiles. The Donner (Thunder) was armed with a rapid-fire MG-213/C.30 small cannon.

Both had the characteristic blunt, teardrop shape of the well-known ME-163 rocket-engined fighter. In effect they were the same machine partially redesigned to be pilotless and controlled from the ground through an elaborate television receiver installed in an armored console. Lighter at the end of a mission because of the ammunition and rocket fuel expended, the Krache would fall to earth under a huge tail chute. For the Donner, it was decided to try to land the craft on a belly skid, as with the original ME-163.

At the beginning of 1945 the O.B.F. completed the preproduction run of twenty examples. But unarmed tests against conventional German planes revealed at once certain secondary defects. These concerned the excessively high maneuverability of the craft. In fact, it was difficult to coordinate quickly enough the radio order to fire with the fleeting television picture of the target, which danced about a great deal because both hunter and target were in motion. In addition, the high speeds caused oscillations that reduced the number of hits to an unacceptable low figure.

The radical solution that was suggested was to make the firing control completely automatic. But it was now March 1945, only two months from the disastrous end.

GERMAN AUTOMATIC FUSES

The Lilienthalgesellschaft für Luftfahrtsforschung (L.F.L.) was an academic institution of the highest level set up to coordinate science and industry in the field of aeronautical research. At Aiming in December 1943 it held its large year-end congress for the elite in the German science of air weaponry.

Among the reports prepared for the event, one especially attracted the attention of those who had the thankless responsibility of handling the Reich’s air defenses (and, of course, it also attracted the attention of British secret agents). The report was given by Dr. Hackemann, of the Waffen-Institut L.F.A. of Volkenrode. Entitled “New Methods of Research in Weaponry,” it set forth for the first time certain technical principles destined not only to revolutionize the aiming and firing of aircraft-mounted guns but also to make the “search heads” of missiles and flak shells completely automatic.

Before the war there had been a good deal of talk about installing automatic fuses controlled by tiny electronic or electromagnetic devices mounted in antiaircraft projectiles. In 1939 the Swedish munitions firm of Bofors had designed a photoelectric cell fuse, but it was unsuccessful because of its extreme fragility. In spite of all their efforts, neither the French nor the Americans succeeded in perfecting really effective devices.

The British were more rational, and also luckier. In 1942 they secretly designed the famous radio fuse, the R-Proximity Fuse, which they had manufactured in the United States on a large scale. This fuse seriously hampered the German V-1 air offensive against London and in the autumn of 1944 finally knocked it out completely.

Behind the British in the time factor, during 1944 the Germans began to catch up with giant strides, aiming at high quality. Their automatic fuses sought, in fact, to exploit methodically, singly or in combination, all the physical phenomena that accompany the movement of a body in the air.

Thus at the F.D.R.P.’s institute for electronic research, Professor Hanle, who was working on behalf of the Luftwaffe, adapted the well-known Geiger counter, making a rocket fuse activated by ultraviolet radiations that to many Allied scientists seemed to be well ahead of its time. Elsewhere work was carried out on electromagnetic, acoustical, electroacoustical, photoelectric, and photochemical fuses.

The major bulk of the work on automatic fuses was, however, supplied by the Ernst Orlich Institut run by the Plenipotentiary Board for the Study and Application of Ultrahigh-frequency Waves (B.H.F.). Located in Travemünde, near Danzig, the institute had also distinguished itself in the field of antiradar camouflage.[26] In 1943 it was moved to Wolfersdorf and Altenburg, in Thuringia, to escape the British air raids that repeatedly pounded the coast line and German islands in the Baltic after the “discovery” of Peenemünde. At the end of 1944 it moved farther south, finding refuge in the Tyrolean mountains. Of the forty-six military applications of electronic projects that were completed or still being perfected at the time of the surrender, six dealt with the preparation of special proximity fuses.

The fuses developed under project Kuhglocke (Cowbell), which had been commissioned by Speer, were sensitive to the natural electrostatic fields that surround airplanes in flight.[27]

In a sense the Luftwaffe was running for cover when it commissioned Project Pinscher (Terrier), taking a leaf out of the British book to provide flak shells with short-wave radio fuses operating on a band of about six meters. Ground-tested in the late autumn of 1944, they proved to be efficient up to a distance of 160 feet from the target.

Knowing that the British were masters at jamming enemy radio apparatuses, in the summer of 1944 the Speer Commission also set up project Marder (Marten). The aim here was to control the explosion of the projectile by radio from a plane in flight or from a ground station within a radius of ten miles from the target. Control at this distance would avoid the danger of accidental explosions and prevent any possible electronic interference from attacking aircraft. But by autumn the new project Wiesel (Weasel) gave such promise of being perfected that it tended to supplant Marder, its principle having been reported as “very promising.”

Project Reineke had been suggested by the Luftwaffe in the winter of 1943, shelved in 1944, and resumed, financed and speeded up by the Speer Commission, at the beginning of 1945. Its scientists were engaged in the study of the advantages offered by magnetic fuses, which were difficult to “spook” and did not have the danger of accidental or premature explosions.

Finally there was project lsegrim (Grumbler), which the Luftwaffe supported toward the end of 1944. Its aim was to revolutionize antitank techniques. Experimented on successfully toward the end of the war, the lsegrim was a device that automatically launched and detonated ordinary antitank rockets from a plane deliberately—or by chance, as during a night flight—flying horizontally at a low altitude directly over a tank. The system worked because of the astonishing sensitivity of the apparatus to weak variations in the local geomagnetic field produced by the metallic mass of the target. The device that launched the rockets was in this case mounted vertically under the wings or inside the fuselage, with the launch muzzles pointed down toward the ground. The plane had to fly not more than fifty feet above the ground.

THE SPITFIRE AND BREECHLESS CANNONS

The same rocket launchers installed in the fuselage, but with the muzzles aimed upward and controlled by a firing device based on the principle of electrostatic fuses, was called the Feuerspucker (Spitfire).[28]

Now the forward-fixed weapons—cannons and machine guns—were destined to disappear from German fighters. The recently installed lateral-fixed weapons (the so-called Schrägenmusik machine guns), which proved of doubtful utility, also disappeared, as did the impractical electromechanically fired rear weapons, which had the designers of the twin turbine bomber Arado AR-234 studying the problem of remote-control firing and the application to aircraft of special rear-view retractable periscopes for aiming and firing at pursuing fighters.

Allied bombers had a number of fixed-forward weapons and maneuverable guns in the back, tail, and belly blisters. But the undersides of planes remained relatively unprotected because of the physical impossibility of swinging the belly and tail guns down ninety degrees. In the heroic days of dogfighting, attacking fighters preferred to fling themselves daringly and riskily up at the bellies of enemy planes. The fighters could easily have shot up the bellies of raiders and at the same time maintained a certain distance from their fire if they had had guns that shot upward.[29] Downing enemy planes "by the dozen" would have been child's play. The future—conditions permitting—seemed definitely to promise the arrival of guns with vertical and lateral fire.

Nevertheless, rocket projectiles had the defect of a relatively low initial velocity and were not nearly as accurate as projectiles fired from rifled barrels, although certain types with small stabilizers were being perfected in Stuttgart, Hillersleben, and Peenemünde (project Pfeil, Arrow).

Like a good Teutonic scientist Professor Hackemann had foreseen this problem too, though it was not really very serious. And so when the Allies occupied the L.F.A.'s Waffen-Erprobung W.2 at Volkenrode, they found a number of examples of 75-mm antiaircraft grenades with automatic fuses that could be fired from six-throated vertical cannons of the breechless type (Sondergerät) and with a firing control determined by a device sensitive to the natural electrostatic field of the huge bombers.[30]

The essential point in all these new weapons was the automatic control of firing. All the pilot had to do was fly a hundred yards beneath the bomber and the automatic firing mechanism would operate on the basis of the photoelectric, magnetic, or electrostatic principles.

Having given little encouragement during the course of tests, the first two efforts in this direction were shelved to await improvements in the apparatuses that provided the bearings.

The third type of control, coupled with a vertical cannon having multiple batteries, was very successfully tested against radio-controlled target planes at the Altenburg airfield in Thuringia. At the time of the armistice it required only a few detail improvements before being ready to send to the underground factories that were building hundreds of new fighters and their weapons. Everything had been planned with the greatest care. All contingencies had been taken into account. All . . . except the sudden breakthrough of General Patton's tanks into the Bavarian plains.

In Italy, the Gothic Line was still holding the enemy, and it held him until almost the end. But the defenses on the Oder and the bastions of the old Siegfried Line were falling at various points under the pressure of the gigantic forces that the Allies were putting in the field for the final battle.

The Remagen bridge over the Rhine, which had inexplicably remained intact, allowed the Americans to cross the Rhine in large numbers at the beginning of March. And this was the end for Germany, although certain high Nazi leaders under the influence of Dr. Goebbels' fiery fanaticism still hoped for a "last-minute miracle" with a blind faith that was close to madness.

The death of President Roosevelt had not given rise to a rupture between the Anglo-Americans and the Russians, as had been hoped. The combined land and air hammering of Germany continued, more implacable than ever.

During those apocalyptic days when Nazism was in its death throes, there appeared—only to disappear immediately among the best and longest kept secrets of one of the victors—the last and perhaps also the most amazing of all the flying machines that the Germans constructed toward the end of the war.

THE "BALL LIGHTNING" AUTOMATIC FIGHTER

Parallel with the formation of the special S.S. Air Corps, the S.S. Technical General Staff had not only espoused Marshal Göring's pressing demands for the preparation of the "decisive" fighter, but had implemented them by having all the aeronautic advances of the past two years sent to the industrial combine of the "G. Werke."

Thus the principle of the symmetrical circular aircraft was combined with direct gyroscopic stabilization; synthetic firedamp was combined with the multiple-batteried blower cannon; a gelatinous organic metallic hypercombustible was combined with the total reaction turbine; television-controlled flying was combined with vertical take-off and landing; armor that was sensitive to small-caliber projectiles and radio control that was free of enemy jamming were combined with the active blinding of enemy radar; infrared search "eyes" were combined with electrostatic weapon firing. This marked the rapid development of the Feuerball, which finally became a weapon.

The Kugelblitz (Ball Lightning), which apparently for greater safety combined the electrostatic firing device with an analogous short-wave device manufactured by the Patent-Verwertungs Gesellschaft of Salzburg, lumped together in a single compact mass the wings, tail, and fuselage of ordinary planes, but it had nothing in common with them in either form or performance. It was the first example of the "jet-lift" aircraft.[31]

After a single lucky wartime mission, the Kugelblitz was subsequently destroyed by technical detachments of retreating S.S. troops, and thanks to the instructions that had been given to the investigators of the T Force by the exceedingly strict British military censorship, nothing else has come out since then.

Even if ufologists do not know it or refuse to admit it, the Kugelblitz, older brother of the Feuerball antiradar device, is the second authentic antecedent of the present-day flying saucers and it is with them—and with the other German devices of the same family (spinning bombs, lenticular bombs, ramming fighters, and flying spheres)—that the true history or, if you like, the "prehistory" of the UFO question begins.

The military finale of the matter, however, goes beyond the chronicle of aeronautics and belongs to the bloody story of the forties.

After the Remagen disaster, the Nazi general staff realized that it was not possible to resist the Allies' triple-pronged offensive much longer. Desertions in the commands and the pitiless repression of real or presumed desertions of soldiers under the pressure of continuous defeats had a disastrous effect on the efficiency of the Wehrmacht. Nevertheless, they did not produce the hoped-for breakdown of the German military machine, which continued to fight the Allies on a multitude of local fronts produced by the break-up of the marginal territories of the Reich, in a series of gigantic pockets that Hitler optimistically insisted on calling fortresses. These fronts had only the most precarious communications with one another and often had absolutely no communication with general headquarters, which were partly located in the Chancellery bunker in Berlin and partly evacuated to Thuringia and to even remoter Berchtesgaden.

In spite of the propaganda that had choked the air waves during the last quarter of 1944, promising a new year studded with military triumphs, the situation in the air and on the sea was just as desperate as that on land.

Reduced to a few submarines that had survived the defeat in the Atlantic, a couple of squadrons of torpedo boats, and the large ships hidden in Norwegian fjords, for many months the German navy lay more or less inactive at anchor under air attack while awaiting the new, so-called invulnerable submarines.[32]

In the air the Luftwaffe was being implacably destroyed, despite the new rocket and turbine planes, which were overwhelmed by the fire power and sheer numbers of the adversary. At dawn on January 1, 1945, the disastrous Bodenplatte Unternehmen (Operation Tile) that Hitler wanted as a support for the Ardennes offensive got under way. In this operation nine hundred planes—now an enormous number for the Germans—were thrown against the Allied airfields in the Dutch-Belgian sector. Three hundred sixty-four of them did not return to their bases, thus endangering the success of the subsequent operations. After that unlucky enterprise, the appearances of the Luftwaffe became even rarer because of the progressive breakup of the various combat units, which were nailed to the ground both by enemy air attacks and by the rapid depletion of their fuel supplies.

Toward the beginning of spring most of the German airfields were practically shut down. In view of the excellent results obtained by the dispersion of their industries, the Germans in extremis began to disperse the planes that were still left on their surviving airfields. A number of improvised airfields were set up in the thick pine forests of the Schwäbischerwald and the Bubesheimerwald which used nearby stretches of hastily camouflaged highway as dangerous airstrips. It was from one of these improvised fields that the first Kugelblitz fight er took off on its fantastic flight.

At the eastern tip of the ephemeral defensive arc set up as advanced protection for the Austro-Bavarian bastion, the great underground industrial complex of Kahla, in Thuringia, was transformed into a sort of dry-land aircraft carrier. The long cement strip of the ridge on the thickly forested summit served as the runway for the immediate testing of the prototypes that were being produced inside the hill.[33]

As the military situation worsened the weather improved, so that new supplies of cement and tracks arrived, along with additional prisoners being evacuated from the north. Work on the U aerodromes, which had meantime come under the complete control of the S.S., was speeded up to a totally inhuman pace. Fourteen-hour work days, seven days a week, a five-mile daily walk to reach the work sites—such was the killing way of life of the slave workers. Naturally, the mortality rate soared. But this was of no concern to the promoters of the enterprise, whose only torments were caused by the obvious consolidation of the Allied forces on the western borders of Bavaria.

When the sudden advance of General Patton's army interrupted the work, the first airfield was already three-quarters finished. The other two were only half completed, and no important installations or plans were found among the abandoned constructions because of the final, rapid evacuation of the technical experts and the most skilled workers to the heart of the Alpine Redoubt.[34]

THE END OF THE ALPINE REDOUBT

Every attempt to push General Bradley's American troops back over the Rhine failed. On March 14, 1945, at the end of one of Hitler's usual military conferences and while the usual authorized spokesman was proclaiming that new weapons would soon be thrown into the battle, the Führer called a meeting of some high S.S. officers, the Gauleiters of the six southern provinces and all the generals who were still faithful to him. He ordered them to see at once to the immediate preparation of the Alpine Redoubt—time: not more than two weeks!

We have no record of the reactions of those present to that insane order. But we may assume that there were no objections, each one probably having already decided for himself the best way to save himself, outside and, if necessary, even against the Führer's orders.

According to certain information that the British picked up immediately after the war, the revival of interest in the Redoubt came about because a few days earlier artillery Colonel Hans von Schmückert had declared to Hitler that he believed it was possible to bring the first grenades containing 750 grams of “disintegrating explosive” under experiment in Austria to completion within a few months at the latest. If this matter, as was to be expected, came to the attention of the Allied command, they would be forced to throw all their reserves into the fight in order to isolate Austria and Bavaria and thus avert that danger.[35]

In the feverish search for the most extreme solutions to the retreat, the concept of isolated “fortresses” defended to the last man was extended to the principal cities of East Prussia and Silesia (Königsberg, Danzig, Breslau, and still others), condemning them to utter devastation in the hope of temporarily holding up the onrushing Soviet advance.

To complete the gloomy picture it should be remembered that on March 19 Hitler ordered the Gauleiters of the regions about to be invaded to carry out the criminal “scorched-earth” policy. The idea was to hamstring the occupying troops by methodically destroying not only military but industrial and urban installations with no regard for the most elementary requirements for survival of the civilian population. The order was subsequently revoked through the firm opposition of Speer.

The movement of the retreating troops became more and more difficult, however, because of the devastation of the German heartland by the Allied bombers. Whole units were wiped out in the big and little “pockets” that were created by the irresistible thrusts of Allied armor, galvanized by the foretaste of the German collapse. And the possibility of replacing all these losses, which was already minimal in January, disappeared entirely.

On March 27, S.S. Gruppenführer Kammler returned to the Berlin bunker after a long trip to Austria and the Bavarian Alps, where he had inspected the preparations for the Redoubt which had begun in February but had been carried out slowly because of the lack of specific orders. By questioning the military and scientific authorities in Austria who were directing the preparation of the “secret weapons” that had been chosen for the final resistance, he had learned from Commandant Petschek that the subatomic explosives could not be ready before the end of 1945.[36]

Although the plan for the Alpine Redoubt was by now practically unrealizable, in obedience to orders Himmler named S.S. Obergruppenführer Kaltenbrunner head of security police for southern Germany, and sent him to Innsbruck to organize the surviving S.S. forces that were streaming in. Himmler did not, however, trust Kaltenbrunner, fearing that he might make secret advances to the Anglo-Americans for a separate peace. He appointed S.S. Obergruppenführer Gottlob Berger as Kaltenbrunner's assistant—officially, but in reality to report on Kaltenbrunner's moves.

Among the other "special deputies" was the celebrated Colonel Skorzeny, the man of desperate situations, personally named by the Führer to the command of the special "Alpine Defense Corps," which, of course, had still to be formed.[37]

In April the collapse of German military and political institutions took on a catastrophic rhythm. The myth of the Alpine Redoubt was now only a faded memory to the bigwigs of the regime, or a pretext for deserting the dangerous "redoubt" of Berlin.

The final, irreparable reverse began on April 13, with the fall of Vienna. On the sixteenth the Americans took Nuremberg and headed toward Munich and Bavaria. On the eighteenth General Model's Army Group B, trapped and decimated in the giant Ruhr pocket, surrendered after a valiant eighteen-day struggle, leaving the Americans with 325,000 prisoners, including thirty generals. The armored divisions of General Bradley poured through that two-hundred-mile gap in the German defenses into the heart of Germany, driving toward Thuringia and the Harz.[38]

On April 25, advanced Russian and American patrols met at Torgau on the Elbe and Germany was cut in two.

Contrary to previously established plans, Hitler did not leave Berlin on April 20 to assume command of the Alpine Redoubt.[39] It seems that Goebbels and Bormann convinced him that Berlin was "the only position between the Elbe and the Oder that was really threatened by the Soviet advance and from which the counteroffensive to ease the Russian pressure would have to be mounted"! A magnificent whim that closed to Hitler the only remaining escape—to the tranquillity of the Tyrol or to General Schoerner's Army Group strongly entrenched in the Boemerwald.

The last days of Hitler and of the Third Reich—masterfully pieced together and described by Major Trevor-Roper of the British Intelligence Service—are the quintessence of the farce, drama, tragedy, and chaos that culminated in Hitler's pistol shot and in the general surrender of the surviving German forces.[40]

The Alpine Fortress, then, took no military part in the war. It was overcome by the very events that had given rise to it. But its embryonic existence and the great mass of secrets that had been moved there in the first quarter of 1945 nevertheless engaged an army of expert investigators briefed by qualified bureaus of the various national secret services.

Interrogations of officials and designers, careful searches among the rubble of factories bombed by the Allies or mined by retreating S.S. units, in natural and artificial caverns, abandoned mines, the cellars of old castles and family homes, unused railway tunnels, river and lake beds, recently cut wooded areas, ruined churches and schools, new masonry, damaged cemeteries—nothing escaped the practiced eyes of the investigators. For the remainder of 1945 and much of 1946 tons and tons of blueprints, company papers, lists of researchers, laboratory models, memoranda, reports and notes that covered every sector of the war industry came pouring out of thousands of unlikely hiding places.

In concluding a review of German secrets that fell into American hands, Colonel D. L. Putt, assistant commanding officer for the Technical Information Service of the Allied Military Government, frankly stated in July 1946 that at the end of the war, despite the heavy defeat, German scientists and technical experts had left behind at Peenemünde, Brunswick, Wiener Neustadt, and elsewhere the milestones of new aeronautical developments and future air wars.

A self-evident truth (or a discouraging prospect) that justified the later development of certain unknown or still little known stages in aeronautical technology that were reached between the beginning of the prewar period and the end of the postwar period, and knowledge of which is indispensable in order to solve the mystery of the UFOs.

NOTES

1. Or perhaps in the entourage of the little known "secessionist government" of France formed by Jacques Doriot at Mainau or Lake Constance? This phantom government was supported by Himmler and Goebbels in opposition to De Brinon's "legitimate" collaborationist government, which moved to Sigmaringen after the liberation of Paris. Because of its unconditional support of S.S. policies, it enjoyed their special protection and it was confidently informed of secrets that even German military higher-ups were denied knowledge of.

2. See Professor Gianfranco Bianchi's 1962 observation after he had completed his historical research on the period running from July 25, 1943 (the date of Mussolini's downfall) to May 8, 1945: "The lawyer Paolo Porta, who was the Republican Fascist Party secretary for the province of Como and inspector of the Black Brigades in Lombardy, used Adolfo Belgeri, the head of the Political Investigation Office of the R.F.P. in Como, as a confidential courier to deliver secret political and military information concerning the Italo-Swiss frontier and internal Swiss matters to Mussolini at Gargnano on Lake Garda. A secret intelligence service had been set up on Swiss soil by the Italian Social Republic, which was not legally recognized by the Berne government."

3. This initial error had been prompted by examination of Dr. Dräger's plan for the construction of a diesel engine fueled with liquid oxygen for powering underwater craft that Dräger had first sketched out in 1936. A prototype was built by the Kreislaufbetrieb-Motor D.W. In 1943 the prototype was completed at the Forschungsinstitut für Kraftfahrt und Fahrzeugmotoren (F.F.K.F.) of Stuttgart-Untertürkheim with the collaboration of Professor Kamm and Dr. Ernst. Dubbed the Oxygen Recycle System by the Anglo-American investigators, the design was completely abandoned in favor of the Walter turbine functioning on hydrogen peroxide. The agents of the T Force Camp at Bad Gandersheim who examined the documents found in the G Werke factories—which were under the technical supervision of the Henschel and Zeppelin firms and the administration of the S.S. Technical General Staff—imagined therefore that it was a recent resumption of those researches along new lines, i.e., the laying down of a "compound" type of engine (diesel plus turbine).

4. G. Ventura, Il radioplano ad aria liquida (private communication to the author). The initial mistake had been further compounded by the detail that certain special turbine blades —the use of which was unknown to the German suppliers themselves and which in the specifications were required to have "highly polished surfaces"—were ordered from Kuhl, Kopp, and Kausch A.G. of Frankenthal, a firm well known for its working ties with the Kriegsmarine. See Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Visit to the Ludwigshafen-Mannheim Area: Torpedoes, Submarines and Naval Constructions (Report No. XXX-44, London, H.M.S.O., 1945). In the hurried hunt for the whereabouts of the secret, T Unit agents interrogated the French scientist Georges Claude, the inventor of industrial processes for manufacturing liquid air, lengthily but apparently unsuccessfully. He was arrested in the autumn of 1944 at Nancy and released the following year. The charge was that he had collaborated with the Germans in the production and handling of liquid oxygen, which was actually used on a very large scale by the various types of German rocket engines. The first real clues were shortly afterward provided by the designs of a special pump of clearly aeronautical use found in the design studio of a subcontractor attached to the B.M.W. company in Allach that supplied components for the Vergeltung antiaircraft rocket. The factory of the subcontractor remained in a cavern of Wittringen in the district of Saarbrücken after the B.M.W. complex was later moved to the east. Perhaps some slight trace of that revolutionary type of aircraft (akin to the Feuerball) is to be found in the article "Deflex-Reaction Propulsion" (Flight, London, September 13, 1945), in which a certain Mr. F. Umpleby, perhaps having mistakenly interpreted the information he had received, expounded a theory concerning the improvement of jet engines that was based on faulty premises. His reply to the criticisms that immediately flowed in from all sides (see Flight, October 18, 1945) ended with the following declaration: "The rocket referred to is, I suppose, the Oberth, a number of which were built and tested in Germany. They worked well but nothing much seems to be known about them. The writer has given these rockets some thought and investigation, and may give some results on the investigations later, if they should be of sufficient interest." But Umpleby did not, as he promised, publish the results of his investigations on those special and still unknown German "rockets."

5. These experiments led other powers to investigate what immediately seemed to be a promising defense principle. It is known, for example, that in 1937–1938 the Americans secretly carried out tests with "clouds of metallic dust" that was so fine as to be almost invisible but was highly abrasive and designed to speed up the natural wear and tear on engines. The tests apparently were unsuccessful. In addition, the United States also experimented with "poison curtains" to be spread in the air in order to create a temporary biological barrier against invading planes. This, too, proved unsuccessful.

7. This discovery led Gold to propose to the Luftwaffe an antiaircraft rocket loaded with vaporizable myrol, while another L.F.A. expert, Dr. Zeumer, concluded a number of successful tests with an antitank bomb like the one designed for the Heereswaffenamt. Indeed, the Heereswaffenamt immediately ordered a long series of tests which were to be carried out at the Spandau artillery range until the beginning of 1945. The experiments were not carried out because Spandau had to be evacuated under the threat of the Soviet advance. Myrol, which was manufactured on an industrial scale by the Schmidding firm at Bodenbach, was a mixture of methylnitrate (75 percent) and methanol (25 percent) extracted by direct nitration from liquid methanol. 10. Conceptually related to the well-known flame-throwers, this weapon had already been carefully considered by the British from different and perhaps more rational constructional and operational approaches. Immediately after the war, Sir Geoffrey Lloyd made known certain details of the so-called "belt of fire," one of the secret weapons the British had excogitated in June 1940 to discourage the Germans from attempting an invasion of England. Still too inadequately armed to repel an invasion carried out by the means and methods of the time, the British possessed large stores of gasoline. Lloyd, who was high in the Fuels and Energy Ministry, believed correctly that with its terrible inhibitory power, fire could be transformed into a valid weapon of retreat. He approached Lord Hankey with his plan. Before the war Hankey had conducted experiments in passive defense with curtains of fire, taking off from the technique suggested by what he had read about the mysterious "Greek fire" in Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. In June 1940 the first tests were made on the beach at Dumpton with a rudimentary catapult that hurled large drums of burning oil out to sea. These missiles (which later went under the code name of "Fougasses") were the beginning of "a frightful system of flame-throwers that was used not only to cause fire on the surface of the sea by means of the catapulted containers, underwater conduits and powerful jets of flame but also to defend strategic and tactical positions on the coastal hinterland. A chemical substance based on calcium that ignited on contact with water was pumped into the gasoline piping laid on the sea floor along with the fuel, thus setting fire to the huge floating slick . . . special flame-throwing catapults mounted on ships hurled jets of fire 150 feet in the air against the dive bombers. This last was the only 'flame weapon' actually used against the enemy. The others never had a chance to see action." In fact, the Germans did not attempt an invasion for a number of reasons, not the least of which was fear of these deadly defenses after one test company made up of invasion troops dressed in asbestos clothing (which proved defective) ventured into a large oil slick that was set afire off the coast of France. Almost the entire company met a horrible end.

12. See Hans Fritsche, Hier Spricht Hans Fritsche, 1948. On the subject of German secret weapons, the former political editor of Radio Berlin wrote: "It is in any case absolutely true that if the miracle weapons did not exist, we did, however, have new types of weapons that were not quickly enough—and in some cases were not at all—put into operation. I am not talking about the new antiaircraft homing weapons, or about the new explosive 'butardin,' which was discovered by accident after an explosion in the Ludwigshafen factory and which produced extensive annihilating explosions among close bombing formations. Both had still to be perfected [at the time of the German surrender]."

13. The choice of ethylene was motivated by the fact that this hydrocarbon possesses the very advantageous property of requiring a volume of air for combustion greater than that required by any other gaseous combustible.

14. Indeed, it seems that it was intended to include appropriate quantities of highly detonative substances, such as octane (C_8H_{18}), and others that were supposed to speed up the firing of the cloud in its final expansion, such as cetane ($C_{16}H_{34}$), both substances belonging to the same series of the fundamental components of methane.

16. The history of the Zippermeyer system is not officially known. It seems, nevertheless, that at the beginning of 1945 tests of various types of grenades of somewhat complex content were being prepared. In one of these the explosive charge was thoroughly mixed with coal dust pressed into a very friable and porous agglomerate, whose interstices were loaded with a liquefied explosive gas. The "coal sponge"—a special type of Schaumkohle manufactured by the Heinrich Schmitt Werke K.G. of Frankfurt-am-Main and evacuated to Berchtesgaden—thus acted as a stabilizer, reducing the danger of handling the projectiles. It is said that from the beginning of 1944 Hitler followed these researches with particular interest, in the absurd hope of soon being able to use a powerful and regenerated flak in the passive defense of the Reich and thus supplant the fighter arm of the Luftwaffe that had so disappointed him because of Göring's empty promises.

23. Shortly afterward the starting date for series production was reexamined and set for May 1945—a theoretical date, since the armistice overtook these plans. The only complete working models were later found at the experimental center of Lofer, in the Tyrol, which had functioned as the last center for the collection of new antiaircraft inventions.

24. In fact, the first antiaircraft salvo of "Butterflies"—to which Goebbels gave in extremis the propagandistic denomination of V-3 (i.e., "Reprisal Weapon No. 3"), though it was not a true reprisal weapon but a purely defensive device—was launched with deadly effect on the Allied raiders exactly one week before the Nazi collapse. Assembly-line production of the rocket had been set up to furnish 3000 units a month, beginning in November 1945.

25. The Reimahg-Bau G.m.b.H. was a recently formed aeronautical company located underground in Kahla, in Thuringia, which resulted from the forced merger of the Gustloff Werke and Ago Flugzeugewerke arranged by Gauleiter Sauckel, one of Göring's creatures, who, in order to ingratiate himself even more with his powerful protector, had thought it wise to give the new firm that barbaric name made up of the first letters of *Re*ich M*a*rshal *H*ermann *G*öring. If the Allies had given it the time to get fully under way, the new company by itself would undoubtedly have put several thousand jet planes in action. Most would have been the Heinkel HE-162 Volksjäger, the ill-starred "People's Fighter," which by means of a massive "air conscription" of very young pilots was planned to sweep every enemy plane from the skies of Germany. General Galland wrote apropos of this plane: "Incredible schedules were fixed, astronomical production figures were planned. Göring himself became a victim of the national frenzy with which the [People's Fighter] had infested almost everyone connected with air defense." In the decisive meeting that took place at Rastenburg on September 23, 1944, Göring cried, "Hundreds! Thousands . . . Until the enemy has been chased back beyond the borders of Germany!" Galland continues: "On December 6, 1944, the HE-162 flew for the first time. A few days later—far too soon—it was displayed to a large circle of interested experts at Vienna-Schwechat. . . . The aircraft started to disintegrate in the air. . . . In March 1945 the planes of the first series were ready. Until the end of the war 200 were produced." All this uselessly delayed still further the production of the ME-262 fighter, opening thereby a new and mortal gap in the already depleted German defenses. Some years before—on November 17, 1942, to be exact—Colonel General Ernst Udet, the director of aircraft construction, had committed suicide after a long controversy with Göring, Hitler, and the Oberkommando on the duties of the Luftwaffe. "Fighters, fighters and more fighters. This is what we absolutely must have. Thousands of fighters!" he had publicly declared just before he killed himself. By echoing that fatal refrain, Göring implicitly criticized his whole policy during the war years, but by then it was too late to do anything about it.

27. Fields developed by the electrical charges that accumulate on aircraft surfaces and that are the product partly of the process of motive combustion and partly of aerodynamic friction (the triboelectric effect), or that are induced by the strong electrical charges present in the clouds. These latter, indeed, interfered with the perfecting of the Kuhglocke fuse seriously enough to cause the project to be interrupted at the beginning of 1945 and a special cycle of ancillary researches on atmospheric electricity to be undertaken.

28. In March 1945, while experimenting with this device mounted on the only model of the ME-262 jet fighter modified to take an oblique-firing Spitfire in the fuselage (the ME-262-D), Second Lieutenant Fritz Kelb shot down seven American four-engined bombers in a single action over Saxony. The Spitfire had been aimed upward and inclined about twenty degrees forward, and its fire power totaled twelve SG-500 rockets of 50 mm.

29. In the spring of 1946 the noted aviation journal Flugwehr und Technik, discussing the development of the German night fighter arm during the Second World War, wrote apropos of vertical fire: "[In addition to "tactical radar"] another decisive innovation in the equipping of the night fighters was the installation of oblique armament. Two 20-mm cannons were set in the fuselage behind the pilot's cabin in a more or less vertical position, so that when flying under the target the pilot could get the plane in his vertical sights (a reflex type) and fire upon the largest surface that the bomber presented. If he succeeded in getting under the plane without being observed, he had to worry only about not getting hit by metal fragments blasted off by the explosion of the projectiles. Under the same conditions, lateral attack proved almost impossible because the machine guns in the back and belly turrets of the big bombers could be trained on the attacker with a favorable angle of fire. The vertical weapons were first tried in actual flight in spring 1944, with a pair of rapid-fire cannons mounted on the ME-110 twin-engined heavy night fighters in addition to their normal armament. The test pilot of one of these planes deserted, landed at the military airport of Dübendorf, near Zurich, on April g, 1944, and was interned by the Swiss. Fearing that the Allies might get their hands on its still secret devices (the modified 'Lichtenstein' Fu-G-220 radar and two 30-mm vertical cannons), Hitler ordered Oberführer S.S. Otto Skorzeny to organize a raid against the Swiss airport and destroy the plane. In order to forestall the German operation, which could have had serious consequences for Switzerland as well as for Germany herself, the Swiss themselves destroyed the plane in accordance with a secret agreement between Gruppenführer S.S. Schellenberg and Brigadier General Masson, the head of the Swiss secret service. As a quid pro quo, the agreement stipulated the sale to the Swiss air force of twelve ME-109 fighters."

30. See British Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Weapons Section of the L.F.A., Volkenrode (Final Report No. 61, London, H.M.S.O., 1946).

31. It seems that the new fighter was also called the Vergeltung by the technicians who were preparing it. However, this second designation is strongly disputed, since at the same time the B.M.W. factories were constructing a huge antiaircraft rocket with the same name (Revenge).

32. See J. Nobecourt, op. cit.: "The final readying of the secret weapons coincided with the period of counteroffensive plans [on the Western Front], and Hitler hoped, not without reason, that quickly getting secret production under way would give him the means once again to reverse the outcome of the conflict. A few months would have been enough. They could have been gained by retaking Antwerp and dividing the Anglo-American front and by launching a new battle of France to seize the Channel coast—precisely the objectives that were assigned to the Ardennes counteroffensive. In fact, in autumn 1944 the means whereby the reversal of the situation could be effected was already being prepared in German arsenals. The U-XXI submarines, capable of remaining underwater for a long time at great depths and with a speed of sixteen knots, were already in the slips of the shipyards the year before. And the U-XXIII was much smaller, more treacherous and more maneuverable. In addition, the ME-262 jet fighters and various types of antiaircraft and artillery rockets were already a reality. All these weapons would soon be ready for a series of unexpected and concentrated military operations highly dangerous to the Allies. One hundred and twenty U-XXI and sixty-one U-XXIII submarines were about to be launched shortly before the armistice and the British found several miles of railway cars at Bremen filled with various bits and pieces (manufactured in factories in Silesia) for the assembly of still other submarines. They had, however, arrived a year too late, or perhaps only three months too late, to be used in large formations in the Atlantic and in the Channel that would have seriously compromised Allied supply lines in the crucial winter of 1944–1945"

33. See Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Underground Factories in Central Germany (Report No. XXXII-17, London, H.M.S.O.), pp. 95–109. A secondary but nevertheless significant example of the astonishing demands made on German industry in the prosecution of the war, despite the catastrophic worsening of the military situation, is offered by the fact that only forty-eight days before the surrender a general meeting on air weaponry was called for March 20 at Bad Eilsen. This was the last of a long series of such meetings, and the technical authorities of the Luftwaffe and the chief designers of Focke-Wulf, Arado, Dornier, Gothaer-Waggonfabrik, Junkers, Horten, and Blohm-Voss were all present. The plans of these firms for the urgent building of a heavy supersonic fighter were examined and discussed at the meeting. This was to be an all-weather night fighter of twelve tons, designed to take the latest types of jet engines and the new seven-barreled machine guns, which had been devised in order to reduce to a fraction of a second the maximum time of "ballistic contact" necessary for an effective enemy hit.

34. In 1949 the American occupation troops emptied the munitions dumps. The year before, an unprecedented—was it spontaneous?—invasion of tree-killing hymenoptera had literally cut the local forest to the ground, thus revealing all the constructions the Germans had prepared. The Americans did not, however, demolish the U-airfields, since that would have required a quantity of explosive equal to a nuclear explosion. Indeed, the U.S. Air Force command declared at the time that if the Nazis had begun the work only a few months before, the course of the European war would have immediately come to a halt and "in all probability the first atomic bomb would have exploded on the airfields around Landsberg instead of on Hiroshima." In fact, no type of demolition bomb known at the time—not even the monster British "Earthquake Bomb" of 22,000 pounds—would have been able to blast apart that massive concrete armor.

35. This was, perhaps, a secondary application of the results furnished by the research originally conducted at Sigmaringen on radioactive isotopes of the chemical element 85, and it would seem that the grenades were a later development of the Zippermeyer system in so far as it was attempted to mix—with safety for the workers—ordinary molecular explosives, both solid and gaseous, with substances that were highly radioactive over a short period, in order to create, by long-range artillery fire, impassable barrages in front of the principal Allied objectives.

36. In fact, the British secret service had masterfully caused the Nazi attempts to produce "radioactive gases" for the V-6 reprisal weapon to fail completely.

37. After a private exploratory thrust as far as Vienna just before the Soviet attack, Skorzeny reached the new headquarters for his special troops in the environs of Radstadt, in the Salzburg Alps. Inspecting the area, he noted that the local preparations for the famous Redoubt were proceeding sluggishly and, in the circumstances, would require a few more months at the most optimistic guess. Delicate and expensive machinery had been stored for some time in caves and other makeshift hiding places while waiting for their final positions to be made ready. The arsenals dug out of the mountains were empty, the storerooms still without equipment. From a quick evaluation it was learned that the essential fuel reserves in the gigantic empty or partly empty buried fuel tanks did not total more than a thousand barrels. To have insisted on carrying out Hitler's plans for a defense to the last man would have been pure insanity. Ten days later, the Americans established their headquarters at Kitzbühel.

38. Cf. Hoettl, op. cit.: "After Field Marshal Model capitulated in the Ruhr basin, the Americans closely interrogated the officers of the captured General Staff in front of a large wall map of the presumed Alpine Redoubt, noting with astonishment that some of the prisoners were unaware of the existence of such a defensive plan and that some even refused to take it seriously." This is, nevertheless, a very weak argument, for it was common knowledge that the German armies in the Ruhr —or rather, as Hitler loved to call it, the Ruhr Redoubt—had orders to prevent or at least slow up as much as possible the Anglo-American penetration of German territory, by fighting, if necessary, to the last man. Therefore there were no pre-established plans for a strategic withdrawal of these units, at least not until the very end, when there was absolutely no possibility of effecting it.

39. And yet on April 10 Hitler had clearly shown his inclination to move to the south of the country, sending the bulk of his household personnel to Berchtesgaden to get his villa, the Berghof, which had been transformed into a fortified mountain refuge, in functioning order. This unexpected decision did not pass unnoticed by British secret agents. The Berghof had already been bombed in sporadic attacks, but on April 26 a heavy R.A.F. raid destroyed it completely. Besides, it must be presumed that Hitler was well aware that preparations for continued resistance in the alpine zone had not got beyond the embryonic stage, since he was, after all, one of the principal people responsible for the extremely indecisive prosecution of the plan. His attitude was, perhaps, influenced by his bitter disappointment in the failure of "his" counteroffensive in the Ardennes and his absurd hope that the Allies would squabble and have a falling-out. In addition, with the surrender of the army groups in Italy (April 27, 1945) the heart and main source of troops for the Redoubt had practically disappeared. The transfer of various high commands to the Tyrol (Kesselring settled in at Alm on April 20 and General Jodl went to the nearby village of Niedersill with the remnants of the O.K.W.) was only a contingent formality for treating with the Anglo-Americans from a territory that was still nominally German and free. Kesselring sums up his recollections of those anxious days in his memoirs in the following passage: "Facing our fifty-five divisions, whose effectives were reduced to brigade or regiment strength, and ill-equipped and worse armed, were at least eighty-five powerful full-strength divisions abundantly supplied with everything they needed, not to mention that the Luftwaffe had been virtually nonexistent for several months. And the Alpine Redoubt? A great deal has been written about it, but in general it is all nonsense. Even the most essential thing for making it a reality was lacking: mountain troops. In such conditions how would it have been possible to resist the enemy's enormous pressure for any length of time? At the most, it was an attempt to gain time in order to avoid the worst, in other words that the bulk of the Wehrmacht on the Eastern Front should fall prisoner to the Russians. This objective was only partly achieved, but it did keep about half a million German soldiers out of Siberia. The sole military action in the area of the defunct Redoubt (and it was defunct before it was born) was in Villach on May 6, where a few regiments of the XXIV S.S. Alpine Division, the Karstjäger, tried to slow up the advance of the Eighth Army into Austrian territory after the surrender of Army Group South in Italy."

The Advent of "Suction Aircraft"

Symptomatically, when the war ended the Foo Fighters disappeared from the skies of a conquered and dismembered Germany. And no one was interested in investigating the "mystery" any longer, for the occupying powers had quite different duties to assign to their air force technicians.

During the second half of 1945 the Russians, Americans, and French quickly set to work dismantling and sending home as part of their share of war reparations the best German scientific equipment—especially their very modern wind tunnels, which could already produce speeds well above that of sound.

The British, too, sent back aeronautical equipment to be installed in the experimental center they were building at Bedford and in the complementary research centers in Australia and Canada that were occasionally mentioned in the British press with a certain air of mystery and with predictions of "a brilliant future" for them.

Nevertheless, at times the British preferred to have studies of immediate practical interest that had been interrupted by the sudden ending of the war in Germany completed by German technicians themselves (under strict military supervision, as in Darmstadt and Goettingen, for example) and then dismantle the plants and transfer the research staff to England to carry out the industrial application of the projects.[1]

In order to continue research on secret weapons, especially on those they had captured and retained exclusively without their allies' having hard data on them, teams of specialists belonging to the Ministry of Aircraft Production (M.A.P.) ranged up and down western Germany and Austria, filling in the picture of the state of development the Germans had reached in supersonic aircraft and guided missiles. In addition, they saw to it that inventions and documents of the highest interest that had already been sequestered and safely set aside by the T men—who followed on the heels of attacking troops and acted on detailed information supplied by the virtually omnipresent secret agent—were sent back home to England. This traffic had to be carried on with a certain amount of secrecy, to avoid regrettable conflicts over rights and authorities with other occupying powers of the Reich.

Let it be said at once that from this point of view the British were especially favored by the division of Germany into zones of military occupation. In fact, their zone extended from the Dutch frontier to Prussia and centered on the great port of Hamburg. In Austria it included a large part of the eastern alpine massif and therefore enjoyed direct access to the port of Trieste.

The importance of holding well-equipped and efficient ports in the wreckage of the immediate postwar period led the Americans to carve the enclave of Bremen out of the British Zone and to ask the Belgian authorities for the use of the port of Antwerp. They used these ports for repatriating troops being demobilized, supplying those that were remaining to occupy Germany, and sending home a number of V-2 rocket bombs—found intact in the underground factories in Saxony—together with thousands of cases containing tons of important documents taken from the files of industrial firms and military commands.

The American press never played up these operations, which in themselves were not very interesting to the general public. The British press was absolutely mum on them, for the Transport Service was discreetly controlled by a special section of Intelligence, which distributed material and documents to Britain, Canada, and Australia, according to the instructions it received, by falsifying the declarations of the contents of the cases that were shipped.

CONCERNING SECRET SERVICES AND OTHER MATTERS

Since the beginning of spring 1944 the British Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee (B.I.O.S.) had been compiling lists of experts to be included in the various investigatory teams, so that every sector of enemy technology would be covered.

One of these teams included professors Ben Lockspeiser and W. J. Richards, Dr. S. H. Hollingdale, and Captain A. D. Green. It was concerned with "Pioneering inventions, missiles and rocket and turbine aircraft."

T. A. Taylor and M. A. Wheeler—also from the Ministry of Aircraft Production—formed part of another team that was chiefly searching for thermorefractive materials for gas turbines.

One team, described as being "of a high scientific level," remained in the Rhine Palatinate in the French Zone for a long time. It was believed that Dr. Ernst Westermann, former director of the F.D.R.P. institutes of Speyer and Saarbrucken, was in the area and could furnish information on the activity of the Fireballs.

In general, the experts on the various teams (there were also mixed Anglo-American and Anglo-Canadian teams) were able to put their finger unhesitatingly on the objectives to be "explored." Considering that the state of war had been ended for only a short time, how was it possible to obtain such accurate information in spite of the rigid barriers set up by the Nazis?

On the Allied side, the undisputed master in the European sector was the British secret service, flanked by the French Deuxième Bureau, which, however, was already in clear decline in 1939, in both its cadres and its activity, because of political interference. Before the war, the Soviet secret service had mainly functioned as a political police force. And the American O.S.S., formed in 1942, had as its principal assignment the countries of the Far East threatened by or involved in Japanese expansionism. No wonder then that the British succeeded in getting the lion's share in the secret division of German scientific booty, beating their allied adversaries in speed and accuracy.

Through various secret sources (aerial photographic reconnaissance, Jewish refugee scientists, favors from neutrals, espionage checks on German deliveries of gasoline to government institutes and military centers, and so on) British intelligence had been aware ever since the end of 1941 that the Germans were working on large flying bombs and on processes to release atomic energy. Knowledge that the Nazis were pressing the Vichy Government to have French industry supply certain synthetic resins particularly resistant to heat and acids, were increasing the production of liquefied gases in France, and were designing ultralight pumps gave further cause for concern.

The British secret service then got the bright idea that it would be possible to find out which German institutes and industries were engaged in avant-garde research and to keep track of them indirectly by selling advanced products to the Germans. At the opportune moment, large formations of bombers could keep those same products—now transformed into deadly weapons—from being used against the Allies. . . .

A dummy corporation called Omnium Société Française des Produits Synthétiques enabled the British to weave a tight network of specialized informers throughout German-occupied Europe. Very soon information began to flow into the London offices of the Intelligence Service, where a large map of "special objectives" was gradually being filled in. One by one, these objectives were to receive the attentions of R.A.F. bombers, the Commandos, the T Men, and, when the guns fell silent, the teams from M.A.P. and other technically oriented ministries.[2]

One invaluable contribution to the completion of that map was finally furnished when certain S.S. files were captured.

At the beginning of May 1945 Himmler had moved his general headquarters to Flensburg, near the Danish frontier, once again offering secretly and unsuccessfully to surrender all the German forces on the Western Front in order to be in a better position to oppose the Russian advance in the east. When he saw there was no hope that his crimes would be condoned, and well aware that he was a "war criminal," Himmler fled. By pure accident he fell into the hands of the British. While this diabolic personage was dying from the vial of poison he had bit into, the officials of his disbanded entourage were telling Intelligence Service agents the location of various hiding places in Germany where the most important or most compromising documents were secreted. And so the hunt was on for both the criminals of the Gestapo and the most jealously guarded secrets of German technology.

CHAIN RESIGNATIONS

In the meantime a radical political change was taking place in England as a popular reaction to the burdens of the long war. The elections brought the Labour Party to power. Consequently a small but perfectly legal and democratic political revolution produced by opposing political and economic ideas was added to the technological revolution that had already begun as a result of the sudden advent of jet propulsion and, even more important, nuclear energy.

Resignations, replacements, and changes quickly altered the physiognomy of government circles in the United Kingdom, even in the aircraft sector.

In July 1945 Professor E. M. Frazer left the M.A.P., where he had been a director attached to Lord McGowan's staff, which was entrusted with the development of civil aviation. In December W. S. Farren left as director of the Royal Aircraft Establishment, a position he had held since 1941, and joined the Blackburn Aircraft Company. His place was taken by Professor W. G. A. Perring, who had been a member of a team that specialized in the investigation of strategic missiles. And Air Commodore Frank Whittle, among many others, resigned as a result of disagreements over the new government's policy on developing jet aircraft engines, which he had been the first to create and build in England.

The M.A.P. itself was an emergency creation of the Second World War and the precursor of the German Jägerstab. It officially ceased to exist after March 31, 1946, and its functions passed to the Ministry of Supply, a far larger ministry, which then had to supervise the planning of new planes, their production, and even the contracting of aeronautical research. The minister in charge remained John Wilmot, who had been in the Ministry of Aircraft Production and also on the Tube Alloys directorate, the original British organization for atom bomb studies.

The person who most benefited from the power shift was without doubt Sir Ben Lockspeiser. Professor Lockspeiser, M.A., M.I., Mech. E., F.R.Ae. S., was a member of one of the best-qualified teams assigned to investigate the German aeronautical industry in 1943; he then became supervisor of scientific research. In 1945 he became Director-General of Scientific Research (Air) and chief scientist in the new ministry.

AIRCRAFT WITH NO TOMORROW

Under the auspices of John Wilmot, the chiefs of the various divisions of the Ministry of Supply held a series of lectures on July 18, 1946, in the Adelphi Theater in London. It was a semiofficial report to the nation on the theme of scientific research in war and peace. After recounting the contribution the British scientific effort had made to the winning of the war, the conferees set forth the programs for the immediate future in the fields of aviation, ballistic missiles, radio technology, and nuclear energy.

In his introductory talk, Sir John Lennard-Jones, director of the office for the coordination of scientific research, declared that the various fields of research—especially that of aeronautics—were already covered by more than seventeen functioning experimental centers created by or under contract to the Ministry of Supply and that others would later be added.

Finally some encouraging news, most of the conferees thought, ill concealing their inner satisfaction. Nevertheless, there were reasons for apprehension and discontent. The Empire was creaking in an alarming manner after the Pyrrhic victory over Germany. Britain's international prestige had dropped considerably. The United States was "overflowing" everywhere except in the countries being crushed by the equally growing menace of Soviet expansionism. Beyond that, the problems of demobilization, the conversion of war industries to peacetime production, the nationalization of heavy industry—all these in themselves were enough to paint a gray picture of postwar Britain. And as if this were not enough, the American invasion in the field of civil air transport threatened to suffocate once and for all the erstwhile thriving British competition.

This last threat arose out of a special situation. In 1939 the designing of civil aircraft had been suddenly and totally interrupted in England in order to dedicate all the resources of the country to military aviation. In addition, the needs of the "Battle of Britain" demanded that preference be given to single- and twin-engined planes (fighters). This prevailing type of construction had, generally speaking, been maintained subsequently, even after America came into the war. The United States assumed the task of developing mainly bombing planes, multiengined craft that have, as is evident, a number of similarities to civil airliners in transcontinental use.

It took seven or eight years of full-time work to design, construct, and put on the runway a multiengined transport plane. So in order to fill as best it could the gap that had begun widening in 1939, the British aircraft industry created a "provisional" or "emergency" category of transport planes after the war, using the major components from surplus four-engined bombers.

Some pretty good transatlantic planes were patched together this way (the Avro Tudor and the Avro York), but in payload, speed, and efficiency they could not compare with their American competitors designed expressly for the purpose. What the British needed in order to make up the handicap and avoid rapid paralysis in the delicate sector of international air transport were designs that were fully up to date. It was well known that America was aiming directly at producing giant planes. Great Britain, which was then producing the best aircraft engines in the world, believed that she could do as well as the United States or perhaps even better.

Reacting quickly, the British laid down the Bristol 167 Brabazon I. The plane had eight paired Bristol Centaurus engines producing a total of 20,000 HP, driving three-bladed contrarotating propellers; the wing span was 230 feet; fully loaded the plane weighed 130 tons and carried 100 passengers at a cruising speed of 250 mph. The conservative press called it “our 285,000-pound giant of the airways” in a tone of pride not unmixed with apprehension. Would it be a commercial success or a costly bit of prestige condemned to early eclipse?

“The days when England had to get its planes from America are now over. Indeed, let us hope that, as before, the flow of business will be the other way,” Sir Roy Dobson, president of the British Association of Aircraft Manufacturers, is said to have declared euphorically to the press.

Aviation experts began lively debates on cost per flight mile, special runways that would be needed by the giant planes, and the limited number of international airfields capable of handling this sort of machine. Some considered it a triumph of technology, others merely a dangerous adventure.

Opinions were divided, but meanwhile construction continued. In the end it swallowed up twelve million pounds (part of which was spent on fixed investments: hangars, assembly bridges, a reinforced runway), and two million pounds were later spent for the prototype of the Brabazon II, a more powerful model with the first Bristol Proteus turboprops (eight turbine engines producing a total of 25,000 HP, with a cruising speed of 340 mph and a range of about 5,000 miles).

At the beginning of 1950, when it was realized that this type of airplane could be an enormous failure from the point of view of commercial return, it was too late to try to get back any of the allocated funds. And there was little consolation in the almost contemporaneous failure of the gigantic Hughes M.4 Hercules flying boat, a similar project in transoceanic transport developed in California that also proved to be "without a tomorrow."[3]

The mistaken decision to build air giants (the two Brabazon models and the Saunders-Roe SR-45 Princess hydroplane) cost the English taxpayer a good deal, but it did not keep the British from embarking on other "essential" projects.

The directors of the M.A.P. had in fact cold-bloodedly shut off funds from duplicate projects, projects that gave little hope of success, and those that could be replaced with more promising, less costly or more modern projects.

In the list of victims destined to be cut off from government funds there was, to the incredulous surprise of the experts, the supersonic Miles M-52, being prepared by the Miles Aircraft Company of Reading, which had designed it in answer to a secret competition for a thousand-mile-an-hour plane that the Air Ministry had opened in 1943.[4]

And so in February 1946, a few months after the first test flight, the contract with the Miles firm was unilaterally canceled by the government, although the detail designs were 90 percent complete, the assembly jigs ready, and even partial assembly of the plane begun.

The M.A.P. took the responsibility for this serious decision on behalf of the R.A.F., giving as its reason that it would be very uneconomical to continue the original line of approach to matters of supersonic speed with the M-52 project.

Referring to this surprising change in program, Sir Ben Lockspeiser told the London press that the problems of supersonic flight would be solved through the use of rocket-propelled planes.[5]

THE SUPERSONIC ROCKET-PROPELLED VICKERS E-24/43

After going into the matter thoroughly, the aviation editor of the London Daily Herald summed up the whole question on September 6, 1946:

"Work on a 1000 mph aeroplane, which has already cost the Ministry of Supply £200,000 and is three-quarters finished, has been abandoned. It has been decided that no experimental aircraft will be flown by a human pilot until it is known precisely what happens at 750 mph, the speed of sound.

"'We just have not the heart to send any test pilot out into the scientific unknown of supersonic speeds,' says Sir Ben Lockspeiser, Chief of the Ministry of Supply aeronautical scientists. . . . The official explanation given by the Ministry of Supply for the cancellation of the contract is: 'Other avenues of research are being explored.'

"These 'other avenues' include a spectacular radio-controlled craft which will probably be flown this year. It is expected to give Britain the first practical secrets of supersonic flight."

Wind-tunnel experiments proved to be unreliable when the wind velocity approached that of sound (1087 feet per second at sea level) because the test chamber then became criss-crossed by bands of shock waves that changed the conditions of the wind current of the model being experimented on. As a consequence, Vickers-Armstrong-Supermarine—builders of the famous Spitfire—had decided in 1943 to prepare flying models equipped with rocket engines. The higher-ups in the M.A.P. suggested that they use the M-52 configuration in one-third scale. Cessation of work on the plane coincided with the start of this new cycle of research.[6]

The Vickers rockets were attached to the belly of a De Havilland Mosquito light bomber, which released them at 35,000 feet at a speed of 400 mph. At the moment of release an automatic pilot kept the model in a glide for fifteen seconds until it reached 30,000 feet. At this point the rocket cut in and in eighteen seconds accelerated the model to the speed of sound and in seventy seconds brought it up to its theoretical maximum of 875 mph. After this, the fuel having been used up, the speed dropped rapidly and the automatic pilot put the model into a steep dive into the sea. During the short time that the model was traveling at supersonic speeds, a radio apparatus transmitted data on the aerodynamic behavior of the contours of the model and the functioning of its propulsive system to a ground station.

The tests took place in the vicinity of the Scilly Islands, off the coast of Cornwall, along a fifteen-mile flight path, and the rockets were tracked by radar into the open Atlantic. Although the tests were scheduled to start at the end of 1946, it was not until March 1947 that the R.A.F. received the first models of the Vickers rockets. They weigh 800 pounds fully loaded, so they were fairly large but not spectacularly so.

In early November the first rocket was tested, with mediocre results. It had been damaged in transit to Cornwall and was unable to do any better than 600 mph.

There followed a series of failures for various causes, and it was not until January 1949 that one of the models (the fifth in the series) finally operated perfectly, reaching Mach 1.36, equivalent to 1,035 mph. There was no further information because the testing cycle was over.

No public announcement was made—which was very consistent of the Director-General. In April 1947 Sir Ben Lockspeiser had brusquely told journalists who were besieging him for news: "This new plane is not a weapon but a flying laboratory of interest only to a few scientists. The dates of the tests will be kept as secret as possible because this kind of research does not thrive on publicity."

"SUCTION"

In the meantime the Miles company, which had put all its hopes in the M-52 project, was wrecked in the stormy waters of postwar British aviation. In 1948 Handley-Page took over whatever survived the bankruptcy, founding a new firm, Handley-Page Reading, Ltd., while the directors of the old Miles company formed the small company of F. G. Miles, Ltd., for the construction of light training and private planes.

Thus the first British company to conduct in-flight experiments on the secrets of suction of the boundary layer—a milestone in the development of flying saucers—disappeared from the scene. Willy-nilly, the company had been led into the study of these secrets while its main line of work suffered.

Here we must introduce a brief aside on what the boundary layer is and how it is controlled. This explanation must of necessity be oversimplified and overconcise. Oily substances flow slowly because they are highly viscous. Air also is viscous, but to a degree four or five thousand times less than oil. Viscosity is manifested as a sort of friction in the molecules that hinders the free running of the fluid flow, generating imperceptible moving stratifications of decreasing speeds as the flow moves in from the free atmosphere and approaches the walls of the swept body. Everyone is familiar with, for example, the variations in the speed of water flowing through a canal. Only the central portion flows swiftly. At the edges, the water is almost stationary.

The layers of air that are influenced in varying degrees by the walls of the body moving through it are known as the boundary layer. An airplane, therefore, drags along with it a sort of mantle of air that is continuously renewed after being uselessly accelerated up to the speed of the flight (and then left behind), to the detriment of the propulsive power of the plane.

No matter what the speed of the aircraft, at normal altitudes the thickness of the boundary layer at the leading edge of the body is always less than one millimeter and the strata of air that make it up lie evenly on one another (the laminar boundary layer). Then, at a certain distance from the leading edge, depending on the extent of streamlining, its conformation changes and it becomes turbulent. At this point the thickness of the boundary layer increases sharply because the strata of air mingle violently to form a turbulent wake at the rear; this wake is similar to the one we can actually see following a ship because of the greater density of the medium it is traveling through.

Starting from the point at which it thickens (called the transition point), the natural microscopic eddying increases beyond its proper value and gives rise to a growing, excessive dissipation of energy. In other words, the aerodynamic resistance of the body increases.

It seems clear, therefore, even to a layman in aeronautics that the objective should be to move the point of transition as far to the rear of the moving body as possible in order to minimize the expenditure of motive energy required to propel the body through the air. This is especially true in high-speed flight, since the power required increases at about the cube of the speed.

The physical concept of the "boundary layer" was first delineated by Professor Ludwig Prandtl at Göttingen in 1904. Nevertheless, for many years—until about 1937, when both in Germany and in England aerodynamics specialists began full-sized experiments with specially equipped or planned planes—research on controlling the boundary layer was conducted without any coordination between the technologists and the industrialists in the area of practical applications.[7]

In addition, the research had a single, relatively modest aim, for it was limited to the boundary layer of conventional wing surfaces. In other words, the experimenters were trying to eliminate the "sacs of dead air" along the top wing surface that at low speeds (normally, at take-off and landing) cause dangerous crises in the lift of the wings.

This could and can be obtained in two different ways. With the method of "blowing" the boundary layer, the dead air is pushed aside by a tiny stream of compressed air continuously forced through slots so placed as to affect the point of transition. With "suction" the dead air is sucked into the wing itself, through tiny holes or slots, and then expelled by a pump located within the fuselage.

Blowing and suction are the techniques that have been investigated most; they are also the simplest and oldest techniques for controlling the boundary layer.

SUCTION WINGS

The experiments of the Miles Company in controlling the boundary layer began in 1936 with wind tunnel tests conducted on the wing section from one of their planes called the Whitney Straight. Encouraging results induced the experimenters to work on full-size models. Consequently, in 1937, with the assistance of the Air Ministry, which had got wind of similar German work, Miles modified a twin-engined M-8

Peregrine monoplane for the Royal Aeronautical Establishment (R.A.E.).[8]

The original plane was a light civilian transport carrying six passengers and with provision for two pilots seated side by side. After the internal structure was gutted, most of the top surface of the wing was recovered with perforated aluminum sheeting. Seven continuous very broad and shallow longitudinal canals, running almost the entire length of the half-wing, conducted the air that had been sucked in from the surface to the fuselage where a 10-HP Ford automobile engine ran the pump that sucked in the boundary layer.

The Miles rig was more or less the same as that of the contemporary German experimental plane, the Junkers AF-1 Absauge Flugzeug, designed expressly for the Aerodynamische Versuchsanstalt (A.V.A.) of Göttingen.

The data that the German experiment yielded are now well known from their publication by the American National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (N.A.C.A.), but information about the British results has been kept restricted. Apparently all we know is that flight tests indicated that aerodynamic resistance was lowered by 22 percent.

The Miles firm did not really carry its researches on the possibilities of this very important principle all the way. After having worked out this brilliant stroke, for various reasons—the inherent difficulties in the pumping mechanism, the advent of wing flaps, the drying up of government funds—it returned to traditional designs. In this area, however, better equipped and more powerful companies competitively barred its road and finally drove it into bankruptcy.

On the other hand, the German researches prospered. In 1937 at the A.V.A. in Göttingen professors Betz and Ackeret and the engineers Stüper, Schrenk, Holstein, Schwier, and Wöchner, with the aid of a host of other experts, conducted a test flight of the AF-1, a light high-wing monoplane equipped with a 200-HP engine. It had only one slot for sucking in the dead air. Opposite the hinges of the movable wing surfaces, the slot ran along the entire length of the wing span. Inside the fuselage, directly under the point where the wings were attached to the fuselage, an auxiliary 20-HP engine ran a propeller fan to suck in that part of the boundary layer that could improve lift.

Generally speaking, the flight experiments confirmed what had already been noted—that the lift of "sucked wings" increases in proportion to the quantity of air sucked in up to a lift factor of 4. The maximum value of the lift factor for a normal airfoil often does not exceed 0.5. After that the mass of air that must be moved grows more rapidly than the lift, making it impractical to reach factors above 6. In any case, even with the factor limited to 4, the lift of the original airfoil was increased by eight times!

An improved version, the AF-2, was powered with a 270-HP engine and equipped with a 45-HP fan run off the same engine. At full throttle the fan could suck in 250 cubic feet of air per second. This made it possible in 1940-1942 to achieve, efficiency being equal, a lift factor of 5, an exceptionally high figure for a low-powered single-engine plane.

Rapid calculations by the A.V.A. technical experts revealed that for a multiengined plane of thirty tons with a wing area of 1000 square feet and a lift factor of 4, approximately 2100 cubic feet of air per second would have to be sucked in on landing. In those days, when most people considered the modern air-eating turbojet a utopian vision, this was truly an impressive figure.[9] Indeed, there was speculation to the effect that a huge 250-300-HP fan would have to be carried on the plane to suck in the dead air.

Complementary researches on thin airfoils, which were becoming more and more common with increasing speeds, especially in military planes, immediately made clear the practical difficulties of installing suction plants inside them. The slots on the top surface, the air collectors, and the channeling from wing to pump would in fact have had to share what little free space there was on the inside of the wing with the various complicated internal installations (retractable undercarriage, fuel tanks, weapons, ammunition, position lights, pipes, wires, and various trusses) that are generally situated even in the thinnest "razor-edge" wings of today's supersonic fighters.[10]

The AF models were very slow planes, however, and it was decided to use them to study the behavior of suction during take-off and landing, operations that are performed at relatively low speeds by all planes. Those who backed the building of such planes were mostly trying to obtain high coefficients of lift, and in fact their hopes were not disappointed.

Nevertheless, it was known for some time that control of the boundary layer can also exercise a helpful influence on the penetration drag of the wings and indeed on all surfaces, fuselage included. This was to be translated into an increase in speed.[11]

A.V.A. DEVELOPMENTS AND PROJECTS

In the test flights with the AF planes another finding emerged: the necessity to preserve the volumetric efficiency of the intake pump for flight speeds that were slightly above the minimum speed.

Suppose, the German technicians said, we increased the force of the suction slightly—reducing it to the proper amount at low speeds—couldn't we design a plane with a very small wing area that would offer little resistance and therefore be capable of very high speeds? Or perhaps add a hundred miles an hour or so to conventional planes?

Both at Göttingen and at the L.F.A.'s wind tunnel in Volkenrode, research on suction became definitely oriented toward high-speed flight.

For some time supercharging by means of a centrifugal compressor driven by the engine itself had been common practice with piston engines. By using the compressor as a suction pump, the Messerschmitt ME-109G modified fighter flew a number of experimental flights. The flights demonstrated, however, the difficulties in reconciling the different volumetric capacities required by the two devices, and this dissuaded the technicians from extending the principle to the production series.

In the meantime, it was experimentally established that suction through an opening placed to the rear of a transsonic shock wave could slow down the sharp increase in aerodynamic resistance by approximately Mach 0.1, so that a plane designed to fly 900 kph would be able, the power installed being equal, to reach the fateful goal of 1000 kph. To attain this result a single-seater fighter would have to suck in from 565 to 812 cubic feet of air per second—a capacity that was of the same order as that sucked in by the first internal combustion turbines.[12]

In 1944 professors Prandtl and Busemann sketched out preliminary plans for a high-speed fighter—which never got beyond the design stage—in which the boundary layer was sucked in along the wing span and discharged against the sides of the fuselage through a narrow, half-moon-shaped orifice in such a way as to "blow" the tail boundary layer of the stabilizer area.

Gradually the Aerodynamische Versuchsanstalt technical experts of the L.F.A. reached different but interesting conclusions.

The first was that it was not advantageous to transform ordinary aircraft into planes with a controlled boundary layer because the suction principle was deprived of its best attributes and the difficulties of construction did not compensate for the limited advantages. (If this were not the case, we would not have today those special types of UFO commonly called "flying discs.")[13]

In addition, it was demonstrated that inasmuch as they were planning a special turbine-powered project, it would have been advantageous to combine the two mechanisms into a single whole by feeding the turbine with air taken from the wing orifices instead of by means of the usual forward-ram air intakes.

The outcome of the research is not officially known. This does not, of course, mean that there were no results! Whichever ally got it in his war booty may perfectly well be keeping it a secret today for some sound reason. It seems, in fact, that by reworking the old experiments on "potential frictionless current," the German technical experts may in the final days have succeeded experimentally in reducing aerodynamic friction on appropriately shaped bodies to very low values. And since it was known from results supplied by the Italian supersonic wind tunnel at Guidonia that while wave resistance to high

Mach numbers varies roughly in proportion to speed, frictional resistance increases almost as the square, certain rumors making the rounds at the end of 1944 about the imminent appearance of some new types of highly efficient and very fast planes, "moving through the air like a sponge through water and completely different from anything ever seen before," began to be listened to seriously.[14]

In addition, something less vague had already leaked out in France just before the German collapse in Normandy. There was talk of the feverish preparation of strange fighters powered by special turbines, without any wing or tail surfaces whatsoever and even without the usual air intakes, so that in scientific circles in Strasbourg it was thought to be a kind of new piloted rocket being prepared to take off from some well-hidden fastness in the Black Forest to send the Allied bombers scurrying off.

Similar rumors circulating among the higher-ups of the Luftwaffen-Motor Lager of Gallarate, in Italy, had it, however, that they were not rockets and that the planes would at first be radio controlled.

Does one have to be an experienced technical expert to recognize in all this certain details common to the sudden appearance of the Kugelblitz fighter as well as to the sightings of flying saucers in successive years?

STATIC INTAKE JETS

In the immediate postwar period Professor M. Sedille examined the question from a scientific point of view and at the first Congress of French Aviation gave a talk that was rich with original observations.[15]

In sum, Sedille declared that it would be advantageous to expel the air that had been sucked in after having charged it with a speed equal and opposite to that of the flight of the plane, increasing thereby the propulsive force, for in this way the expenditure of energy required for flight would be reduced to one third.

"Naturally, the necessary substitution of ram air intakes with static intakes would make the advantage nonabsolute," he went on, "because supplementary mechanical compression of the air in exchange for the spontaneous one supplied by ram intake would be required in jet planes. Besides, it would be very difficult with planes of conventional shape to extend suction to the entire external surface of the plane. However, the method could make the use of jet propulsion worthwhile even at very low speeds, by replacing, that is, present very costly forms of 'jet lift.'"

Other theoretical calculations relative to the basic case of the flat sheet lowered the amount of energy required for propulsion to one-seventh. Now the game was indeed worth the candle!

But French plane designers paid no attention to Sedille's proposals. They continued developing conventional planes, and two years later, in 1948, in the Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Sciences of Paris, Professor Maurice Roy "demonstrated," likewise mathematically, how illusory the proposal was.[16]

The negative conclusions of Professor Roy, a genuine aeronautical luminary, were based on the well-taken premise that if the aerodynamic resistance of the other parts of the plane not subject to the suction process (fuselage, rudder, cockpit) were to be balanced, such great quantities of air would be required that it would have to be taken from the free air well beyond the boundary layer of the wing. That was and would remain costly and difficult. For example, the wings of a modern single-seater fighter produce no more than 35 to 40 percent of the total resistance developed by the entire plane, and they are so thin that they do not permit moving large quantities of air with an internal velocity advantageously reduced with respect to that of the movement of the plane.

Would it now be necessary to give up the idea of "macro-suction," i.e., suction extended to all the surfaces brushed by the wind of the flight?

The answer is no, certainly not, provided that everything that is not a "wing" or a surface with equivalent functions is eliminated by hiding or fusing it with the wing in the manner of "flying-wing" planes.

We note that, except for the transparent dorsal bubble, flying saucers do not expose any non-wing element to the "apparent wind" in their high-speed flight.

A COMBINATION

At the time of the last prewar researches on control of the boundary layer, which were very promising in view of the reduction of the internal space required, a combination of suction and blowing appeared. It was also tested with modest success at the Italian aeronautical experimental center in Guidonia, where full-scale experiments had begun when the Italian surrender on September 8, 1943, interrupted all remaining research work.

In Germany, during the war, only the Arado and Dornier firms made experimental bombers (the AR-232/A and the DO-24) with short take-off and landing runs and with high lateral stability obtained by means of the "combined" system. The boundary layer was sucked in through continuous slots near the hinges of the ailerons (the A.V.A. method) and the air was then blown onto the ailerons by a small electric pump located in the wing.

After the war the American firm of Grumman reduced the landing runs of F-9 and F-4 planes on aircraft carriers by 50 percent by using the combined system. Cessna built a large number of fight touring planes by applying the same principle in a more simplified form.[17] One of these, a two-seater engaged in taking aerial photographs in the vicinity of Pasadena, California, on January 3, 1956, encountered three circular planes having a diameter of about fifty feet, giving off a shiny orange glow from their undersides.

Dropping down to the altitude of the Cessna (about 4000 feet), within thirty seconds they flew around it in a wide circle, maintaining a distance of three or four miles. From a quick calculation, they were flying at an average of not less than 1800 mph. After widening the circle, one of the UFOs encountered a long, thin cloud layer as it was flying away and cut it almost exactly in two, producing a very clean break.

"It left a hole as if it had sucked up the cloud!" the pilots said. In fact, for a few moments the wake of the ship became visibly vaporous.

Could anyone deny that intense aerial suction was employed in the flight of the mysterious aircraft?

Two types of aircraft met that day, both using the same principle. Rudimentary in the Cessna, highly advanced in the UFO. The caterpillar and the butterfly . . .

2. For example, the planned missions agreed on between the B.I.O.S. and the M.A.P. envisaged at the beginning of 1945 visiting some fifty-two German aeronautical research and production centers. In practice, it was possible to "explore" only thirty-three of them because the postwar distribution of areas of military administration excluded the British from certain areas of interest to them.

3. Somewhat bigger than the Brabazon, the Hercules had eight Pratt and Whitney Wasp Major engines for a total of 28,400 HP, a 300-foot wing span, weighed 226 tons fully loaded, and was to carry 700 passengers. The plane was conceived in 1942 as air transport for thirty- to sixty-ton tanks, heavy artillery, or entire troop formations. When the expenses for the original project exceeded $18 million, the American government canceled the contract. The builder—the capricious Howard Hughes, a very wealthy flyer and movie producer—then decided to continue the project at his own expense. By 1947 the Hercules had absorbed a total of $25 million. The newspapers reported as follows: "In American aviation circles the final word on the largest airplane in the world is anxiously awaited. There are two groups: one thinks that the M-4 will never get off the water or at the best after a hop of a couple of yards will sink forever; the other thinks that the plane is opening a new era in the field of transcontinental air transport." They were both mistaken. After an awkward test flight about a hundred feet above the water, the "birchwood giant," as skeptics sarcastically called it, was abandoned as too difficult and too expensive to fly. For some time it lay on the wharf between Los Angeles and Long Beach, before being scratched off the list of American flying matériel.

4. The government designation was E-24/43. The supersonic Miles M-52 was supposed to reach 1000 mph at about 35,000 feet. The engine was a gas turbine with a large after-burner, designed and built by Power Jets Ltd. Twenty-four feet long and with a maximum diameter of three and a half feet, this special jet engine took up virtually the entire fuselage. The trapezoidal wing (with a span of 26 feet and only 107 square feet of surface) was not swept back, a configuration that used to be considered indispensable for very fast planes. In order to keep the maneuverability of the plane within a reasonable margin at low speeds, it had been designed with a wing aspect ratio close to that of normal wings (while the M.A.P. specifications called for a wing aspect ratio approaching the figure one). This further contributed to the Ministry of Supply's decision to give preference in the area of winged aircraft to the delta wings that the A. V. Roe company of Manchester had meanwhile designed. The wing tips were diagonally truncated so as to reduce the marginal wave resistance (according to the Busemann scheme) and the symmetrical biconvex airfoil was exceedingly thin and had thin leading and trailing edges. The tail surfaces were designed to be entirely movable and worked by servo-assists with powerful servo-motors because of the aerodynamic loads on them, which were in the neighborhood of a hundred times the load on the tail of the heaviest plane in service at the time. The pressurized cabin could be ejected from the fuselage on command, to permit the pilot to get free of the plane even at supersonic speeds if necessary. Plastic explosive cartridges inserted in the tubular supports joining the cabin to the fuselage and electrically discharged were supposed to sever the frame, thus separating the cabin from the body of the plane. A large parachute would automatically be released and brake the fall of the cabin to the point where the pilot could jump out of it and use his own personal 'chute.

5. This unexpected decision, however, had precedents. In January 1945 the aeronautical engineers S. P. Hutton and H. E. Gamble began a series of tests with solid models of the M-52 in the subsonic wind tunnel of the Royal Aeronautical Establishment. The final report, which was written in July but not printed until five years later, concluded its account of the aerodynamic research with an observation from calculated data that "at high Mach numbers the plane could be unstable." If not wholly negative, the verdict was clearly not very sanguine, and it marked the decline of the Miles approach, which ended with the firm's collapse just when certain German war designs (the supersonic D.F.S.-Siebel planes) seemed to promise superior operational qualities.

6. The devices constructed by the Vickers engineers were small rocket planes formed of a cylinder of steel sheet with removable caps at either end. They were eleven feet long, with a single cantilever wing having an eight-foot span. With its symmetrical biconvex airfoil as on the real plane, the wing was a solid wood construction composed of a number of plies of pressure-glued mahogany. The edges were reinforced with light alloy sheathing and had normal ailerons for maneuvering. The tail assembly was made of wood "improved" with birch, but only the leading edge of the rudder was reinforced with light alloy sheathing. The armoring also served as the radio antennae, the wing sheathing for the receiver, and the rudder sheathing for the transmitter. The interior of the cylinder contained the tanks for liquid C and liquid T and for compressed air; the automatic pilot; the radio receiver; the transmitter; the small rocket engine. The ailerons and the elevators had servo-controls operated by compressed air and commanded by the automatic pilot. (This system had already been successfully employed by the Germans on the V-1 flying bombs.) The rudder was fixed for straight-line flight. At the front were the pitot tube for measuring speed and the balancing weights.

The switch for the electric installation was centrally located and easily accessible. The propulsion of the machine was obtained via diergolic (i.e., two-liquid) propulsion: liquid C (34 liters of methyl alcohol with a 30-percent solution of hydrazine hydrate and 20 percent of water) and liquid T (54.5 liters of hydrogen peroxide with 20 percent water)—generally used in the German antiaircraft rockets. The combustion chamber was a light metal cylinder seventeen and a half inches long and four and three-quarters inches in diameter. In order to eliminate the necessity of cooling the walls, they were lined internally with a layer of carbon cement two inches thick, mixed with a special ceramic binder. The thickness of the cylinder was further increased at the rear end in such a way as to form the narrow section of the exhaust nozzle. When the construction was completed, the weight of the craft was about 500 pounds dry and about 800 pounds fully loaded. Parallel with the small series of rockets for the Royal Aeronautical Establishment (R.A.E.), Vickers also prepared different types of fuselages and wings for their own experiments toward achieving the best wing shapes and arrangements, according to eighteen different dispositions arrived at in the design stage. In addition, there were also "V" or "butterfly" wings (in technical parlance, frontal dihedral wings), to which the firm's experts attached a great deal of importance. It seems that it was also intended to equip the devices with a remote control of the type perfected for air-launched guided projectiles for precision fire against targets fifteen to eighteen miles away. This gave origin to a type of self-propelled projectile midway between planing bombs and flying bombs, but it had no practical results. In 1950 the Supersonic Division of the Flight Section of the Royal Aeronautical Establishment compiled in report A.R.C. No. 2,835 all the data furnished by the "flight trials of a rocket-propelled transsonic research model: the RAE Vickers Rocket Model," which remained a classified document until 1954.

7. During that long period of time the Göttingen "school" and the aeronautical faculty of the University of Cambridge stood out above all. A systematic series of physical and mathematical investigations was carried out between 1919 and 1936 at Cambridge under the direction of Professor Melville Jones and with the assistance of Professor G. J. Taylor. The fresh ideas that were produced resulted in several patents. Some were by the noted German designer Lippisch, the Canadian engineer Stenstone, the British firm of Bristol (1936), and one by Air Commodore Whittle (1938) based on the adoption of a rudimentary gas turbine. There were still others but none of them ever became a reality. The main reason for their failure—apart from the aircraft industry's lack of interest—was that they used the residual energy in the exhaust gases of a piston engine (for blowing) or the slight vacuum developed during the intake stroke (for suction). But the few patents envisaging the use of turbines always ran into the ever present problem that there was absolutely no usable turbine orifice with long-wearing qualities and the ability to function with an acceptable degree of thermal efficiency. Another insurmountable barrier was the minimal advantages offered by limited application of the principle. The limitation still holds today within the range of conventional aircraft, for reasons that will shortly become clear.

8. See F. G. Miles, "Sucking Away the Boundary Layer: Results of some Full-Scale Flying Experiments," Flight (London, No. 1,570, January 26, 1939), pp. 82b–82d. For some time the Royal Aeronautical Establishment had a staff of specialized researchers in suction at its disposal. After the R.A.E. had completed and then filed the researches conducted with the Miles firm, it took up the wind tunnel studies again with reduced-size wing sections. In one of the most successful experiments —on a symmetrical airfoil derived from the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics' development, NACA-0020, but with a single suction slot on the top surface that extended along 50 percent of the chord—a 60 percent reduction of aerodynamic resistance was achieved. (Cf. A.R.C., Report No. 1,913, published in 1943.) The long series of studies on "humped" airfoils—of which we shall have more to say—having failed in practice, together with the ever higher speeds reached by jets, then focused the attention of government experts on the problems of swept and delta wings. A reawakening of interest in the problems of suction—based, however, on traditional concepts—has been shown in more recent times with the work of Dr. Lachmann of Handley-Page Ltd. In the spring of 1956 the left wing of a DH-113 night fighter was modified with the application of a perforated "glove" along the center line of the top surface. In flight, a local reduction of 82 percent in the surface-friction drag was obtained in this way and consequently the drag of the wing was reduced to less than one-fifth. Nevertheless, the energy gain rapidly fell off with the increase in speed, because of the dropping off of the degree of kinematic viscosity, once again confirming the axiom that the conformation of present-day aircraft does not lend itself to the full exploitation of the principle. For a concise examination of the most recent developments see S. Caldara, "Le ricerche in Gran Bretagna sul controllo dello strato limite," Alata Internazionale (Milan, July 1967), pp. 31–32.

9. To give an example, the powerful Wright 18-BD "Cyclone" twin-radial of 2500 HP at take-off aspirates eight to nine pounds of air per second at full throttle, equivalent in round figures to not more than 100 to 125 cubic feet.

10. Now as then, between the powerful and violent suction of the jet engine and the removal of the boundary layer (especially if continued and extended) there is a series of not insignificant difficulties that are epitomized principally by the need to work with more rows of slots along the chord. These slots would have to be opened or closed as needed in order to make the suction zone coincide with the transition point; in other words, suction would have to take place where the actual separation of the fluid vein is observed—and this point, moreover, shifts with the angle of incidence. The slots would in addition have to be rather narrow—not exceeding 0.031"—otherwise the volume of the sucked air would be excessive at the expense of the efficiency of the installation. The "velocity of suction" and the quantity of "dead air" sucked in would, however, have to increase in direct proportion to flight speed.

(That is, in the jargon of the technical experts, it is necessary to strengthen the aerodynamic effect of the "downcast shaft.") Unfortunately, as speed increases the wings become proportionately thinner and their slight internal volume does not lend itself well to the installations of the wide, straight, hermetically sealed channels necessary for the undisturbed, slow removal of the air that has been sucked in. To improve a plane's total coefficient of aerodynamic penetration, it would be necessary to extend the suction of the boundary layer to the entire upper surface of the wing and to the first third of the fuselage. (The rear portions, including the tail assembly, could be blown.) But even this solution entails cumbersome installations, all of them essential: cockpit, engine, main fuel tank, heavy arms and ammunition, radio, radar, a profusion of tubing and wires, from which it is clear that the "integral" solution is practically impossible with the present types of cross-shaped planes with wings and tail assemblies.

11. In 1932, for his researches on "sucked wings," the engineer Oskar Schrenk had constructed a model of a wing about nine and three-quarters inches thick, containing tiny fans operating on three-phase asynchronous motors, at first with a single slot on the upper surface and later with multiple slots. The second approach gave the German scientist the first confirmation of the fact that the movement of the air current along the wing for a determined value of suction was almost identical with the theoretical shape of the "potential frictionless flow." The same deductions were later extended by analogy to the moving bodies (three-dimensional) differing from the airfoils (two-dimensional).

12. The German turbojets of the Junkers-Jumo 004 series—mounted on the famous ME-262 fighters—when static sucked in about forty-four pounds of air per second. In 1946 German aerodynamic researches, especially the studies on combining turbojet propulsion with control of the boundary layer, were demonstrated to British experts by Professor R. Smelt during an interesting lecture at the Royal Aeronautical Society, in which part of the German illustrative material, which had been restricted for reasons of military security, became public. (See Flight, London, October 17 and 24, 1946.)

13. This observation remains valid today, having been proved by the results of a recent American experiment. See A. Gattin, “Un esperimento ancora troppo costoso: l’aereo con ala aspirate,” Nuove Ali, Rome, XVIII (1966), No. 5/6, pp. 35–37. In the experimental Northrop X-21A—a complete transformation and adaptation of the Douglas WB-66D Destroyer, a light bomber—a double installation enclosed in two pods under the wings removes 60 percent of the boundary layer from the 1216 square feet of wing area by means of two low-pressure compressors, while the remaining part is sucked away by back-up high-pressure compressors (which also receive the mass of air sucked away by the low-pressure compressors) and carried to the internal combustion turbines which drive the compressors and whose exhaust contributes to the propulsion of the plane (which is principally taken care of by two J-79-13 turbojets located in the tail). This complicated process is matched by considerable complexity in the structure of the wing, which requires almost three miles of very fine slots in the wing with a width of from .003" to .009" (very difficult to make with current machinery) and about 800,000 holes ranging from a quarter to a sixteenth of an inch in diameter to move the air from the collection channels underneath the slots to the main piping bringing the air to the intakes. All this in order to guarantee—at a cruising speed of Mach 0.85 at 27,000 feet—a 60 percent increase in range or a 19 percent increase in gross take-off weight, which is about thirty-six tons. Interesting improvements, but not compelling. Indeed, despite the fact that the plane is in itself a mechanical jewel, not a single significant step has been taken to put the formula in actual production since April 18, 1963, when it was first flown.

Waves and Boundary Layers," Aeronautical Research Council Current Paper No. 180 (H.M.S.O., London, 1955), p. 50. See also NACA Technical Report No. 3223 (Washington, 1954). The importance of reducing aerodynamic friction is especially evident in prolonged supersonic flight and even more so in hypersonic flight. By lessening the overheating of the wall resulting from the kinetic effect, it would be possible to employ metal alloys lighter and less costly than stainless steel and titanium, thereby contributing as well to the most economical solution to the complex problem of supersonic commercial air transportation.

17. In the Cessna 170 monoplane there are in fact no mechanical pumps to remove the "dead air." The removal is effected by mixing ducts fed by a compressed hot air generator installed in the fuselage behind the pilot. The trailing edges of the outboard wing are "blown," while those of the inboard wing are "sucked." The principle is obviously original, but it is limited to only one-sixth of the wing surface and therefore does not lend itself to intense suction over the whole wing. However, it can give some idea of the complexity of the problems related to the "control of the boundary layer."

A Time of Spectacular Possibilities

It is certainly no exaggeration to say that the so-called UFO question literally exploded in the United States in 1952.

Five years had passed since the first sightings, but no substantial change had taken place in the situation. Indeed, the Air Force's continuous denials had ended by confusing even those who were determined not to be hoodwinked.

In the concert of conflicting opinions there were those who remembered when Captain Ruppelt took over the A.T.I.C.'s commission of inquiry. In one of the press conferences that accompanied the event, Ruppelt had hesitantly brought up the hypothesis that the Russians might have discovered such completely new aerodynamic concepts as to make the fantastic performance of the discs possible. But Ruppelt had so hedged his statement with ifs and buts that the hypothesis was rendered almost unacceptable from the start. He overdid it, mentioning the panic in Air Force circles toward the end of the summer of 1947 that arose precisely because of the growing suspicion that "someone" (the Russians were first choice) had found some new principle or method of aerial propulsion lying ready-made in Germany or had invented or accidentally discovered something radically new.

In actual fact, the "new" principle, as we have seen, was an old veteran of the mechanics of flight, nearly half a century old if we go back to its first elementary formulation. Moreover, in the past, American experts themselves had more than once underlined the alluring possibilities that control of the boundary layer offered to aviation.

In 1931, during some wind-tunnel experiments on various types of hyperlift wings, the engineer Millard J. Bamber obtained for the first time negative drag coefficients because the air flowing out of the top surface slot (in this case by "blowing") took such an active part in the aerodynamic process that it pushed the wing model against the wind.[1] In September 1936 R. B. Maloy summed up the various aspects of the question in the following five points:

1. Planes more efficient than those of today will soon be required and only control of the boundary layer can give them to us.
2. The power required is not prohibitive.
3. On the basis of experimental data thus far available the suction method is superior to blowing.
4. Control of the boundary layer in substratospheric transport planes and in military aircraft operating between 30,000 and 50,000 feet is rich with promise for the future.
5. Further experiments are required, however, to determine the distribution and the dimensions of the orifices for the suction and of the relative accessories.

Finally, how can anyone ignore or undervalue the conviction that the celebrated Theodor von Karman expressed in the spring of 1937, when at a conference of the Institute of Aeronautical Sciences in New York he placed control of the boundary layer first in the list of the aerotechnical conquests of the immediate future?[2]

In America these objectives were crushed under the heavy yoke of the war, which demanded from industry mass production rather than pioneering research. When the war was over, the scales of aeronautical innovation (turbines, rockets, radar, and suction) leaned heavily in favor of the Old World, and, indeed, the situation threatened to grow worse. American political leaders were lulling themselves into a Nirvanic state—although marred somewhat by the unexpected Russian awakening and the unfavorable turn of events in China—because they mistakenly believed that they had started an Anglo-American version of the famous thousand-year Pax Germanica that the Führer euphorically promised the world as he contemplated his “secret weapons.” But meantime a great mass of scientific documents discovered in Germany, far in advance of anything that was going on in the New World, were flowing into Moscow and, above all, into London.

When America’s leaders realized that although their aeronautical industry was indeed very strong it was likely to fall behind if it did not take full advantage of the new ideas developed in Europe during the final phase of the war, their interest in revolutionary developments abruptly ceased to be lukewarm. But by then, despite the zeal and insight of a few far-seeing officers in the Air Force and Army, a considerable portion of German scientific booty had already ended up in other hands.

In England, for example, the Ministry of Aircraft Production had hurriedly cornered and translated all the secret papers concerning the most promising German experiments on the boundary layer and the aerodynamics of supersonic flight at high altitudes. Meanwhile, Russia had cornered the market on missile experts and materials, which subsequently led to the Sputniks.

THE AERODYNAMICS OF POROUS SURFACES

When the war ended and the British experts were able to integrate their own experiments on the boundary layer with the heavy contributions of German investigations, the watchword became: “New aircraft designs for new forms of propulsion!" Taking the Feuerball as the main model, they gave a perfectly symmetrical form to the "suction" aircraft, making it circular and wrapping the wing around the suction pump like a ring. Enlarged and flattened, the pump was transformed into a single rotor turbojet engine; thus it could also, indirectly, perform the functions of a jet engine.

Then the British got rid of every vestige of control surfaces, because since 1939 it had been established that the suction of the boundary layer could be used advantageously for maneuvering in place of the normal empennage and movable surfaces, or they could be integrated, making the movements of the craft quicker and more responsive. With the entire top surface of the aircraft made aeropermeable, or porous, they extended the suction to include the mass of air above the actual boundary layer with the aim of putting a large volume of air to work and thereby also improving the efficiency of the engine.[3]

The keystone of this new suction system was, finally, the replacement of the slotted or perforated skin panels used in the old experiments with a pitted covering in "porosint" and its derivatives. These are materials that possess among their numerous advantages (and some inevitable defects) that of being able to withstand continuous temperatures in the neighborhood of 500° Centigrade, despite the fact that there is a large proportion of aluminum in their composition.

An extensive series of experiments had, in fact, made it possible for the British to establish that the removal of the boundary layer by suction, especially when practiced on a large scale, was much more effective if it was done through a highly porous surface rather than through drilled and slotted panels.

Beginning in 1944 they developed a special branch of aerotechnical research that the researchers called "porous sheets aerodynamics."[4] Born in the hail of flying bombs and torpedo rockets, this branch of research seemed to reach its zenith in 1946, falling off—apparently—to the simple rank of an auxiliary technique for improving the lift of wings—rather sadly coming full circle. . . .

Officially, all these detailed experimental investigations came to no more than a few unpublicized test flights with models—apparently certain mysterious television-guided flying models were experimented with in the winter of 1945–1946—and then to a complex series of wind-tunnel measurements on wings of various shapes and sizes.

After years of study and dedicated and costly research, there was not even one plane, not even an experimental one. Does that seem too little?

Too little indeed; and not believable. Especially since, as a number of qualified witnesses have unanimously declared, the top surface of the mysterious flying discs normally shows no visible air intake for propulsion, as could be seen on all jet planes built before then and in the twenty years since.[5]

SEMIOFFICIAL ADMISSIONS

In December 1946, during a conference on the future of British aeronautics, Sir Ben Lockspeiser declared that he was a partisan of the system of suction. Thanks to suction, "the plane would then slip through the air in the same way a piece of wet soap slips through the fingers . . . it is hoped eventually to obtain a wing drag of not more than about one-third of what is now common."[6]

Before that, during the thirty-fourth Wilbur Wright Memorial Lecture, held at the Royal Aeronautical Society in London on May 30, 1946, Professor E. F. Relf, one of the best British aerodynamics experts of the old generation, declared: "Recently a further system of regulating the boundary layer by means of suction through minute holes heavily distributed over the surface touched by the apparent wind, rather than through one or more slots as has been done until now, has been taken under study at the National Physical Laboratory. This idea, too, is not new. What is new is the production of the right porous material—sinterized in the form of spongy bronze—that possesses very small and very regular interconnected interstices.[7] Dr. Preston has studied this problem from the theoretical point of view and is convinced that it is very promising."

Promising from the point of view of aeronautic progress. But, according to the official story of this line of research, this progress was only an empty promise. So they say . . .

In introducing his heavily documented talk, which contained many significant disclosures, Relf stated that recent aerodynamic experiments on "suction" seemed rich in possibilities for the future. "I feel we are on the verge of discoveries and advances almost as spectacular as that flight of Orville Wright's, forty-three years ago.[8]

That is enough for the moment, for we will soon find this final concept—linked with certain truly portentous developments—fully confirmed.

Comparing the cautious but still rather euphoric tenor of these declarations with the equally compelling news quietly given to the British press at the same period concerning certain extraordinary ultra-high-speed aircraft being perfected at the government laboratories in Bedford, we will have to agree that a few simple wings and several large flying models cannot justify the loss of traditional British self-possession, notoriously sparing in superlatives and empty promises.

Something really exceptional was secretly boiling on the back burner of British aviation.

LUFTSCHWAMM

The development of the aerodynamics of porous materials is clearly creditable to the British experts who worked on the problem during the last two years of the war. But historically, it is equally clear, the original idea took form just before the outbreak of hostilities. It was, in fact, in 1937 that Perring and Disprose of the National Physical Laboratory tried unsuccessfully to repeat in full-scale size the old experiments of the German engineer Schrenk on "frictionless air flow," the concern and hope of all students of flight.

The same problem was successfully tackled by Professor Ackeret, who was in the dark as to the Englishmen's work and its failure, since they never published the complete results of their investigations.[9] His experiments, which were completed on the eve of the war, made clear from that time on that it would be necessary to create an "ideal surface" consisting of microscopic holes. But these aeropermeable surfaces would be very difficult to manufacture with conventional methods.

When the British experts learned of these conclusions (the last exchanges of technical information among the European countries before the curtain of military secrecy fell), they decided to look for some synthetic material. After all, the chemical industry had been using porous ceramic filters for about twelve years.

At the Applied Physics Laboratory of the National Physical Laboratory preliminary tests were made on the suction flow through a single orifice measuring .01 of an inch in diameter. With a long, almost imperceptible whistle the prescribed quantity of air repeatedly passed through the small orifice in the prescribed time without developing appreciable wave patterns. The principle worked!

This minor event was destined to give a new course to aeronautical progress, but no one foresaw it at the time. The event took place, it seems, in 1939; and from then on, the new aerodynamics began to take shape in both England and Germany.

The porous ceramic baffles were, however, soon replaced with materials that were stronger from a structural point of view but equally permeable.[10]

The British worked with a great variety of sheets: asbestos, phosphor bronze, glass textiles similar to Fiberglas, duralumin and various alloys.[11] During 1943–1944 the Germans also initiated a long series of researches on the sinterization of light alloys based on aluminum and magnesium and on both solid and porous aluminum bronze.[12] In Göttingen and Volkenrode the experts in the new techniques of flight gave these sintered porous materials the felicitous name of Luftschwamm (aerosponge) and proposed to revolutionize the laws of resistance to the forward motion of airplanes.

We still do not know whether they achieved any practical results. We do know the significant fact that in the autumn of 1945 Professor Thwaites of the Aerodynamics Division of the National Physical Laboratory brought together in an internal technical report—A.R.C. No. 9672: Notes on German Theoretical Work on Porous Suction—all the notes taken from the examination of German researches on porous materials (for which a special team of investigators had been formed), comparing them with what had been done up to then in England and with what the British intended to do in the near future.[13]

Needless to say, the report still bears the label “top secret.” Nevertheless, a very small part of that information, unfortunately restricted entirely to the physical and mathematical fields of research on wing surfaces, came to the knowledge of the Americans. Professor Dry den of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics mentioned it publicly at the sixth International Congress of Applied Mechanics, which took place in Paris in September 1946.

In the first German experiments the velocity of the flow from suction was very low (not more than 2 percent of the velocity of the apparent wind) and the quantity of sucked air was therefore modest. But later on, by using more powerful pumps and improved porous sheets, they began to experiment with the dynamic pressure gradients developed at higher flight speeds, and 497.10 mph was now considered an “optimum” for the cruising speed of suction flight at altitudes between 20,000 and 40,000 feet.[14]

THE RELF LECTURE

The history of British postwar researches on suction is rather complicated—quite understandably, given the concatenation of circumstances.

The dissolution, or, better, the metamorphosis, of the M.A.P. into the Ministry of Supply coincided with Sir Melville Jones’ resignation as secretary of the Aeronautical Research Council, the largest British government body concerned with the planning and development of aeronautical research.

In giving the news of his resignation—said to be for reasons of health—the technical publications referred briefly to the fact that in the last three years he had exercised “a great influence on the direction of government research, having successfully reorganized the old Committee and made it a council that was more in tune with the new times.” In addition, he had laid down the plans for equipping the new experimental center at Bedford and for setting up the aeronautical college at Cranfield—a sort of scientific academy for the use of the R.A.F. and industry. A forty-two-year-old professor of applied mathematics at the University of Manchester, Sydney Goldstein, took Sir

Melville Jones' place. Goldstein was indefatigable in his research on "Frictionless Flow" at the National Physical Laboratory.[15]

The stature and work of this new personage would have been confined to the small world of specialists in the field if Professor Relf had not briefly explained the work of the Teddington staff in his Wilbur Wright Lecture, which was covered by reporters from all the major newspapers. Relf had been superintendent of the aerodynamic division of the National Physical Laboratories in Teddington until December 31, 1945.

Professor Relf began his interesting report by saying that although during the war they were particularly interested in bringing research on problems that were useful to the immediate war aims to completion, "the war years have produced some new ideas and discoveries that bid fair to open up revolutionary lines of progress in aeronautics. Some of these new ideas are still veiled in secrecy, but the veil has now been lifted. . . .

"I think it is fair to say that although aerodynamic research has always been full of interest, and even excitement, there never has been a time in which so many spectacular possibilities have been displayed before our eyes."

Ten years before, in 1936, during the proceedings of the James Forrest Conference, Relf had called the attention of experts to the usefulness of extending control of the boundary layer over as much of the surface of the aircraft as possible, since the evidence indicated that aerodynamic resistance could under the best of circumstances be reduced to about 10 percent of the current value—though this would not, of course, be easy to achieve.[16]

Like the experts listening to him, he surely could not have imagined at the time that the day would come when substantial progress in that direction would be made right there in England.

"HUMPED" AIRFOILS

During the war, but before the Anglo-American military agreement on reciprocal exchange of scientific information went into effect, rumors were circulating in American aeronautical circles about certain strange wing shapes with pointed trailing edges; and the Americans wondered what in the world was the purpose of them.

These new aeronautical shapes resulted principally from theoretical investigations worked out mathematically by Professor Goldstein, who had succeeded in defining "by points" the form of a two-dimensional body (an airfoil) developing a given distribution of the fluid velocity and hence of lift.[17]

On the basis of the theoretical premises, experts in the aerodynamics section of the National Physical Laboratory at first studied and designed elliptical airfoils with a tapering trailing edge and subsequently a new series or "family" of exceedingly strange, thick airfoils, generally having a roundish or lobate leading edge and a concave-convex trailing edge that came to a point and that had one or more suction slots where the concave-convex profile began. This family derived from an idea of Dr. A. A. Griffith. In 1942, it occurred to him to extend the Goldstein theory to the field of suction, by following the principle of "adapting the airfoil shape to the process of suction." In other words, Dr. Griffith tried to create true "suction airfoils," which in laboratory jargon were called "humped" airfoils because of their thick, curved upper surfaces that seemed like meaningless deformations to the layman.

Dr. Griffith experimented with several such profiles, differing in thickness, shape, or the position of the tail hollow, at the compressed-air tunnel of the National Physical Laboratory. He found that a "humped wing" easily developed lift coefficients on the order of 2.5 and that lift was about quintupled in comparison with the best wings of the period. The enthusiasm raised by these early results was, however, destined to be short-lived, for the aerodynamic resistance of the "humped wings" considerably exceeded the theoretical estimates. Furthermore, the studies conducted by the National Physical Laboratory experts to bring the grade of efficiency of those otherwise highly advantageous airfoils to at least an acceptable level came to nothing. In addition to Griffith, Richards, Lighthill, and Glauert also had a crack at the difficult problem. They designed a number of new airfoils of different shapes and thicknesses but did not get at the root of the trouble.[18]

To explain the long series of failures, it was finally concluded that turbulence in the wind tunnel altered the results of the phenomenon, which was really more favorable than the test results suggested since it had, after all, been promised by a theory that, also from the mathematical point of view, was flawless.

Since it had proved impossible to establish the actual level of efficiency of the humped airfoils through wind-tunnel tests, it was suggested at the Commonwealth conference on aeronautical research held in London in June 1946 that it might be a good idea to try them in flight tests on full-sized models by adapting an existing plane for the purpose.[19]

The Division of Aeronautical Research of the Australian Council for Scientific and Industrial Research undertook the job. Working in close collaboration with the National Physical Laboratory, they modified a large De Havilland G-2 troop transport glider. The humped wing was built with three slots along the back; a centrifugal fan powered by a Ford V-8 engine in the fuselage sucked the boundary layer through the slots and the hollow rectangular spar (the A.V.A. system). This air was then exhausted out the rear of the plane, developing sufficient thrust by reaction to maintain the craft in line of flight but not enough to enable it to take off by itself.

At the beginning of October 1948 the glider was shipped to the Royal Australian Air Force airdrome in Laverton, Victoria, where the tests took place, the glider being towed to its test altitude by a Dakota.

After the glider’s first flights, Professor Coombes declared with obvious disappointment that all the mechanical problems had been clarified but that the usefulness of the new sucked airfoils still remained “to be proved”—a simple euphemism to mask a complete failure.

OTHER PLANES WITH “NO TOMORROW”

In October 1948—when the UFOs already had a good sixteen months of aerial incursions to their credit (it was the other branch of research on suction that had for some time surpassed the stage of technical and operational maturity of the formula)—the "humped" wings that had been so theoretically brilliant but practically inefficient joined the supersonic M-52 plane in the government files of abandoned projects, along with sketches for subsonic "flying wing" transports with "humped" wings and two laminar "flying wings." The two latter had actually been built and flown, to a great public display of optimism, one in 1942 and the other in November 1947.

These were prototypes of an all-wing glider (AW-52-G Bat) and two examples of a twin-engined all-wing jet (AW-52 Boomerang), made by the Armstrong Whitworth Aircraft company.[20]

On November 13, 1947, one of the powered AWs successfully completed its first flight at the R.A.F. experimental station at Boscombe Down, with chief test pilot A. G. Franklin at the controls. About ten months of frequent test flights followed, then the Ministry authorized its presentation to the public. By tradition, this took place at Farnborough during the annual review of British aircraft production, September 7 to 9, 1948.

Roaring and shrieking, the plane performed its evolutions for a considerable time, demonstrating unusual maneuverability for a machine of its type, a clear indication of easy control, quick response to the controls, and excellent stability. Nevertheless, this was its farewell flight.

One of the planes crashed into the earth a short time later and the pilot saved himself by using the ejection seat. Little by little news about the remaining AW-52 became scarcer and scarcer, even in aeronautical circles. Then it stopped completely, and even though there was talk of the future preparation of "flying wings" of ninety tons for transatlantic transport, the model had no successors.

This could have been foreseen for a number of reasons, not the least of which was the failure of the "humped" airfoils, but above all for the following reasons, here summarized from the manufacturer's technical report:

a) because of difficulties in manufacturing and repairing the airframes. In fact, the technical report states that the first impression the wing gives is the extreme smoothness of the surface and the general care in construction. In order to insure the laminar flow, the airfoil has been made with a tolerance of one one-thousandth of an inch, and for this reason special protection of the alclad sheathing has been prescribed and a protective cloth covering is furnished for transportation. This covering is left in place on the sheathing while the work is going on and is only partially removed for the riveting operation.

All this in order to maintain the extreme smoothness of the wing sheathing!

Anyone who has worked in military aeronautics knows that precautions of this sort are all right so long as the plane is in an experimental center, but when it goes to airfields for actual use, the situation changes markedly. Dozens of airmen and specialists come in daily contact with the machine and it is utterly utopian (especially in wartime) to try to get them to "always" wear chamois gloves and slippers when working on the plane, never to let a single drop of the 1400 gallons of fuel and oil fall on the wing, to scrupulously dust off every speck of dust or damp from that enormous flying mirror (1300 square feet of surface!), and so on.

b) because of the anticipated increase in the angle of the sweep back of the wings. The report says that the extremities of the wing are tapered with a camber at the leading edge of approximately thirty-five degrees. Later planes will have even more of a backsweep so that the wing will resemble the Greek letter delta.

In fact, the later products of the Hawker Siddeley Group were not only triangular in form but were actually called Aero-Delta (the Avro 698 and the Avro 707-B, both with triangular wings), and in addition seemed to be generally similar in appearance to certain mysterious "flying triangles" that a twin-engined U.S. Air Force plane unsuccessfully pursued over Carson Sink in 1952.

c) because a new line of development—agreed upon with the Ministry of Supply—showed even greater promise. Indeed, here are the conclusions of the company's internal report: Recently it was decided to abolish the air-intakes of gas turbine powered planes by taking the air for the jet engine from the surface of the wing. It is expected that the loss of power as a result of the missing self-supercharging effect of ramming will have no importance insofar as the total performance of the plane is concerned.

And so Professor Sedille also had his precursors!

BRITISH HOPES OF REVIVAL

The Hawker Siddeley Group, which later advertised itself as the "Pioneer and World Leader in Aviation," held its ninth stockholders' meeting in London on July 12, 1945.

It was the first postwar meeting and the euphoria generated by the recent victory over Germany (the victory over Japan then rightly seemed only a matter of months) led the speakers to relax very slightly the extreme secrecy that surrounded the new projects of the powerful industrial complex. Even then it was already very large, for in addition to the two branches of A. V. Roe (of Manchester and Avro-Canada of Toronto) and Armstrong Whitworth of Bagington-Coventry, other firms with long aerotechnical experience and originality of ideas were associated with it: namely, Gloster, which for some time was working on the Meteors, the first turbine airplanes; Hawker, the builder of the famous Hurricane fighters; Armstrong Siddeley Motors; Aluminium Ltd.; and a number of minor subcontractors (the system of subcontracting is an excellent method for successfully hiding certain projects that must at all costs be kept secret). This group alone accounted for 30 percent of British aircraft production.

The press and representatives for several ministries were present at the Hawker Siddeley Group's luncheon party. The secretary of the company, Mr. Sopwith, showed scale models of several types of airplanes in project stages in the research departments of the Group. These were "flying-wing" types with various power plants. Some had piston engines (from one to six engines) and propellers; others were powered with the first British turbojets, only one of which took concrete form as a prototype (the AW-52).

Making it perfectly clear that only a part of the new ideas in gestation at Hawker Siddeley had been shown, Mr. Sopwith let himself go in his final toast with enthusiastic visions of the future. Although the idea that present conventional types of planes must be abandoned was still being debated, he said, it was nevertheless quite clear that within the relatively short space of two or three years the forms of aircraft now in existence, and likewise their engines, would be completely outdated!

Starting with 1945, a couple of years would bring us to the summer of 1947—the summer in which one of the strangest affairs of the twentieth century began.

Despite the polite probing of journalists, Mr. Sopwith declined to expand on his remarks and perhaps he was even afraid that he had said too much. In fact, for the remainder of the reception, which was now nearly over, he clammed up, as they say, whenever he was in the presence of journalists.

The Hawker Siddeley Group already employed tens of thousands of persons. Many of the numerous people on the executive level knew what was secretly being developed. It was, therefore, a foregone conclusion that someone would be indiscreet and that in the end something would leak out.

Reporters are constantly on the lookout everywhere, ready to go to any lengths to pick up any news that promises to cause a sensation. Thus when the first news leaks occurred—leaks that the publicists and ufologists cited to convince themselves that the UFOs were of terrestrial manufacture—they appeared in the London press. "All British hopes for a revival of the aviation industry," one of these said, "are based on several types of turbojet engines that, according to authoritative sources, are in a stage of development already so far advanced that we can expect them to be in use by mid-1947. These planes will have fantastic speeds at altitudes over 50,000 feet."[21]

A few months before—on November 7, 1945, to be exact—the English flyer H. J. Wilson had reached a speed of 595 mph over Herne Bay in the twin jet Gloster Meteor IV.

On September 7, 1946, over Littlehampton, E. M. Donaldson bettered Wilson's speed by a bare ten miles an hour. Then it took almost eight years before the English flyer Michael Lithgow wrested the speed record (though not for long) from the Americans with a flight of 737 mph.

RECORDS AND SILENCE

Such being the case—and in view of the well-known English technical competence—how can an increase of 142 miles per hour, spread out over eight years, be calmly passed off as "fantastic speeds"? And how explain the references to altitudes of "over 50,000 feet," where these mysterious planes would achieve their maximum speeds? At such altitudes the first turbojets lost power, and thereby speed, because of the thinness of the air.

Clearly the British were neither lying nor indulging in uncharacteristic bragging. The new types of flying machines presaged such promising developments that they induced the authorities to swallow the bitter pill of the lost speed record silently in order to keep their secret intact.

The importance of that brief communication easily slipped by laymen, and the press as well. So easily that not even specialists in aeronautical matters paid the least attention to it then or later. Conversely, it should be noted that it was precisely "mid-1947," that is, on June 24, that the American businessman Kenneth Arnold saw the first glinting, nimble flying saucers going through their evolutions among the peaks of the Cascades while he was piloting his private plane over the state of Washington.

Strangely enough, those titillating leaks went more or less unobserved even in England—perhaps because of political or economic preoccupations, or simply because of the preoccupations of daily life, not the least of which was the bothersome food rationing that was continued in the name of austerity despite the Churchillian defeat of Germany. Or perhaps part of the press kept silent for political reasons. (The Conservatives were greatly embittered by the unexpected election victory of the Labour Party.)

Whatever the reasons, perhaps the same ones caused the declarations—double-distilled, in any case—of the aeronautical experts of the Ministry of Supply in its "Report to the Nation" the following July to be received with only the faintest echo. A few inches in the papers (no more than half a column, for paper was still severely rationed) and a few hasty comments in the technical journals. Nevertheless, once again there was a little leak—completely involuntary, of course!

Supporting his view that the most vital problem in aeronautics that required study was not overheating caused by aerodynamic friction in supersonic flight but human resistance to sharp accelerations, Sir Ben Lockspeiser in fact declared at one point that experiments with an airplane capable of reaching 4500 mph were being conducted for the Ministry of Supply. Now this was a truly "fantastic" speed, and one that by a strange coincidence was the stratospheric speed reported for one of the UFOs followed on the radar screen in Washington in July 1952.

THE MISUNDERSTANDING ABOUT THE ATHODYDS

The editorial comment of the authoritative journal The Aeroplane, the only magazine that mentioned the matter, was couched in an obviously scandalized tone. Indeed, the experiments were simply called "a dangerous thing."[22] "This is much greater speed than we are accustomed to from official enterprises," said the editorial. "In any case, the athodyd has still to be developed as a practical power proposition at rates of progress still within our comprehension."[23]

The mistaken conclusion that a ramjet plane was concerned had been induced both because during the conference Sir Ben Lockspeiser had praised this simple propulsive device and because a model of an athodyd aircraft, with the pilot lying prone, had been officially exhibited at the Farnborough Aeronautical Exhibition, which took place from June 27 to 29.[24] On another occasion a photographer had caught Lockspeiser in a curious meditative mood, holding the scale model of a ramjet fighter that reminded him of his recent visit to Germany. It had been a fruitful trip. No one could have dreamed that enemy technology was so far in advance also in the field of ramjets.

At the experimental station of the Walter Werke in Wik, the technicians of the T Unit had saved four perfectly operational models from the destruction ordered by their builders, together with various interesting bits of information about a prototype built in the Walter plant in Beerberg in Silesia and subsequently lost in the war.[25]

Farther south the T Unit had found other experimental machines of the same sort at Bad Eilsen, in the huge Bavarian plant of Focke Wulf, where Professor Pabst had, in addition to several ramjet fighters, designed the strange subsonic helicopter powered by rotary ramjets that went under the name Triebflügel Flugzeug and was capable of a speed of 500 mph. Later, many ill-informed publicists incorrectly concluded that this was the father of flying discs of possible terrestrial manufacture.[26]

Still farther south, in Aiming in the Bavarian alps, the T Unit men found the giant D.F.S. engines, which had already been flight tested by Professor Sänger; and then in Austria they found the strange propulsive tubes operating on "coal slag" built by the Viennese Luftfahrtsforschung.[27]

The best jet planes of the time, the British record-holding turbine-engined Gloster Meteors, barely reached a speed of 620 mph. The German rocket engines seized as war booty did not appear, at least for the moment, to provide much more speed. Even the highly touted ramjets failed in the stratosphere. No new direction in air technology then known justified the enormous progress announced by the Ministry of Supply.

By a curious coincidence, the press did not ask for either confirmation or details (which perhaps would not have been granted), but the supporters of high-speed flight immediately found that England had equally determined opponents—in the opposition party.

The papers of the period reported that Lord Mottistone's speech in the House of Lords during the second debate on the Civil Aviation Bill raised a number of conflicting views when he excitedly asked for the floor in order to criticize "our lust for speed," directed toward developing ever faster airplanes whose pilots would be "condemned to a terrible ordeal!"[28] The shelving of the supersonic M-52 had already been decided and acted on since February, but Lord Mottistone's oratorical volley came just at the right time to make the impelling necessity of the action still more acceptable.

As for the athodyds, in succeeding years some experimental planes powered with ramjets did fly in the United States and France. But none flew in England.[29]

THE COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCES

A third source of leaks—somewhat delayed, but very valuable and immediately plugged—appeared in the circle of the Aeronautical Research Council itself, which in June 1946, at the behest of the Ministry of Supply, called a Commonwealth Conference on Aeronautical Research. Held in London, the meeting brought together a hundred experts connected with both governmental and private institutes of air technology in Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

Organized by the retiring secretary, Sir Melville Jones, this was the third such conference to take place after the limited conference between Great Britain and Canada in the summer of 1941 that spelled out the close collaboration between their two industries (especially concerning war production and "certain proposals for scientific investigations to be conducted in the Dominion") and the big Commonwealth meeting in the autumn of 1944, which was mainly directed toward the future of aeronautical research. Part of the work of the third assembly was communicated to the press. Secret sessions were conducted behind closed doors. Nevertheless, a crack did open.

The official comment released at the end of the conference by the Ministry of Supply and the Aeronautical Research Council was vague and cloudy, but not without importance. It established, for example, this solid point: "The best progress in research can be expected only from investigation of a few specific designs combined with a study of the fundamental physical problems which arise in the course of development and construction. We have also commended this for serious consideration."[30]

Not that anyone would have dared doubt it—but what was this serious consideration?

This we heard through a B.B.C. broadcast in August 1946, a bumper year for leaks that were to the advantage of the press and the history of ufology: "The little village of Thurleigh in Bedfordshire will soon become the largest aeronautical research center in the world. The new experimental station that will be constructed there will cost twenty million pounds and its scientific program will include the development of three different categories of aircraft:

"1) low-speed machines, that is, those slower than 450 mph and that can, therefore, still advantageously use propellers.

"2) machines that will have a speed of 1000 mph.

"3) machines that it is hoped will be able to reach at least 1500 mph. According to some experts, these planes have already been built and tested and it is probable that in the near future they will be flying over Great Britain. If necessary, such planes could fly nonstop around the world many times, because they need fuel only for take-off and landing. Great Britain has already astonished the world with its excellent turbojet engines, but this new development of British scientists is the greatest step that aeronautics has taken since man began to fly."[31]

THE ORIGIN OF THE NATIONAL AERONAUTICAL ESTABLISHMENT

The intention to create a large experimental center on very modern principles in order to put Great Britain in the vanguard of aviation took concrete form in 1943, when the Ministry of Aircraft Production commissioned the Aeronautical Research Council to draft an estimate of the equipment considered essential for carrying out research in what would presumably be the aeronautical future in the first five years of peace.

In the Aeronautical Research Committee's internal report No. 7500, the experts of the committee (it was not yet elevated to the rank of council; that came in 1945, with the war's end) suggested that the experimental establishments be centralized in the Bedford area, specifically in the village of Thurleigh, which would have to be sacrificed to make room for the large hangars and cement runways for the new airplanes. Parallel to this scheme, and carefully worked out down to the least detail, were various suggestions for the development of engine research, with particular reference to gas turbines. Later these suggestions became the basis for the conversion of Power Jets Ltd. into the N.G.T.E. governmental center.

The new center at Bedford was supposed to absorb part of the existing facilities in Farnborough, the old and praiseworthy Royal Aeronautical Establishment, especially the equipment concerning research on supersonic flight. Immediately after the war, the plan was modified to include German plants seized as war booty, some of which, however, were later silently put on ships for other destinations—Canada and Australia.

In August 1946 the Ministry of Supply released to the press the first details about the new center, which appeared to be modeled on the once justly celebrated Italian “aeronautical city” of Guidonia. Since the original village was completely swallowed up by the new constructions, the center officially received the name of the nearby city of Bedford and the organization itself was named the National Aeronautical Establishment. Five thousand people, including 1400 scientists and technical specialists, were envisaged as working there.[32]

In July 1948 official news about the National Aeronautical Establishment appeared for the second time. It reported that “despite the present economic difficulties” preparations for the center were proceeding apace.

The first of the eight supersonic wind tunnels that had been planned—the one that measured three by three feet and could develop a continuous flow at 1500 mph—did not go into operation until 1950. Work on the last five—developing an intermittent flow of 2600 mph—did not start until the beginning of 1954.

Nevertheless, despite the notable amounts of energy and money expended, no truly “revolutionary” airplane was ever seen to taxi down the runways of the National Aeronautical Establishment. Originally—that is, when the East Bloc threat was still in a purely formal state—these runways had been constructed to fill the skies with the three fundamental types of airplanes which were to put the seal on British air supremacy. Let us examine these categories a bit more closely.

The first type obviously doesn't interest us. The second type, erroneously including the supersonic M-52, which was to have reached a top speed of 1000 mph but unhappily reached only the files of the Ministry of Supply, appears instead to have been assigned to certain aircraft destined to develop their top speeds in the relatively dense air of altitudes just below or just within the stratospheric range: cigar-shaped aircraft with tiny wings and jet-lift, airplanes with triangular wings of a special sort described as "gothic," and "convertible" airplanes with retractable wings hinged at the fuselage—planes for which 1000 mph was not the goal but the starting point and whose subsequent rare appearances also figure in the case-histories of the UFOs.

The third type, which according to London press circles included the Ministry of Supply's ramjet plane—the wild discrepancy between the publicized performance (4500 mph the first time and only 1500 mph later) was taken to indicate that a healthy realism had prevailed—indicated that an extraordinary type of airplane existed. It was not only capable of surpassing, and perhaps by a considerable margin, the still unreachable speed of Mach 2, but was propelled by an astonishing kind of engine that burned fuel only during take-offs and landings. In the stratosphere it would not have used any fuel at all.

THE THIRD CATEGORY

More than twenty years have passed since the B.B.C. broadcast that communiqué thick with astounding promises and supported by Sir Ben Lockspeiser's most thoughtful declarations. But we have still officially to see the prodigious planes that the B.B.C. heralded back in 1946.

"Officially" is the operative word, because "practically" it is now twenty years that these aircraft have been appearing, disappearing, reappearing and disappearing again, generally in well-defined periods, astonishingly fast, almost everywhere, never overtaken, and never identified. They are the delight and desperation of ufologists and newspapers, who can search as much as they like to find anything that even remotely resembles the B.B.C. broadcast either in the American press of the time or among the "rumors" about secret Soviet production (almost always inflated beyond all belief) or that would justify equally well the mysterious apparitions of the following years.

Even within British aeronautical circles the news was received and commented on with a certain detached skepticism because of the phrase "flying without using fuel," which smacked too much of the Utopia of visionaries dedicated to discovering perpetual motion. There is no motive impulse without the expenditure of energy, they said, and to produce it something has to be consumed. All too true.

But when Sir Ben Lockspeiser, or someone speaking for him, stated that those planes would not have burned fuel, he did not implicitly rule out the use of a propellant easily found along the flight path, proportionately accelerated and expelled.

In fact, anyone who took the trouble to query those in the circle of the Ministry of Supply with the proper circumspection would have received an evasive but sufficiently explicit answer: namely, that the planes in question would have used "the inexhaustible natural energies present in the atmosphere at very high altitudes."

All right! Whether or not this explanation was true, the matter then became more credible. In the light of that long-ago revelation, the very long hovering of the intensely bright UFO that flew very slowly over the Spanish province of Albacete from 7:00 A.M. to 12:00 noon on June 26, 1953, also becomes credible. The object was at a superstratospheric altitude—between fifty and sixty miles up. Any other known type of jet-lift aircraft after at most a half-hour of continuous hovering in the favorably dense space of the lower atmosphere would have plummeted like a stone.

Detailed analysis of the B.B.C. broadcast brings out another very important fact. According to some experts, those mysterious aircraft had "already been tested," and it was probable that they would be flying over Great Britain "in the near future."

Once again blowing hot and cold: did that mean, then, that these craft not only existed but that they had passed the study stage in wind tunnels and by means of models and were already flying like real airplanes?

Where had they been prepared, since the Bedford center did not get under way, and then only partially, until 1950?

For a number of years the Royal Aeronautical Establishment of Farnborough had been in operation on British soil. This center had a number of high-altitude supersonic wind tunnels, developing wind speeds ranging from 970 to 3580 mph. These were small plants adapted immediately after the war from the old equipment for research on piston engines. This center had contributed in great measure to the beginning studies on questions concerning suction and porous bronzes.

Nevertheless, how can we reconcile the possibility that the aircraft in the third category were built in the British Isles with the fact that the new machines would soon "be flying over Great Britain"? Evidently the first test flights and the preparations for them were carried out elsewhere, after the hook had been closed on the German chapter and not yet opened on the British one.

Information obtained from Ministry of Supply circles at the time located the "elsewhere" a bit more precisely: "overseas." Even more confidential information was even more specific: "in the new Canadian factories."

A year later the flying saucers—the genuine New Aeronautics of the postwar period—took off on their prodigious flight from the remote western regions of the faithful Dominion, catching by complete surprise the forgetful public, the press, and even aeronautical experts who had been hardened by excessive skepticism. Barely a year later!

With time, people's memory of the original news leaks became so vague that it was possible to "produce" tiny macrocephalic Martians; delicate blond Venusians; the beautiful Aura Rahnes, the saucer pilot from the planet Clarion; the Uranians; the Ethereans; and the whole vast range of creatures that today are known throughout the world under the general appellation of "Our Brothers from Space," who bear messages of salvation for Humanity.

From Top Secret to farce.

NOTES

1. See M. J. Bamber, Wind Tunnel Tests on Airfoil Boundary Layer Control Using a Backward-Opening Slot (N.A.C.A., Report No. 385, Washington, 1931), p. 38. Working with a wing section having a "blown" top surface—arranged at varying incidences from minus 6° to plus 30° and with an artificial wind of 40 mph—at the incident of minus 6° Bamber obtained negative drag coefficients ($-C_r$ max. = -0.12) deriving from the interaction between the reduction of the profile drag and the thrust produced by the reaction of the air blowing through the slot on the top surface. Bamber concluded his report by pointing out that in order to make a functioning "jet-wing" (that is, of the type invented three years before by Katzmayr and lumping together into a single whole the lift and propulsive functions in place of the propeller), and in order to obtain thereby, thanks to the permanent development of negative C_r, horizontal flight and climb, it was necessary for the "negative drag" to exceed the sum of the passive drag of the wing and of the other parts of the plane (fuselage, controls, landing gear, and windshield). Even in this case the only solution worth trying would have been the adoption of an appropriate "flying-wing" formula.

2. It might be a good idea to recall that in 1947 Professor L. G. Whithead of the Royal Aeronautical Establishment declared decisively that the proposed move away from the common airfoil to suction airfoils would be perhaps a still greater change than that which led from the conformation of the slow biplane to that of the fast monoplane. Despite the interesting studies of Professor Busemann and of the Italian A. Ferri, aeronautical technology would never have been able to achieve what it did in supersonic speeds with the glorious old prewar biplane.

3. Apropos of this it should be noted that occasional observers have independently affirmed that if the back of the flying discs—when they are hovering in mid-air or maneuvering at very low altitudes—was struck by a glancing ray of sunlight it gave off a strange shimmering light. Ufologists delude themselves when they seek to explain the phenomenon by anti-gravity or, worse yet, anti-matter. It is the reflection in the sunlight of the convective movement generated by the energetic suction of the air layers next to the top surface of the aircraft. But the best proof of intense local air suction is offered to us by a little-known episode that occurred on October 20, 1954, when the UFOs seemed to spread over a good part of the inhabited world. Leaving his house very early in the morning in a distant suburb of Teheran, the Persian businessman Ghasim Faili saw a mysterious circular "thing" in an empty lot near his house giving off a reflection from the moonlight. When he approached the machine close enough to see that a human being was moving around inside it, "with a head like an elephant because of the strange headgear" (evidently a pilot equipped for breathing in the stratosphere), and placed his hand on the edge of the object, his curiosity soon gave way to fear. "Allah help me!" exclaimed the unfortunate witness, remarking that with a "sort of strong suction" the strange device seemed to pull him toward it (more than one careless mechanic has lost his life or been seriously injured when he went too close to the intake of a turbojet being ground tested). As Faili shouted for help, the disc hummed dully and an instant later took off vertically, giving off "a strong, hot blast."

4. The bibliography on the subject amounts to about fifty works. The following Aeronautical Research Council Reports and Memoranda are basic and of particular historical interest since they were the first chronologically: G. J. Taylor, The Aerodynamics of Porous Sheets (A.R.C., R.&M. No. 2237, London, H.M.S.O., 1944), p. 14; G. J. Taylor, Air Resistance of a Flat Plate of Very Porous Material (A.R.C., R.&M. No. 2236, London, H.M.S.O., 1944), p. 4; Simmons and Cowdrey, Measurements of the Aerodynamic Forces Acting on Porous Screen (A.R.C., R.&M. No. 2276, London, H.M.S.O., 1949), p. 20; J. H. Preston, The Boundary Layer Flow over a Permeable Surface through which Suction Is Applied (A.R.C., R.&M. No. 2244, London, H.M.S.O., 1946), p. 29; B. Thwaites, On the Flow Past a Flat Plate with Uniform Suction (A.R.C., R. & M. No. 2481, London, H.M.S.O., 1952), p. 11.

Other complementary works will be cited in successive notes.

7. Sinterizing is a metallurgical procedure that, starting from specially prepared metallic powders, makes it possible to manufacture economically pieces of relatively complicated shapes to close degrees of tolerance under cold, dry pressure. The pieces thus formed are then placed in controlled atmosphere ovens, where a temperature close to that of fusion reestablishes the molecular cohesion by restoring the mechanical characteristics of the original metal. In the prewar period, industrial production of sinterized parts had been practically developed along four basic lines:

1) sinterization of hard metals (tungsten, cobalt, molybdenum, vanadium, etc.) for the manufacture of machine tools and all those mechanisms that must operate at very high Rockwell numbers or that require a high degree of surface hardness.

2) sinterization of bronze or iron for the manufacture of parts with exceedingly complicated shapes that would be too costly to produce by machining. (This process follows the system of stamped plastics.)

3) porous sinterization of bronze, iron, and aluminum for the manufacture of bushings, guide shoes, thrust bearings, etc., that absorb appropriate lubricants and consequently possess the characteristic of self-lubrication for a long period of time.

4) sinterization of bronze—or, more rarely, of other metals—with a controlled porosity to serve as air, water, oil, and gasoline filters, or as filters for other fluids generally. (Around

1935 the Krupp locomotives were equipped with condensers with porous baffles. Four years later, at Farnborough, British technicians using the same type of material perfected the Dunlop T.K.S. deicing wing.)

In the postwar period the technology of sinterization developed three new productive systems:

5) sinterization of plasto-metallic materials in order to impregnate metals with plastic substances for lubricant seals or waterproof parts.

6) sinterization of cero-metallics, obtained by mixing metal and mineral powders (porcelain clay [kaolin], alumina, feldspar, etc.) in order to produce material with a slow specific weight and a high mechanical and thermal resistance. (For example, experimental vanes for turbine engines.)

7) sinterization of metals with the infiltration of a different metal or of metallic carbides, in which the parent metal (aluminum, iron, copper, steel, bronze, etc.), possesses intercrystalline inclusions of copper or aluminum or of vanadium or titanium carbides, or nickel-chromium alloy or cupronikel for the manufacture of matte-finished parts that are resistant to very high temperatures or are self-cooling. (In the United States the Thompson Products Corporation mass-produced until a short time ago vanes for aircraft turbines employing iron powder impregnated with molten copper in final molding.)

8) porous sinterization of special and ordinary steels for filtering and measuring very hot liquids.

As far as the specific subject of the UFOs is concerned, British production of light bronzes and aluminum is significant. They have been manufactured for some time with the “ground” metals at Coventry by Powderloys Ltd., according to exact technical specifications worked out by the huge Anglo-Canadian industrial complex Aluminium Ltd. and by the Fulmer Research Institute of Stoke Poges in Buckinghamshire. The latter was founded by Colonel Wallace Charles Devereux, who carried out important ministerial functions in the Ministry of Supply from 1941 to the end of the war.

Therefore, even the porous bronze briefly mentioned by Professor Relf was not, in an absolute sense, anything really new.

8. See Ernest F. Relf, "Recent Aerodynamic Developments," Journal of the Royal Aeronautical Society (London, May/June 1946), pp. 421–449.

9. Professor Ackeret succeeded in the intention, thanks to the proper distancing of the suction slots.

10. In fact, it was Doctor Roff, of the chemical laboratory attached to the Department for Scientific and Industrial Research, who suggested that Dr. Preston, of the aerodynamic laboratory, replace the fragile ceramic with a porous bronze (at first called sintered bronze, then Porous Phosphor Bronze, and finally, in happy simplification, porosint). A type with controlled porosity obtained by the techniques of powder metallurgy was chosen. The first experimental samples—sheets measuring six by twelve inches with thicknesses running from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of an inch and pores measuring from 2.5 to 100 microns in diameter—immediately proved to have a satisfactory distribution of porosity relative to the aims of the study. In addition, the original porosint could be easily welded or brazed. Unfortunately, it had the defects of being somewhat heavier than the ordinary sheets used for the skin and of having lower mechanical resistance. And this was not all. At the beginning of 1945, when Dr. Preston and his associates had finished the technical tests and went on to the wind-tunnel experiments, it was discovered that because of the tortuous construction of the air cells, this "labyrinthine structure" retained rain water, slowing down the anticipated rate of suction. Then small screens of phosphor bronze were woven with a density of 240 wires per square inch and then copper plated, but the results were disappointing because the process was so rudimentary. After the laboratory equipment had been improved and the intensity of the galvanic current increased, they first tried electroplating with granular cuprite and then tried nickel plating. In a later research stage they prepared porous grills of large dimensions and an effort was made to strengthen them by applying vitreous sheeting to the edges. Another partial disappointment: the wind-tunnel tests demonstrated that there were considerable local variations in the degree of permeability of the material. From the technological point of view, however, the system of the reticulated sheet with granular cupronickel plating fulfilled all hopes, the mechanical properties of the material proving to be nearly equal to those of a thin sheet of solid metal. Following this, other improvements were gradually adopted in the experimental cycle of production of porous materials. Reticulates running from 120 to 240 interstices per square inch in plated bronze produced by cold lamination and resulting in flat, smooth surfaces proved to be an unprecedented success. Using the same procedure, excellent sheets with "variable porosity along one side" were finally produced.

11. The typical request for maximum porosity remaining constant—parallel with the most advanced experiments on porosint—the experts of the National Physical Laboratory immediately investigated other materials that, with a similar degree of aerodynamic permeability, offered or gave promise of offering greater mechanical resistance. In the Aeronautical Research Council reports relative to the postwar experiments on airfoils, in fact, can be found vague references to possible substitute materials such as sheets of synthetic resin with asbestos (durestos), which, however, proved excessively hydroscopic; vinyl resins of the expansion (or spongy) type with a metal reticulate incorporated in the resinous mass; cerometallic sheets in which the metal was principally alumina; and bronze reticulate sheets used as a support for layers of nylon fabric or glass fabric similar to Fiberglas and Fiberfraz. In addition, there were even vaguer references to exceedingly light sinterized and plated products of aluminum and duralumin. It may perhaps astonish the reader that a weak metal-like aluminum was included among the metals to be used in a porous state, but sinterization gives metals special mechanical characteristics by raising their tensile strength and resistance to corrosion through a very wide range of temperature from –50°C. to 500° C.

12. The principal suppliers of the experimental materials were the Plansee Werke of Reute, in the Tyrol, and the Vereinigte

Leichmetall Werke of Linden, a suburb of the city of Hannover, which specialized in the field of powder metallurgy. Concerning the German sinterization industry, see R. A. Hetzig, Powder Metallurgy in Germany During the Period 1939–1945 (British Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee "Overall Report" No. 20, London, H.M.S.O., 1949), p. 27.

13. Two years later Thwaites himself, in collaboration with Prof. H. B. Irving, established in another internal report (No. 10,720, Research Summary of Boundary Layer Control Problems) all the developments that had been planned for the work that was carried out at the National Physical Laboratory in that sector as well.

14. At such altitudes the air is already sufficiently rarefied and its index of kinetic velocity so high that the minuscule superficial roughness of the Luftschwamm would not have had in practice any appreciable negative influence on the functioning of suction. Concerning the directives for the German research see H. Schlichting, The Boundary Layer of the Flat Plate Under Conditions of Suction and Air Injection (R.T.P. translation No. 1753 of the British Ministry of Aircraft Production, London, 1945; taken from Luftfahrtforschung, Bd. 19, Lfg. 5 to 9, October 20, 1942, pp. 293–301). Even today the current opinion among the best qualified air technologists is that a good airplane with sucked wings should not exceed 500 mph under penalty of losing its efficiency because compressibility drag comes into play. This consideration—quite valid, for it has been proved by a long series of wind-tunnel tests—naturally concerns airplanes of the conventional type, in which only the wings are subject to a limited reduction process according to the usual means of removing the "dead air" from the top surface depression.

15. His basic and most important work, Una teoria per il calcolo di profili alari aventi piccolo spessore, was published in a number of installments by the Aeronautical Research Council between May 1942 and March 1945 in internal Reports and Memoranda Nos. 5804–6156–6225 (with the collaboration of

E. J. Richards) and Nos. 8548–8549–8877 (with the collaboration of H. I. Preston).

16. According to his statement, in addition to airfoils as strictly understood, aerodynamic bodies with an extended laminar boundary layer were also studied and tested at the National Physical Laboratory. The Aeronautical Research Council's bibliography is silent on this matter save for the experiments with porous cylinders.

17. See Prof. Sidney Goldstein, "Low Drag and Suction Airfoils," Journal of the Aeronautical Sciences (New York, April 1948), pp. 189–214; and Prof. M. J. Lighthill, A New Method of Two-Dimensional Aerodynamic Design (Aeronautical Research Council Reports and Memoranda No. 2112, London, H.M.S.O., 1945), p. 53.

18. Here, in chronological order, is a necessarily superficial and summary review of the British research into cusped (or "humped") airfoils. The germ of the idea is to be found in the Goldstein theory (worked out between 1939 and 1942) of the computation of the characteristics of any sort of airfoil through the evaluation, point by point, of the distribution of speed along the airfoil. Later (1940–1941) Dr. A. A. Griffith, while studying a system to meet the separation of the boundary layer in a convergent diffuser, extended the results of his investigations on bowed airfoils and designed the first example of a "humped" airfoil characterized by an unevenness of speed at the tail section. A theoretical contribution by Sir Geoffrey Taylor (1943) made it possible for professors Richards (in 1944), Lighthill (in 1945), Glauert (in 1945), and Gregory (in 1946) to perfect the principle later on, thereby giving rise to other bowed airfoils variously thickened or shaped in the rear portion. These airfoils were subjected to a long period of wind-tunnel testing and proved to have exceedingly high lift coefficients but low efficiency, with often uncertain results because of disturbances caused by the defective functioning of the aspiration slots (acting at times like organ pipes), and therefore with a trailing edge movement of the boundary layer different from that anticipated in the case of the integrally laminar flow. The principal types of cusped airfoils show clearly the many solutions that were tried. Two types were designed by Dr. Griffith, one by Professor Richards, four by Professor Lighthill. One (called Glass II) is the work of Professor Glauert (his had a suction slot with an internal chamber or collector to move the dead air from the wing surface to the suction pump).

19. During his lecture on low-resistance suction airfoils at the Institute of Aeronautical Sciences in New York on December 17, 1947, Professor Goldstein said that the model of a complete airplane with a symmetrical airfoil having a pointed trailing edge and with a thickness of 16 percent had, among other types, been experimented on in the Royal Aeronautical Establishment’s wind tunnel. He gave no further details. He was referring, however, to the adaptation of new contours along the lines of the twin-jet Gloster Meteor fighter, holder of the world speed record. But this also led nowhere. (Cf. D. A. Clarke, Wind Tunnel Tests on a Griffith Meteor Model (Without Suction), (Aeronautical Research Council “Current Paper” No. 37, London, H.M.S.O., 1951), p. 9.

20. The Bat experimental glider was a one-third-scale model of the twin-jet Boomerang and was constructed in order to study the aerodynamic behavior of the new formula in actual flight. In flight trim the twin-jet weighed 33,000 pounds and was powered by two Rolls Royce Nene turbojets partially faired into the wing. The wings (with a span of ninety feet and a maximum chord of thirty-six feet) had a “laminar profile,” as the director of scientific research of the Ministry of Supply had expressly requested, and in addition boundary layer control was limited to the trailing edge of the wing tips, in order to improve the stability of the plane at low speeds. In 1944, when tests with the glider had brought to light the advantage of using such reduced suction, Rolls Royce prepared a special version (Mark III) of the Derwent turbojet, with 2300 pounds of static thrust, which was then shelved in favor of the more modern Nene. 23. The ramjet (statoreacteur, athodyd) is the simplest of the "exojets," or aeronautical jet power plants that make use of the air as a propulsive mass, scooping it up by forward motion. The ramjet has no primary rotating elements (compressor or turbine) and the air is compressed spontaneously through the effect of the special divergent conformation of the long forward air scoop (the diffuser). The fuel is injected where the conduit is largest and the flow has the lowest internal velocity and hence the maximum pressure. In the next cylindrical portion (the interheater) the mixture burns under constant pressure and the increase of temperature causes the burned air to expand through the short, converging tail tube (the propelling nozzle) with a speed greater than on entry, thus generating the reaction thrust. Unfortunately, for obvious reasons (i.e., the tube is open at both ends) the ramjet does not function when stationary but begins to give an appreciable thrust and to become efficient only at a speed of 1000 feet per second, and, equal to the speed reached, its thrust coefficient diminishes with the increasing rarefication of the air owing to the lessened velocity pressure in the cycle. For a long time it was held that it would have to be limited to supersonic speeds (not above 2500 mph), but for several years hypersonic ramjets (for speeds of 7500 mph) have been under study in America and they give promise of functioning regularly along the densest borders of the high stratosphere.

24. The curious, marked thickening of the wings and tail assembly was notable and in apparent contrast with the supersonic attributes given to the model. (This is explained by the fact that it was planned to use "elliptical" contours, which were not yet considered inefficient, on this project.) The wing recesses were to hold the large quantity of fuel that would be used by the plane, which would be propelled to a high altitude and the upper limit of subsonic speed by a pair of auxiliary external rockets. The idea never got beyond the static model and—supposing also that this has nothing to do with the M-52—perhaps it is this type of aircraft that is referred to in the Aeronautical Research Council's internal report No. 7481 (Research on a Model of Supersonic Aircraft), written by Dr. Warren in 1944 and still "not available."

WHO WAS VIKTOR SCHAUBERGER?

They called me deranged. The hope is that they are right. It is of no greater or lesser import for another foot to wander the earth. But if I am right and science is wrong - then may the Lord God have mercy on mankind.

Viktor Schauberger

"The destructive and dissolving form of movement is centrifugal in Nature—it forces the moving medium from the centre outwards towards the periphery in straight lines. The particles of the medium appear to be forced out from the entre. The medium is first weakened, then it dissolves and breaks up. Nature uses this action to disintegrate complexes which have lost their vivacity or have died. From the broken-down fragments, new co-ordinated forms, new identities can be created as a result of this concentrating form of movement. The centripetal, hyperbolic spiral movement is symptomatic of falling temperature, contraction, concentration. The centrifugal movement, on the other hand, is synonymous with rising temperature, heat, extension, expansion, explosion. In Nature, there is a continuous switch from one movement to the other; but if development is to occur, then the movement of growth must be predominant."

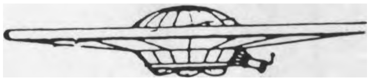
The ‘Schriever-Habermohl’ flying disc developed between 1943 and 1945. In 1944, climbing vertically, it reached a height of 12 km in 3.12 minutes and a horizontal flying speed of 2000 km/h.

VICTOR SCHAUBERGER’S FLYING SAUCERS

Victor Schauberger (1885–1958), an Austrian inventor who was involved with Hitler’s Third Reich, invented a number of “flying disks” for the Nazis between 1938 and 1945. Based on “liquid vortex propulsion” many of them, according to records, actually flew. One “flying saucer” reputedly destroyed at Leonstein, had a diameter of 1.5 meters, weighed 135 kilos, and was started by an electric motor of one twentieth horsepower. It had a trout turbine to supply the energy for lift-off. According to Schauberger, “If water or air is rotated into a twisting form of oscillation known as ‘colloidal’, a build up of energy results, which, with immense power, can cause levitation.” On one attempt the apparatus “rose upwards, trailing a blue-green, and then a silver colored glow.” The Russians blew up Schauberger’s apartment in Leonstein, after taking what remained that the American’s hadn’t taken first. Schauberger supposedly worked on a top secret project in Texas for the U.S. Government and died shortly afterward of ill health. On his deathbed, Schauberger repeated over and over, “They took everything from me. Everything. I don’t even own myself.”



The first test-model developed between 1941 and 1942. This had the same flight properties as that in fig. (a), but something was wrong with the controls.

VIKTOR SCHAUBERGER PROJECTS

Institute of Ecological Technology (IET), Stockholm, Sweden (Box 9, S-942000 Elvsbyn, Sweden), Institute of Ecological Techniques (DIFOT), Copenhagen, Denmark (Ellebuen 21, DK-2950 Vedbek, Denmark).

Two of the Scandinavian countries, Sweden and Denmark have formed development groups which are interested in the pioneering work of Viktor Schauberger and the prospects for reintroducing his advantageous environmental technology.

Towards the end of the 1950's, a Swedish science group was formed to carry out environmental improvement work and went through a series of evolutions to become the Institute for Ecological Technology, established in 1979. Since that time their environmental improvement project effort has been centered on the past, historical work of Viktor Schauberger because of the tangible value of his series of environmental projects. Schauberger has constantly maintained that all of our technology should be "going with the flow of nature" rather than attempting to force actions which are contrary to natural motions.

Because of the growing problems of water pollution in all the industrialized nations much of the current efforts are aimed at the various possible solutions to this problem, based on Viktor Schauberger's findings. In regard to clearing up polluted rivers, Viktor Schauberger maintained that by the simple addition of specially-shaped flutes carefully placed within the river bed, a beneficial spiralling flow would allow the rivers to clean themselves, naturally. Although he was usually rebuffed by the establishment in attempting to introduce this method, thankfully, his work is now being continued today by these far-sighted European ecological groups.

The development of the water-cleansing device mentioned in Proceedings from the First International Symposium on Non-conventional Energy Technology held in Toronto, 1981, page 91 and shown in an early state of development has successfully been brought to an end in the Danish Institute of Ecological Techniques. It shall be put into manufacture in spring 1987 and will cost appr. US $100. Especially tests with seed-growing in the purified, cleansed and vitalized water have given surprising results. The device was originally given the research group in the final form from a medium claiming that UFO-intelligences had inspired her!

b) Biotechnical Academy - Walter Schauberger (Son of Viktor) Austria

The Biotechnical Academy was established, with direction by Walter Schauberger, with the purpose of furthering the pioneering work of Viktor Schauberger in both the theoretical and applied areas of the technology.

The scientific team, under Walter Schauberger's direction, are working to match hardware environmental models with the corresponding attributes and motions of nature. They are attempting to validate each and every one of Viktor Schauberger's ecological findings and models to prove that our present technology direction is basically wrong!

c) Energy Unlimited Albuquerque, New Mexico

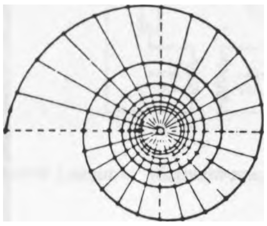
Walter P. Baumgartner, the director of Energy Unlimited is an advocate of Viktor Schauberger's technology and a believer in both natural vortex motion and implosion techniques. Energy Unlimited is now involved in developing an implosion motor to show the natural principle of vortex motion as a key to motion, propulsion and power.

Designing, developing and testing are in progress at the present by an E.U. research team.

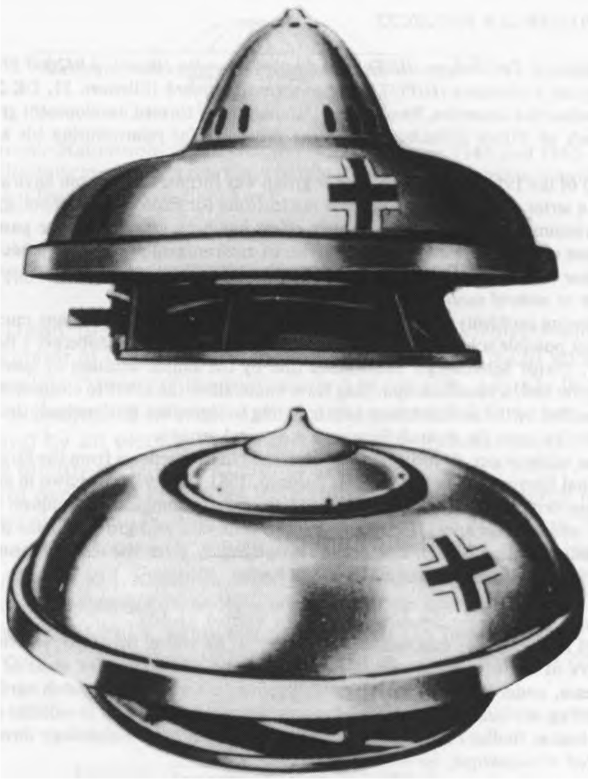
In the case of the Implosion Motor there is no heat barrier, no sound barrier, because with friction at a minimum, no heat is generated. On the contrary, due to the spiral contraction of the water flow, there is cooling and this creates a vacuum which increases the suction pull.

Schauberger's models of 'flying saucers'.

A hyperbolic spiral with constantly changing curvature.



A hyperbolic spiral is non-Euclidian in that it is formed of a continuous changing curve, in which the curvature becomes increasingly acute. It is an 'open' system rather than a closed system like a circle, which begins and ends at the same point, and which is therefore identically repetitious. Although existing technical terminology is at present inadequate, I believe the term 'hyperbolic centripetal spiral motion' is more appropriate in this context. A hyperbolic spiral looks like this:



These are the famous smokeless, soundless, Schauberger Models.

SOLID STATE - AMPLIFYING TRANSFORMERS

HANS COLER - CURRENT FLOW DEVICE & MAGNET CURRENT FLOW APPARATUS

Hans Coler, a German energy researcher from the period from 1936 to 1945 evolved several promising solid state electrical energy sources using permanent magnets, various shaped coils, copper plates and condensers (capacitors).

Two significant devices were produced from this war-time research, the first being the "Stromerzeuer," or Current Flow Device, which consisted of a central transformer comprised of two flat coils, with the ends of the secondary fiat coil connected in series with the South poles of two permanent magnets. The North poles of the two permanent magnets are linearly connected to two flat copper plates.

The output leads were connected to the ends of the copper plates, all in accordance with the accompanying diagram.

The input to the primary fiat coil was at the wattage level provided by a standard dry cell battery, presumed to be the 1½ volt size. It was claimed that when the battery energized the primary circuit, a separation of charge takes place, influenced by the two magnet polarities, within the linear circuitry. When the battery source was switched off, a reversing current is supposed to flow, in the secondary circuit, but the magnets are not supposed to influence a polarization effect on this reversing.

Several size versions of the "Stromerzeuger" were built, one small ten watt unit, a larger seventy (70) watt unit and finally a large unit built in 1937 reportedly produced 6 KW output.

Left: blueprints for a flying saucer. According to the obscure single-issue publication Brisant, in which these diagrams appeared in 1978, they are plans for a disc-shaped spaceship, modified by the West German government to make them 'safe' for publication. Although 'electromagnetic turbines', 'laser-radar' and computers are indicated, the design is not a practical one. The diagrams appear in an article on Rudolf Schriever's Second World War designs, and may have been inspired by them

The famed "Lubbock Lights" sightings began on the night of August 25, 1951 when an Atomic Energy executive and his wife sat in their yard in Lubbock, Texas enjoying the summer air. Suddenly they saw what appeared to be a huge, noiseless, fuselageless "flying wing" with bluish lights pass over their home. When Captain Ruppelt received this report, he also got another one from Lubbock which caused him to exclaim: "This was by far the best combination of UFO reports I'd ever read. . . . Why? Because the second report came from four distinguished Texas scientists who happened to be taking the night air in their yard the same evening. They watched while a formation of about three dozen bluish lights swept twice across the skies. In the next few days, hundreds of people in the area witnessed similar lights. They seemed always to fly in roughly semicircular echelons from north to south. On August 31, Carl Hart, Jr. took the photos above. After photo analysis, Ruppelt said: "The photos were never proven to be a hoax but neither were they proven to be genuine," adding that he doubted they were reflections from birds. Yet Blue Book files still lists the Lubbock Lights as "birds." In Dr. Hynek's UFO classification system, these are classic examples of "nocturnal lights"—not ordinary lights such as man-made ones, bright stars and planets, or those of aircraft, but lights of a truly baffling nature which do not behave like ones from known sources.

GERMAN JET GENESIS DAVID MASTERS

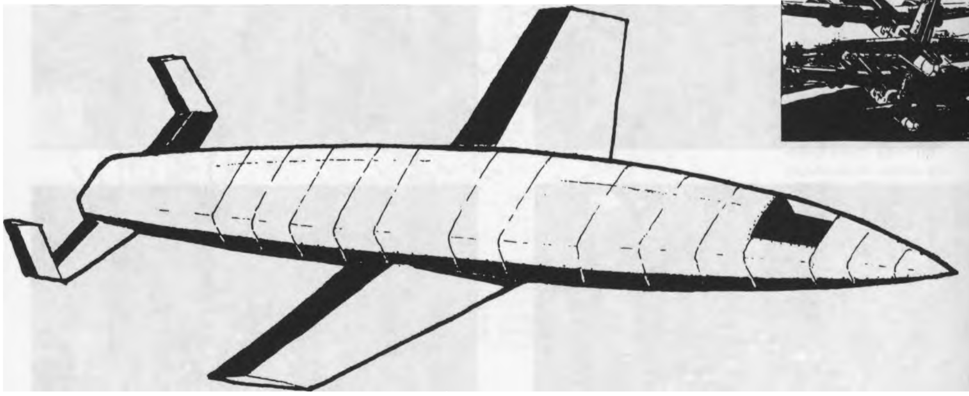
Sänger-Bredt stratospheric bomber



In 1933, at the age of only 28 years, Dr Eugene Sänger published his book Rocket Flight Technique, which led eventually to his being invited to set up the German Research Institute for Rocket Flight Technique in 1936. By 1938 Sänger had worked out most of the details of a supersonic glider and had started to build a 1/20th-scale model. But with the start of hostilities in 1939 Sänger was pressured into deciding either to shelve his project or adapt it for military use. The result was a revolutionary design for a single-seat bomber with a fuselage of flat-sided rectangular section and measuring 91ft 10¾in long, 11ft 9¾in wide and 6ft 11in deep (28m × 3.60m × 2.10m).

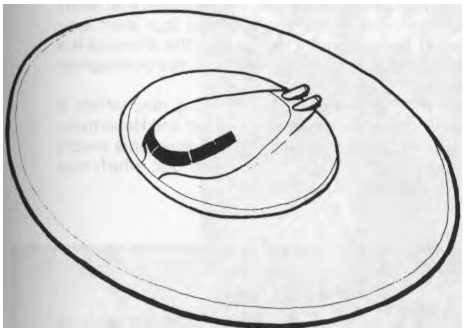
It was designed for stratospheric flight, with the pilot housed in a forward pressurised cabin. The pointed fuselage opened out in section towards the blunt tail, from which protruded the primary rocket nozzle flanked by a pair of auxiliary rockets. The flattened fuselage created body lift which was supplemented by a pair of comparatively small 49ft 2½in (15.0m) span wings set halfway along the fuselage and blending into the totally flat underfuselage. The horizontal tail surfaces carried small endplate fins.

Although a retractable undercarriage was envisaged, the aircraft was to take off from a streamlined rocket-powered sled set on a monorail track 1.8 miles (3km) in length. The sled was to be powered by an enormously powerful rocket developing 600 tonnes thrust for a maximum of just 11 sec. After accelerating along the track the aircraft would climb to over 5,000ft (1,200m) at an angle of 30°, reaching a speed of nearly 1,150mph (1,850km/hr). At that point the aircraft's main powerplant of a single fuselage-mounted 100-tonne-thrust rocket motor would be fired for a maximum of 8min to propel it to a height of over 90 miles (145km) and a speed of 13,730mph (22,100km/hr). Once the main rocket motor had burned out the aircraft would coast at high speed back down to the denser atmosphere at 25 miles (40km, 131,230ft) altitude and then skip back up like a flat stone on water. This manoeuvre would be repeated until momentum had been lost, and the aircraft would then glide down to a normal wheeled landing, having covered a predicted range of up to 14,600 miles (23,500km). The problems of super-heating likely to be encountered at such speeds were expected to be reduced by this method, with the aircraft cooling down on the upward coast after reaching peak temperatures at the lower end of the "skip".

By June 1939 Sänger had advanced his designs to the point of carrying out friction tests, but many of the problems of ultra-high speeds, especially as they affected metal structures, were not adequately understood. Sänger was also working on the 100-tonne-thrust rocket motor, which progressed slowly up to 1941 and achieved some remarkable results, exceeding many of the A-4 (V-2) rocket performances at that time.

But then in 1942 work on the rocket motor was cancelled and Sänger, his assistant, Dr Irene Bredt, and his team were set to work at DFS, the German Research Institute for Gliding. No further development of the stratospheric bomber was requested, although Sänger did manage to publish a secret paper in 1944, writing of the possibility of using it to bomb New York using a single free-falling bomb which was to be carried between the two large mid-fuselage oxidant tanks.

Project Saucer



Miethe flying disc

Serious German interest in disc-shaped aircraft seems to have originated from about the spring of 1941, when Rudolf Schriever, a Luftwaffe aeronautical engineer, designed his first “Flying Top”, the prototype of which was being test-flown in June 1942. Schriever followed these experiments – carried out in collaboration with three colleagues, Habermohl, Miethe and Bellonzo – by constructing an even larger flying disc in the summer of 1944. It is not clear how these early designs were to be powered, but a bigger version with advanced jet engines was reportedly designed at the BMW factory near Prague.

Information on this aspect of German jet aircraft development is very sketchy. The project was always highly secret, and documents that may have existed were probably either destroyed, lost or taken by the Russians when the war ended. A last possibility is that the Allies discovered Schriever’s work and considered it too important to reveal. However, in the late 1950s Rudolf Schriever himself described his work on a wartime research programme named “Project Saucer”.

The Schriever and Habermohl design comprised a large-area disc rotating around a central cupola-like cockpit. The disc was made up of adjustable wing surfaces which could be positioned for take-off or level flight. Dr Miethe also developed a 138ft (42m) diameter flying disc powered by vectorable jets. This machine is said in many references actually to have flown, and one source even pinpoints the date of the first flight as February 4, 1945, and the place as Prague. On that flight the machine, designated V-7, is supposed to have climbed to a height of 37,600ft (11,450m) in just three minutes, reaching a level speed of 1,218mph (1,960km/hr). But Schriever claimed after the war that while his flying disc was made ready for testing early in 1945, the preparations were cancelled in the face of the Allied advance, and the machine was destroyed and all information lost or stolen. The factory at Breslau at which Schriever’s saucer is said to have been built fell into Russian hands, and the prototype and the technicians working on it are believed to have been captured and taken to Siberia to continue the project under Soviet control. Also rumoured was another near-complete flying disc which was expected to be capable of reaching 3,000mph (4,830km/hr).

Although the evidence for the existence of a German flying-disc programme is very tenuous, the senior official of a 1945 British technical mission revealed that he had discovered German plans for “entirely new and deadly developments in air warfare”. These plans must obviously have gone beyond normal jet aircraft designs, as both sides already had jet-powered aircraft in production and operational service by the end of the war. Moreover, before Rudolf Schriever died some 15 years after the war he had become convinced that the large numbers of post-war UFO sightings were evidence that his designs had been built and developed.

The drawings on page 135 show three flying-disc designs attributed to the Schriever group. The first is credited to Dr Miethe and was supposed to have been almost ready for "operational" use when the factory in Prague was captured by the Red Army. A modern set of very basic three-view drawings shows twin cockpits above and below the centre of the disc, each with two jetpipes. The second illustration shows a flying disc, the details of which were revealed in a set of blueprints published in recent years by the West German Government. It has been suggested that the drawings were probably inspired by Rudolf Schriever's own wartime designs but had been made safe for publication by the modification of certain details. The deep disc was nearly 50ft (15m) in diameter and stood on four short legs. Amongst the equipment indicated in the drawings is a laser system, radar, computers and electro-magnetic turbines.

The third drawing depicts a flying disc which is credited in one reference to Schriever and Habermohl, though the claimed details and achievements exactly match those of the Miethe-designed disc which supposedly flew on February 4, 1945.

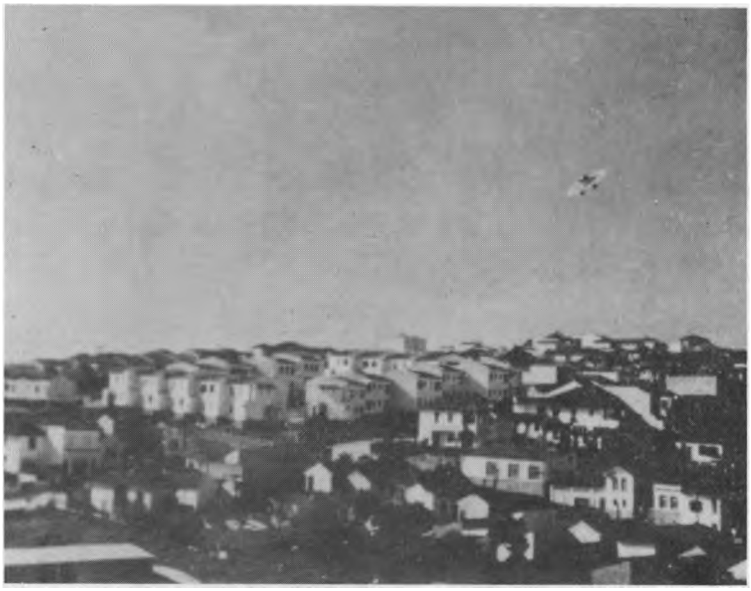
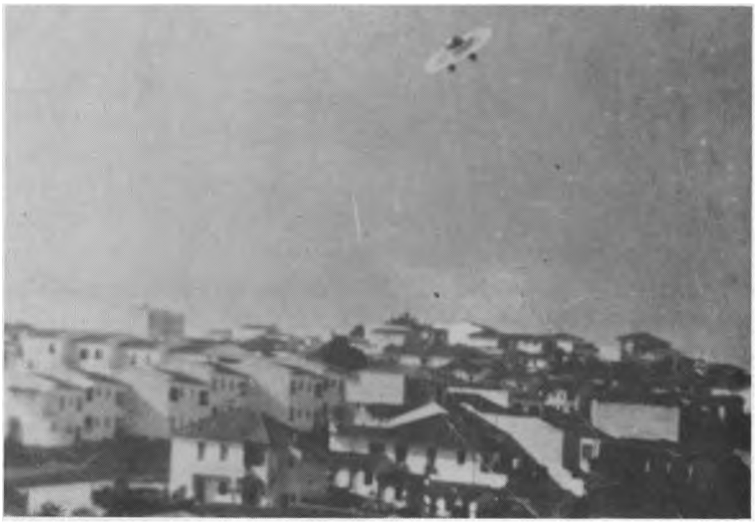
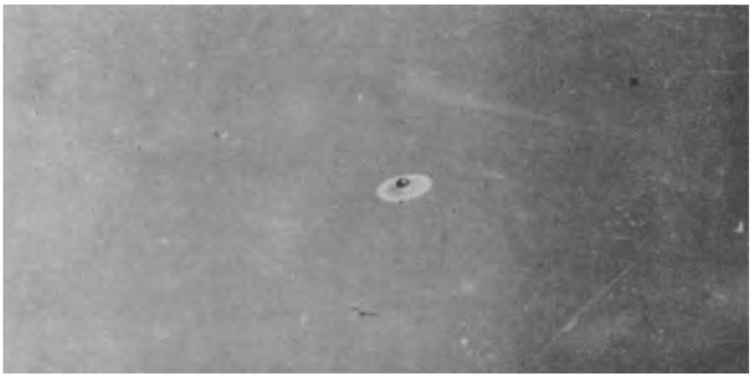
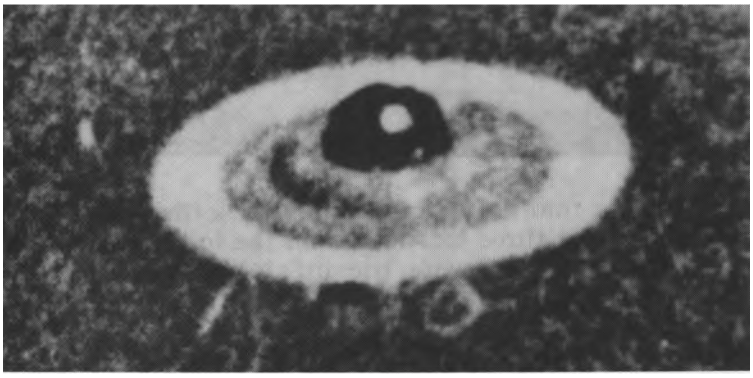
On October 20, 1957, (4:00 PM) Tom O'Bannon took this photo of a small craft hovering behind his house 30 miles east of Winona, Missouri.

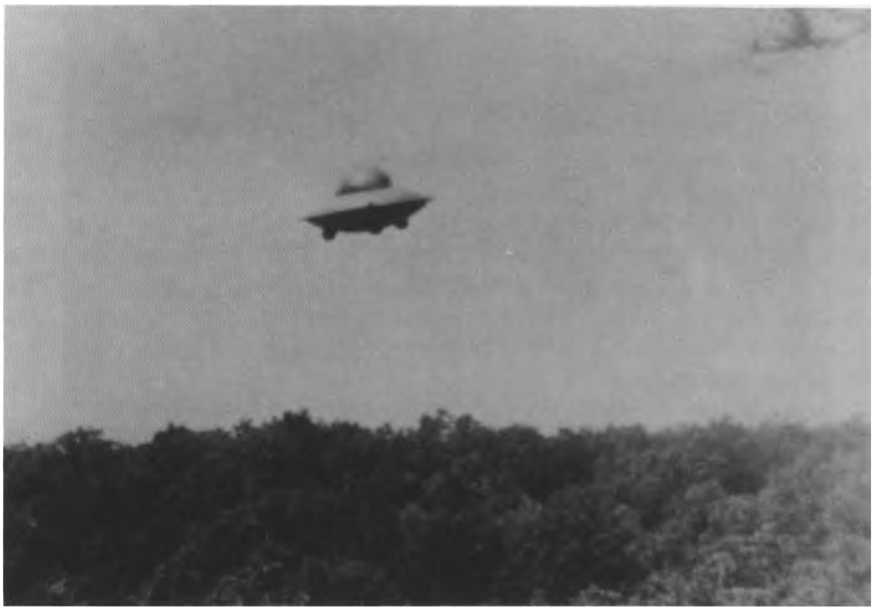


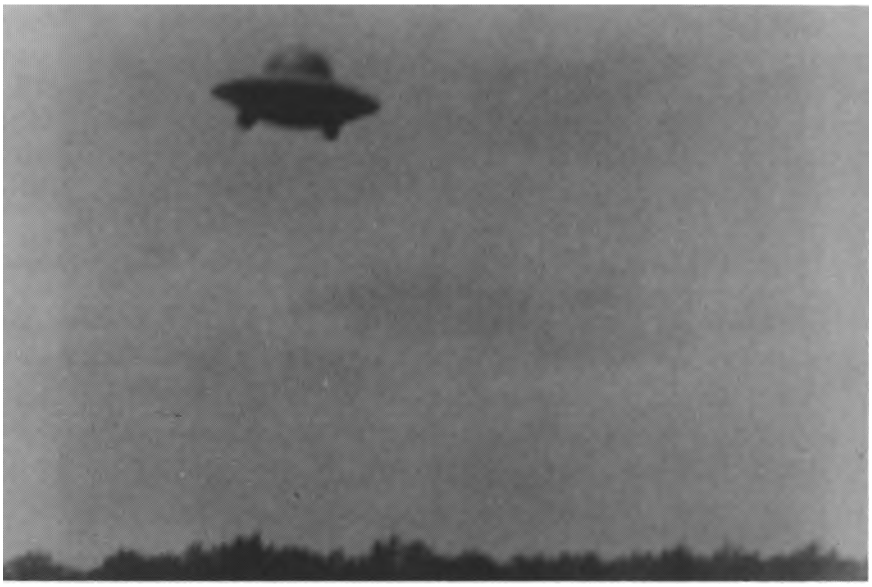
This sequence of five photos was taken in South Africa in the early 1950's and is sometimes referred to as the "South African series." These astonishingly clear photos of what is a domed flying disc flying over a town clearly show the rubber inflatable landing cushions. Most probably of German manufacture of the Haunibu I & II series. The New Schwabenland territory in the Antarctic is just opposite of South Africa.











On June 16, 1967 at mid-day, Harold Trudel took these photos at Woonsocket Rhode Island. Note the three extrusions on the lower side which in the early German experimental craft were the inflatable rubber landing cushions, which is exactly what these look like.

Nothing to Give in Exchange

In March 1946, while describing to the House of Commons the "great future" in view for the British aircraft industry thanks to new projects that were in gestation, Wing Commander John Strachey, Undersecretary in the Air Ministry, declared that the government was also considering "several pilotless aircraft possibilities" that were particularly promising and reassuring for Britain's defense.

At that time the British had only two missiles, neither of which seemed to justify the undersecretary's expressions of faith.

The first was the Fairey Stooge radio-controlled antiaircraft rocket, only a few of which had been built.[1] And it was, in fact, a rocket and not a plane. As for the other, the Vickers rocket that was still on paper, Sir Ben Lockspeiser himself had clearly stated that it was not a weapon but a flying laboratory. Transforming it into a flying bomb would in any case have taken time, and it seems that despite the quite different view held by Vickers it did not even figure in the plans of the Ministry of Supply once it was demonstrated that the German Henschel flying bombs had a limited success, for they were all subject to British radio jamming.

The prevalent opinion in London press circles was that the R.A.F. had secretly developed a "new weapon" that had been found virtually completed in one of the many underground factories in southern Germany.

Strachey's declaration gave strong support to the undoubtedly praiseworthy (if sincere) desire of the higher-ups in the Ministry of Supply to avoid, as they constantly proclaimed, risking anyone's life. Theoretically, this desire lasted until 1949, when the problems of supersonic aerodynamics had been sufficiently clarified (and besides, the Americans and the Russians were developing supersonic planes for military use) for the Supply Ministry to give a go-ahead on the first two British experimental piloted fighters capable of reaching the speed of Mach 2. These were the Fairey Delta-2 and the English Electric P-1-A.

The dropping of the Miles M-52 project had, in fact, been justified on the grounds that "we have not the heart to ask pilots to fly the high-speed models, so we shall make them radio controlled" (Sir Ben Lockspeiser's exact words).

The respect of the British for individual safety is well known, but despite that the pious expressions of the Ministry must have been very relative, what with conventional planes' continually approaching closer and closer to the "sound barrier" (which could be placed in the neighborhood of 745 mph) and trying to penetrate into the then still largely unexplored field of supersonic speeds, sometimes with fatal results. In fact, the echoes of ministerial regret for the death of Geoffrey De Havilland had hardly died down. De Havilland had been killed when the prototype of the tailless De Havilland DH-108 Swallow which he was testing over Suffolk exploded in the air. And the aim of that ambitious flight was indeed the breaking of the sound barrier. The undertaking was a private one, but the Ministry of Supply had been informed about it and the Ministry neither prevented it nor threw any obstacles in its path. (Here is a disturbing but pointed question: if the flight had succeeded, how could the torpedoing of the M-52 have been justified?)

The second part of the declaration seemed, as a result, more consonant with the actual state of affairs—i.e., the part dealing with the study of new systems of supersonic flight—especially when compared with what was stated apropos of the research program that would be continued at Bedford.

In general, it is still widely believed today that the "spectacular radio-controlled aircraft" that Sir Ben Lockspeiser announced at the time was the Vickers 24/43 winged rocket. It is clear, however, that that device was not in fact radio-controlled in the true sense of the term, but made use of short-wave radio solely for simple corrections of the flight path and for transmitting flight data to the ground.

Instead, rather numerous formations of circular-shaped objects of only fifteen or twenty feet were more than once observed flying over American states along the Canadian border in July 1947. Considering the rather small dimensions of those machines (as compared with those sighted later), wouldn't one logically conclude that they were radio-controlled from some guide-aircraft flying some distance off or at higher altitudes?

Two years before, the British had got their hands on a "device that could be controlled at considerable distance by another aircraft" while they were digging among the technological secrets that had been moved into the Alpine Redoubt. This device had a television apparatus, developed by Telefunken in their large factory at Bad Liebenstein, that worked to perfection. The British never made clear exactly what kind of device was involved, stating only that it was a "remotely controlled pilotless aircraft;" hence we must assume that it was something quite different from the many types of rockets which had been described in the press with a profusion of details.

In addition, a number of examples of television apparatuses built for the Henschel HS-293-D flying bombs fell into British hands. One of these was later exhibited at the German Electrical-Apparatus Exhibition at Earl's Court in London in March 1946. The others were sent to various centers concerned with military applications of television, the Telecommunication Research Establishment and the Royal Radar Establishment at Great Malvern being the most important such centers. Here world-famous physicists specializing in the properties of electricity, such as Sir Watson-Watt and Sir Henry Tizzard, delved into their innermost mechanisms in order to adapt them to the needs of British research.

QUESTIONS WITHOUT ANSWERS

That there was a close relationship between the "pilotless aircraft" of Undersecretary Strachey and the "planes that use no fuel" of the Ministry of Supply can be deduced from previously published news stories in the British press, which had been informed—perhaps secretly—by the same highly placed sources interested in adding a bit of luster to the nation's aeronautical prestige. One of these stories, which had appeared in January 1946, said briefly:

"Apropos of radio-controlled airplanes, we learn that high-speed experiments have been made with planes piloted by radio and equipped with television transmitters. As is well-known, it sometimes happens that an airplane that has begun a maneuver at speeds above 560 mph no longer answers to the controls—which often means the loss of a pilot. With the above-mentioned planes, however, experiments can be carried out without this danger."

We know that the first Vickers rockets flew in November 1947. The devices reported in the news story, however, had already begun their operational phase at the end of 1945. Unlike the Vickers rockets, they had a television apparatus aboard. They were, then, "pilotable" in the full sense of the word. What did they look like? Where did the experiments take place? What were the results of those experiments? What kind of propulsive method did they employ? Who built them?

Why was their testing kept secret? Why were there no detailed press releases? And why were there no further leaks about it? Here we have a series of questions that remained without answers, mute but eloquent evidence of the extreme importance of those experiments.

It should not astonish us, however. The chronicle of British aviation over the past twenty years has a number of "mysteries" of the same caliber. For example, in March 1952—just before the "Big Flap" that shook the circles around the A.T.I.C. and the U.S. Air Force—Her Majesty's Stationery Office printed Report No. 2612 for the Aeronautical Research Council. It was taken from confidential internal report No. 10294 and was clearly and thoroughly censored. In the report, Professor Thwaites of the National Physical Laboratory briefly illustrated the results of several of his physical-mathematical investigations on elliptical airfoils capable of developing a high degree of lift independent of the incidence of the entire wing structure. The subject was interesting, but it was nothing new.[2] What was new was the sibylline reference to bizarre suction airfoils called constant-velocity airfoils, one with an elegant two-pointed meniscus shape and the other with a curious if not monstrous-looking mushroom shape.[3]

The report mentioned them incidentally, saying only that unlike the elliptical airfoils, the lift developed by the constant velocity types "is not independent of the incidence and the possibility of applying them to airplanes can be considered only after the limits of their stability are exactly determined. It is possible that these profiles are unstable at zero incidence and it is certainly difficult to imagine what the behavior of the aerodynamic flow for the other incidences would be. In addition, the fact that they can operate at a unit value of the coefficient of lift might require a special flight technique and a particular type of plane." Unfortunately, the board of directors of the Aeronautical Research Council classified the information on these two last points, which were the kernel of the whole question.

Nevertheless, the technical press in 1947 published a concise description of a number of daring British innovations concerning wing structure and high-speed flight. At one point it wrote:

“Concern with obtaining absolute stability in all cases in accordance with the principle that it is an intrinsic quality of the aircraft, not to be acquired at the cost of some static or aerodynamic balance, has led to the development of a new wing formula called the Boomerang both because of its shape and its behavior. A project for a commercial plane called the Spuffing Boomerang Airliner with an independent, gyroscopic cabin has begun.”[4]

PLANES WITH GYROSCOPIC STABILIZATION

Perhaps completely accidentally, the press had erroneously combined and blended two different bits of news from the same source—the Hawker Siddeley Group—but referring to two different aircraft projects.

The first, the AW-52 Boomerang flying wing—with its wing tips perceptibly swept back and reminding one of the weapon of the Australian aborigines—carried two powerful turbojets, whence the name Spuffing Airliner. But the pilot’s cabin was completely normal.[5]

The other should have caused the most die-hard skeptics in the Air Technical Intelligence Centre to ask themselves (at least in 1952) this basic question: Over five years have passed since these leaks were published in the papers. Which of Britain’s numerous aircraft that have flown from then to now has an independent, gyroscopically stabilized cabin?

None, officially; and that even includes types now in the project stage, would have been the inevitable answer.

The ingenious solution—which escaped the technological doubts that Professor Thwaites had voiced years before and was absolutely new in the field of aircraft construction—allowed it to be clearly understood that the cabin was ringed with a rotating organ of large dimensions (as in the Italo-German turbo-projectiles and the Fireballs), involving the need for autonomous and automatic stabilization. This was required in order to offset, among other things, the motion of tangential pull on the craft (the fixed plane) by the propulsive rotor (the turbine). On the flying saucers this rotor rapidly rotates within the not at all metaphoric saucer, or inverted funnel, which surrounds the central cupola and which obviously must be kept stationary in the direction of flight. (Otherwise the continual rotation on its own axis would not only upset the flight path but would put the nervous systems of the poor pilots to a severe test.)

In 1945 the National Physical Laboratory's division of applied physics had reexamined a system of direct gyroscopic stabilization. It was modeled on the same system that at the beginning of the century had made the "miracle" of the Monorail train possible (a curious vehicle that has never come into widespread use; it was kept balanced on a single rail thanks to the gyrostatic inertia developed by a small but heavy and rapidly spinning flywheel). In addition, the laboratory put to profitable use in its own studies the experience accumulated by the scientists of the Kreiselgeräte G.m.b.H. of Berlin Britz, a dissolved company that had specialized in the study and construction of mechanisms employing gyroscopic phenomena. In 1943 the Kreiselgeräte had succeeded in reducing the oscillations of a violently disturbed moving body to not more than one-tenth of a degree.

During the next decade—it is an established fact and one that has not been demonstrated elsewhere to the same degree—the British made considerable use of the gyroscopic apparatuses for the most diverse military and technical applications.[6]

Evidently the officers in the A.T.I.C. did not know or did not want to draw the conclusions that one recurrent phrase in the sighting reports would have broadly supported: " . . seen from below the UFO seemed to spin rapidly on its own axis, except for the central part, which appeared to be stationary. . ."

THE GREAT AIR TECHNOLOGY "MIGRATION" OF 1946

Among the fragmentary news stories that reported the transfer by the Canadian government of the Turbo-Research Ltd. plants to the Hawker Siddeley Group there were several that referred to the imminence of other radical changes in the local aircraft industry, which because of war production needs had grown quite large, especially in the eastern part of the country, over the preceding five years.

Plans were laid for a sort of gigantic "migration" to the western area of the Dominion, with the formation of research, testing and production centers—centering on the urban area of Vancouver—for new types of planes and engines that would be "Canadian designed and Canadian built" and for the local production of "special fuels." The whole thing was to be accomplished in record time.

The greatest impulse toward this development, which was rapidly brought to a conclusion, came in the spring of 1946, when Professor B. S. Shenstone—described by the technical journals as a "Canadian scientist with a brilliant scientific background" and an expert in, among other things, problems dealing with the control of the boundary layer—was named general manager and technical assistant to vice-president W. N. Deisher of Avro-Canada. Previously he had been an assistant director in the Ministry of Aircraft Production's office in charge of the development of projects relating to postwar air transport.[7]

But we had an authoritative indication of what was developing in Canada in the fall of 1945, when a brilliant aeronautical future was openly being predicted in England for its overseas dominion. For example, The Aeroplane wrote: "The recent purchase [July 1] of the Victory Aircraft, Ltd., plant at Malton, Ontario, which is at present engaged in the production of the Lincoln bomber, by the Hawker-Siddeley Co., might mean that Canada will become the British Empire's aircraft production centre within the next ten years."[8]

At the beginning of 1946 the British group also took over the plants of Turbo-Research of Leavside and put them under the administration of its Gas Turbine Division in Malton. Turbo-Research was a government body created in 1944 on the model of the British Power Jets for the study of local problems of jet propulsion. It had an experimental station in Winnipeg.

Foreign aeronautical circles were considerably surprised by all this activity. True, the aeronautical industry was in a state of economic crisis. But the crisis certainly could not be overcome by selling a factory that promised to be highly productive and an experimental center that still had something new to contribute to jet propulsion, which, it should not be forgotten, was then taking its first steps.

It was thought that if the Canadian government had decided that it was a good idea to get rid of the factory and experimental center, perhaps that meant that Canada intended to concentrate its money and energies in some other direction.

When the UFOs appeared over Canada, the country's first crisis in the aviation industry had been laboriously overcome.

THE BASIS FOR SUCCESS

"Today Canada is to be counted among the greatest aeronautical powers in the world," N. S. Currey wrote in 1950. "But this abrupt leap forward from insignificant beginnings must not be attributed solely to its production of certain excellent types of planes but rather to the far-sightedness of the Canadian parliament. Canada has made its mark in a spectacular manner above all in the field of jet propulsion."[9]

The idea that Canada is an advanced and highly qualified producer of really excellent, modern jet planes of both military and civilian types will appear new and strange to the reader unfamiliar with aeronautical matters. In general the public thinks of Canada as an endless, cold, inhospitable land, rich in lumber, fish and fur-bearing animals, recently opened to large-scale immigration from Europe in order to exploit its immense natural resources. In other words, many Europeans still think of Canada as "a few acres of snow," as Voltaire put it long ago. "A few acres"! Nearly four million square miles containing gold, iron, copper, lead, nickel, aluminum, asbestos, and uranium, and producing large quantities of wheat, meat, fish, furs, and lumber. But the French administrators of the eighteenth century could not know all that, and after a series of military reverses they abandoned Canada to the British in 1763.

Actually, even the present twenty million population, for the most part inhabiting the two coastal areas, on a land almost the size of a continent (it is nine-tenths the size of Europe) comprises a decidedly modest human nucleus when compared with the tens of millions who live in countries with a long aeronautical tradition, such as England, Italy, France, and Germany.

Describing Canada as "the Promised Land of Aviation," the British aeronautical writer J. H. Stevens noted in 1952 that "the principal aircraft companies (A. V. Roe, Canadair, De Havilland) that build aircraft of their own design number two in Toronto and one in Montreal. Other minor specialist firms that contribute to making those places the centres of national aeronautical production are located in both of these cities and in their surrounding areas. The British Fairey Aviation Company has a well-known factory near Halifax in Nova Scotia. Other islands of air technology are on the Niagara peninsula, in Fort William, Winnipeg and Vancouver. The largest builder is, however, A. V. Roe Canada, Ltd., or Avro-Canada, which derives from the 'shade workshop' of Victory Aircraft Ltd. and is a branch of the British Hawker Siddeley Group. Nevertheless, it has an independent board of directors, like the other divisions, over which Sir Frank Spriggs and Sir Roy Dobson exercise only a general policy control. Other industries cover the whole field of accessories, instruments and aircraft materials. Hundreds of firms produce various parts according to the designs and standards of aircraft construction. Finally, Canada produces steel and light alloys for all its own needs making use of its vast mineral deposits. There is also a 'pilot plant' for the production of titanium. Canada possesses complete scientific and experimental equipment in the National Research Council of Ottawa. Wind tunnels, laboratories that are equipped to examine materials and construct models make it possible to carry out any kind of experiment. Another sign of Canada's determination not to remain behind in aeronautical progress is the fact that there are two electronic computers in Toronto: one at Avro-Canada and the other at the university, which also has a hypersonic wind tunnel in Downsview. During the winter, industrial production remains unaffected, for the factories are all well-heated. Even the hangars are kept at a temperature of 70 avoiding drafts in a way that seems miraculous. The working conditions, for example, are better than those in the average British factory, and it is common practice to work in shirtsleeves during the winter, both in the offices and in the shops. The cold, however, makes it necessary that all the planes be kept under roof."[10]

AVRO SAUCERS FOR THE FAR NORTH?

At the beginning of 1953, when no one was thinking about flying discs, they suddenly began to appear in the columns of Canadian newspapers.

On February 11, the Toronto Star announced in a banner headline that flying saucers should no longer be confined to the realm of fantasy, because they were actually being developed in one of Avro-Canada's hangars at the Malton airfield. Two columns of details and the news that the device was supposed to have a top speed of 1500 mph gave the clear impression that the writer had obtained his information from a very well-informed, if not completely candid, source that obviously worked somewhere in the powerful company.

Certain government experts who were immediately interviewed by reporters from the nearby capital sought to extricate themselves from the awkward situation by evasively declaring: "The Defense authorities are examining all ideas, even revolutionary ones, that have been suggested for the development of new types of supersonic aircraft, also including flying discs. This, however, is still in the beginning phase of research and it will be a number of months before we are able to reach anything positive and seven or more years before we come to actual production."

According to the Star, on February 16 C. D. Howe, minister of defense production, told the House of Commons that "the government was constantly studying 'new concepts and new designs' for fighters . . . adding weight to reports that Avro is even now working on a mock-up model of a 'flying saucer' capable of flying 1500 miles per hour and climbing straight up in the air."

On February 27 the company involved also joined the chorus of "surprising" revelations. The president of the firm, Crawford Gordon, Jr., wrote in its house organ: "Like all aircraft companies who want to stay in business, we are directing a substantial part of our efforts towards new ideas and advanced designs.

"One of our projects can be said to be quite revolutionary in concept and appearance. The prototype being built is so revolutionary that when it flies all other types of supersonic aircraft will become obsolescent. This is all that Avro-Canada are going to say about this project."

After this vague and inconclusive statement, there were almost two months of relative calm. It seemed that the story was about to starve to death from lack of further specifics and that it would go the way of other journalistic revelations. But this was not to be. On April 21, the Toronto Star published the following: "Field Marshal Montgomery . . . became one of a handful of people ever to see Avro's mock-up of a 'flying saucer,' reputed to be capable of flying 1500 miles an hour. A guide who accompanied Montgomery quoted him as describing it as 'fantastic.'. . . Security precautions surrounding this super-secret are so tight that two of Montgomery's escorts from Scotland Yard were barred from the forbidden, screened-off area of the Avro plant."

This news, which was much more authoritative since a noted military personage was involved, gave rise to the strangest deductions. Later, on April 22 and 23, even the austere London Times opened its columns to news from the distant Dominion concerning those flying saucers, which it had hitherto severely banned from its cautious news columns.

On April 24, the Toronto Star confirmed its February story, adding that some of Canada's most noted aeronautical engineers were secretly working on a mysterious flying disc made of metal, wood, and plastics, which would allegedly be the "weapon of the future." For some time, said the Star, there had been rumors that an aircraft of this type was being built in Malton, but no one had got definite confirmation on it.

According to Air Vice Marshal D. M. Smith, what Field Marshal Montgomery had seen was the preliminary study of construction plans for a gyroscopic fighter that could take off vertically and fly at a speed of 1500 mph. A gas turbine would revolve around the pilot, who would be positioned at the center of the disc.

A SYMPTOMATIC SILENCE

For some time the leaks continued along the same lines, although without adding anything new, favored by the fact that the organ of British military aviation, the R.A.F. Review, reprinted almost the whole of the original Canadian inquiry, thereby conferring, so to speak, a semiofficial status upon the news.[11]

As a precaution, however, the review felt obliged to state that “none of the opinions expressed in the article” had been confirmed by the Air Ministry. In fact, all during the period that the news was breaking, the Ministry carefully kept its lips sealed. The Canadian flying saucer (the one in the newspapers) did not concern the Ministry, since, luckily for it, the truth about the real flying saucers of the R.C.A.F. was not even touched.

At this point began the discussions that played directly into the hands of the authorities that were directly interested in keeping the secret.

At the beginning of June, the daily information bulletin of the Swiss review Interavia reported that on the basis of inquiries made by its Canadian correspondent, the A. V. Roe flying disc was probably not in fact an airplane in the shape of a disc but, more simply, a delta-winged jet fighter-interceptor, that is, it had the shape of a triangle. In other words, it was a further development of the well-known Avro 707 heavy fighter and the Avro 698 Vulcan bomber powered with four jet engines.

The correspondent of the review was mistaken (or had he been deliberately misled?), since the firm had for some time been working on at least a third example of a delta-winged plane: the supersonic CF-105 Arrow, a twin-jet all-weather fighter of thirty-five tons, the testing date of which had, however, been scheduled at the earliest for the end of 1955. Evidently this project had nothing to do with the discs, which were several years in advance of it and had a radically different shape. And the proof of it is that when the press had completely forgotten the subject, a new, very brief story that appeared in Toronto on November 1 unexpectedly brought the subject up again.

The story read: “A mock-up of the Canadian flying saucer, the highly secret aircraft in whose existence few believe, was yesterday shown to a group of twenty-five American experts, including military officers and scientists.”[12]

Further news on the Avro pseudo-disc, which had in the meantime been officially baptized the Avro Omega, came on the following October 21, when the press declared that the aircraft had been under study for at least two years and that the cost of the prototype was reported to have been in the area of $200 million.

According to the papers, the Canadian government was planning to form entire squadrons of flying saucers for the defense of Alaska and the frozen reaches of the Far North. Their claimed low cost of manufacture and maintenance, their ability to intercept any high-speed plane in operation and to take off vertically, made them the ideal weapon for operations in wooded areas of Canada and in the subarctic and polar regions, for they were “completely independent of vulnerable runways or any fixed special equipment.”

The press of the Western world naturally received the news with a great sense of relief, and it unreservedly proclaimed: “The flying discs are real!” But waiting for the production-line Omegas (not to mention the prototype) began to drag out. A number of months passed. The summer came, then autumn, and still the Omega did not fly. Other saucers did fly, however, those that had been well known for a number of years.

UFOS OVER ENGLAND

The story began as follows. Sergeant Harry Waller of the 256th Anti-aircraft Regiment was setting up a radar installation in the southeast section of London when, between 3:30 and 4:15 P.M. on November 3, 1953, he noticed a strong signal at the edge of the scanning screen. After the blip was centered, it was received solidly.

Through the eyepiece of a theodolite, the object appeared to be white—"an incandescent white"—perfectly circular, the size of a tennis ball, and just about directly over the installation. By comparing the data obtained from the radar and the theodolite, it was deduced that it must have been hovering between 60,000 and 65,000 feet.

In the report forwarded to the War Office, the observer stated that it could not have been a weather balloon because the type of signal received by the radar indicated the presence of a metallic object of gigantic size. The return signals had actually been three or four times larger than those produced by the largest plane known. In addition, after hovering motionless for about ten minutes, the strange object flew rapidly out of radar and eye range.

From an investigation that was launched immediately, it was learned that no research balloons measuring 200 feet in diameter (for that was the size of the body that had been received on radar) had been launched in Great Britain for three months. A meteor trail would not have yielded the sharp edges of the image on the radar screen and a rocket could not have remained motionless in mid-air for so long a period of time.

On the same day—indeed, during just about the same period of time—T. S. Johnson and C. H. Smythe, two pilots who were flying over Kent at 15,000 feet in a Vampire training fighter, caught sight of the shiny UFO, which was flying at very high speed at about 60,000 feet, and they mentioned it in their flight report to the authorities. In the report they stated that it seemed to be spinning on its vertical axis and giving off fiery jets around its circumference, while a vivid, bluish light emanated from the central portion.

The interest aroused by the mysterious apparition—which finally brought the UFO psychosis to phlegmatic Britain—and additional sightings of unknown flying objects that continued to be reported from various parts of the country (sightings that naturally would have to be discounted because of the saucer excitement that was spreading among the public) ended by upsetting a number of highly placed personages. They demanded reassurances.

On November 19 the News Chronicle reported the Air Ministry's announcement: "We are not prepared to comment on individual reports . . . Every report is investigated, but 95% are found to be due to natural phenomena. About the others, the experts can reach no conclusion."

In the House of Commons a group led by Labour M. P. Bellenger introduced a question demanding whether the War Office was able to state the exact nature of the object that had been picked up by radar.

The government spokesman asked for a week in which to make the reply. Strange things occurred during that week. The Air Ministry backed up its declaration. The spokesman of the Defense Ministry also warmly approved: it was a weather balloon. Nothing unusual! The War Office—which was responsible for the questionable statement—after conducting a "new" series of investigations did a complete turnabout and in its second statement candidly admitted that the sighting was to be attributed to "mechanical deficiencies," that is, to certain transitory anomalies in the operation of the radar apparatus when it picked up a balloon of normal size and characteristics. (Someone, easing his conscience even more, added: electrical.)

The spokesman for the Ministry of Defense quickly disposed of the matter to an unusually crowded House on November 24, and although the newspapers showed considerable skepticism, they printed the official declarations and dropped the matter. Evidently the time was not yet ripe for the "big news."

THE SECRET OF THE CANADIAN STORY

The scanty news that was coming out of Canada in the meantime gave more and more support to the initial skepticism of the few people who lacked faith in the Omega. There was talk of sending the whole project to the United States, which would receive the honor, not to mention obligation, of building it and other projects that were under study and might replace the original model, which had "proved rather inefficient." The name of a certain aeronautical engineer, J. C. M. Frost, who had been identified as the principal designer of the project, began to appear with greater and greater frequency.

Finally, in March 1954, the American press described both Frost's hopes and the project in complete detail. The start of this new story was rather unusual.

Concerned about the marked progress that Soviet scientists had shown in the fields of jet aircraft and guided missiles, the United States Air Force had allocated a large sum (the exact figure was a military secret) for building within three years a prototype of the flying saucer that had been so well publicized in the press.

According to rumors circulating among military experts, U.S.-Canadian joint defense authorities had agreed to build the craft. "This is a ship that will be able to take off vertically," declared those who enthusiastically believed that the Western hemisphere could be defended by flying discs, "to hover in mid-air and to move at a speed of about 1850 mph. That is, it would be capable of performing all the maneuvers that flying discs are said to be capable of. This astonishing craft is the brain child of the English aeronautical engineer John Frost, who worked for the large De Havilland factory in England during the war and who later went on to A. V. Roe, in Malton, Canada. The aircraft that will be built for the U.S. Air Force is not, however, the first of this type that Frost has designed. Two years ago he had designed and submitted to American experts an aircraft which was called the Flying Manta because of its behavior on take-off. It more or less resembled the present disc, but it could not take off vertically.[13] In addition, its top speed did not exceed 1430 mph. The Manta had interested the American General Staff, but in view of these operating deficiencies, it was decided not to build it."

Month after month of 1954 went by without further news from Canada, either official or semiofficial.[14] By now people were expecting to see the Frost discs, with a combined emblem of the United States star and the Canadian maple leaf painted on them, flying through the skies by the dozen. Instead, on December 3 the Canadian Defense Ministry suddenly and officially announced that the project was being abandoned because, although a number of sub-assemblies had been built and it was believed that the machine would fly, it was agreed that it would have served no useful purpose.

When he was interviewed by reporters, Minister of Defense Howe confirmed the decision, adding that perhaps four or five million dollars had been spent on the Frost disc, but that the project had been given up without being carried to its final development because that would have involved a total expense in the neighborhood of 100 million dollars on something that was highly speculative.

THE QUARLES STATEMENT

On October 25, 1955, Air Force Secretary Donald Quarles released a statement through the press office of the Department of Defense permitting the A.T.I.C. to divulge some of the conclusions it had reached after its investigation of the UFOs. Among other things, Quarles declared:

"We are now entering a period of aviation technology in which aircraft of unusual configuration and flight characteristics will begin to appear. . . . The Air Force will fly the first jet-powered vertical-rising airplane in a matter of days. We have another project under contract with AVRO Ltd., of Canada, which could result in disc-shaped aircraft somewhat similar to the popular concept of a flying saucer. . . . While some of these may take novel forms, such as the AVRO project, they are direct-line descendants of conventional aircraft and should not be regarded as supra-natural or mysterious. . . . Vertical-rising aircraft capable of transition to supersonic horizontal flight will be a new phenomenon in our skies, and under certain conditions could give the illusion of the so-called flying saucer. The Department of Defense will make every effort within the bounds of security to keep the public informed of these developments so they can be recognized for what they are. . . . I think we must recognize that other countries also have the capability of developing vertical-rising aircraft, perhaps of unconventional shapes. However, we are satisfied at this time that none of the sightings of so-called ‘flying saucers’ reported in this country were in fact aircraft of foreign origin.”[15]

Whether it was deliberate or merely a slip (even the newspapers failed to catch it!), Quarles got his tenses all wrong. He was talking about aircraft of the near future, while the flying discs belonged to the past and not a very recent past at that.

According to news stories in the American papers, the new Avro project was the latest Frost project and was described as an aircraft resembling a plate turned upside down (finally!) with 180 adjustable nozzles distributed around its perimeter that would make vertical take-off possible and then, by changing the angles of the nozzles, enable the craft to move forward, sideways, or backwards.

Even leaving aside doubts about the seriousness of the project, it is at least astonishing that for the first time in the history of flight an aircraft (and a pioneering, supersonic plane at that) promised to take shape solely according to suggestions of the public at large!

In any case, the first reliable news came in February 1959. It was then called “a revolutionary type of vertical take-off plane based on the principle of the ‘ring jet’ that promises a 100 percent or more increase in lift at take-off through the ‘ground effect’ as compared with the 15 to 20 percent obtained by helicopters.” In other words, an aeronautical adaptation of the physical principle behind the Vickers Hovercraft that was conceived in 1953 in order to exploit the so-called “air cushion” produced by a jet aimed at the ground: a curious machine of considerable utility that is in current use and is also being produced in the United States. Its field, however, is limited, for it cannot in practice fly any higher than six feet or any faster than 300 mph.

> In fact, semiofficial statements later described it—without, however, adding any noteworthy details—as “a type of aircraft that combines the characteristics of air cushion machines and airplanes, the development of which is being jointly undertaken by the U.S. Army and U.S. Air Force and the Canadian government because the project promises to result in a machine that could revolutionize all the ordinary methods of aerial reconnaissance."

The American papers did not, of course, fail to feature this latest bit of news. For openers, Field Marshal Montgomery was involved again: it was said that he had been given a model of the new machine. A few weeks later another "well-informed" (but anonymous) source baldly declared that England had a considerable fleet of flying saucers at the ready in Canada and that Field Marshal Montgomery had been present at recent, highly secret maneuvers of these craft. "These machines," the cautious reporter wrote, "were built by A. V. Roe and then shipped to a special secret airfield in the center of the country."

In reality, Avro was going through a bad period.

THE END OF THE "AVRO-CAR"

After stating that the potential air threat to Canada had diminished because the Soviets had only a limited number of intercontinental bombers, the Canadian government used the statement as a pretext for canceling the contract for the CF-105 (the Arrow), a heavy bomber, and for its power plant, the Iroquois turbojet, thereby forcing Avro to lay off a large portion of its personnel.[16]

These decisions by the government and the company threw almost 10,000 people out of work, most of them specialists, for the Avro Saucer project—renamed the Avro-Car and financed by the United States (for the simple reason that, according to official sources, "there was as yet no comparable project in the United States")—could barely keep the technicians and skilled workers of the main plants fully occupied.

On April 14, 1959, General Frank Britton during a short press conference in Washington restated the facts, implying that the first test flight of the aircraft would soon be taking place and cautiously declaring that the new type of airplane was "perhaps" destined to revolutionize traditional aeronautical concepts but that there had been some difficulties in developing the idea.

Again a number of months passed without any news, but finally, in August 1960, the American authorities decided to allow reporters to see the prototype, which in the meantime had been changed from a single- to a two-seater. The difficulties had not disappeared. Even though masked by optimism for the occasion, the results were not very encouraging. Quite the contrary. The official report ended, in fact, with the obvious observation that "even for this type of V.T.O.L. plane (vertical take-off and landing) the principal problem is low speed stability. Tests with a full-scale model have been made at the large forty by eighty foot wind tunnel at the Ames Research Center, belonging to N.A.S.A., but they were not completely successful. It became clear, however, that the various problems inherent in a circular aircraft of this type are not insurmountable."[17]

While ufologists jumped with joy on learning of the serious shortcomings of these phony earth-made discs (shortcomings that, according to them, our Brothers from Space had brilliantly overcome several centuries, or perhaps even several millennia, ago), the first model of this type continued in its period of gestation for yet more months, occasionally rising clumsily above the cement runway at Malton. Finally, in December 1961 the United States Department of Defense decided to withdraw from participation in the development of the Avro-Car on the grounds that the formula had failed. It was another plane that definitely had "no tomorrow."

Here ends the official story of the Canadian flying saucers. An endless series of half-truths and manipulation of facts, perhaps agreed upon at the highest levels, in order to deliberately muddy the already dark waters of the whole affair.

In any case, the significant fact is established that the only country that has publicly stated that it was working on plans and actually building aircraft having some resemblance (at least externally) to the "notorious" flying discs has been Canada.

GRATIFIED AMBITIONS

The Canadian desire to do something big and new in the field of aviation was first manifested in 1942 when the government had a large military airfield, with room for expansion, built near Arnprior, about forty miles from Ottawa.

The aeronautical circles of the capital made no bones about their plans to transform the Arnprior Airport into a Canadian Farnborough (or, better, into a Canadian Royal Aeronautical Establishment) for the Canadian National Research Council. Requests for technical and financial assistance to carry out these plans were made to the British government at the time of the Commonwealth Conference of 1944.

A duplicate of the Royal Aeronautical Establishment? It would only be extra work and expense. The wooded mountains of southwest Canada offered much more solid possibilities and guarantees for the erection of a large experimental center that could develop not only the types of aircraft that everyone was familiar with but also types of aircraft that no one should know about, at least until some indefinite time in the future.

With the help of the most close-mouthed civil servants in the Canadian Department of Mines and the Technical Surveys Mapping Branch, conditions in four selected zones in the southern part of the country were examined. This was a vast mountainous and almost deserted region (over seventy-five square miles) situated astride the boundary between British Columbia and Alberta, bordering the state of Washington on the south and reaching the Peace River District in the north.

The location was ideal: a few mountain roads and all of them easily controlled. Virtually nonexistent local traffic in the area round about. Not a single agglomeration of houses that could be called a city. An extensive string of islands and islets off the coastal zone. A thin network of railroads far to the north and to the south: the spur of the Canadian National Railway that links Prince George with Edmonton and the spur from Vancouver that runs along the United States border. One single large automobile artery—the Alaska Highway—winding through the silent valleys and running almost due north.

The remote and wooded nature of the area would act—as it did indeed act—as a natural barrier to any indiscreet eye.

THE SHADE WORKSHOPS

The British were not new at undertakings of this sort. In the extensive area of the New Forest in Hampshire, the R.A.F. had secretly set up five airfields for the Bomber Command in 1942.[18]

The keystone of the British camouflaging of large secret factories was, however, the “shade workshops,” which were developed in order to put the war industry in a place of safety by distributing it among the wooded regions of the country.

The public relations department of the British Railways printed a booklet in 1945 entitled It Can Now Be Revealed in order to publicize the railways’ contribution to victory. Here we read:

“Whenever a new arms city has been born, the railway has usually been prenatal consultant, midwife and full-time foster-parent in turn.

“A certain big ordnance factory in South Wales provides an excellent example. This factory—its name must still remain a secret—was conceived when the first war clouds began to appear on the horizon, but its designers planned it on so vast a scale that thirty-five months were to pass before the digging, the building and the equipping were finished and a start made upon production. . . .

“The factory grew up on twin sites. On one of these sites the work of burrowing deep into the hillside to build a warren of underground magazines was begun. . . .

“The completed ordnance factory contained 1100 separate buildings, mostly of bricks . . . and concrete, occupying an area of four square miles. It is served internally by 58 miles of roads and 24 miles of railway. Its electric power is carried by 300 miles of cable . . . At peak production it was estimated that 37,000 men and women, working on three shifts, would be needed. . . . As with the workers, so with the raw materials upon which they work and with the products of their industry, representing two perfectly controlled flows of hundreds of tons daily."

With the exception of the persons concerned, the rest of the population of the United Kingdom worked or fought without remotely suspecting the existence of this and other similar emergency set-ups. (And today people say that it would be impossible to have UFOs operating out of secret bases!) Even the Luftwaffe had no inkling of this appetizing objective, but if by chance it had been lucky enough to hear of the place, through spy channels, it would have been very difficult to spot among the natural evergreens and those that had been transplanted there, the camouflage nets scattered about in profusion, and the "bird lures" erected in the vicinity.

On the other hand, the R.A.F. command did have a general notion about the existence of the L.F.A., the large experimental center dedicated to Hermann Göring, from repeated reports from the Intelligence Service. According to these reports, the center was engaged in highly important research and was located in Volkenrode, near Braunschweig.[19] Allied reconnaissance planes repeatedly crisscrossed the area looking for the mysterious center, but unsuccessfully. All that could be seen on the photographs were scattered farmhouses and extensive woods interlaced by highways and country roads. There was no indication of military structures.

In reality, the more than seventy buildings comprising the center seemed merely to be innocent farms or were so scattered in the depths of a thick pine forest and so well protected by this natural camouflage that although it covered a total area of nearly two and a half square miles it could not have been spotted even by a low-flying plane.

The town itself was repeatedly bombed by Anglo-American planes. Only two bombs ever fell on the L.F.A., and they were dropped by accident: an American four-engined bomber that had been hit by flak jettisoned its remaining bomb load to lighten the plane for the return flight.

To set up the UFO bases and keep them hidden from any prying eyes that might fly over them, technicians already had at their disposal a choice of tested systems: they could either put the bases underground (using old abandoned mines) or depend on the camouflage afforded by the natural vegetation.

It was decided to use prefabricated hangars because—since there was no fear of air attack—they could easily be built, shipped, and set up even in remote areas; in time, if it proved necessary, they could be put underground and covered with shrub so that they would be invisible from above.

The original nucleus of the buildings—the work of a special branch of the Hawker Siddeley Group that specialized in manufacturing prefabricated buildings—grew rapidly with the influx of German technicians and projects. And finally Soviet secret agents in Canada got indirect word of the matter.[20]

THE "OTTAWA SCANDAL"

Nevertheless, it must be assumed that these agents did not succeed in drawing a complete and exact picture of Canadian activity in the highly specialized branch of suction aircraft, spherical rockets, and other types of unconventional aircraft, for government authorities had immediately taken Draconian measures that virtually isolated from the outer world the entire area where the secret aircraft industry was being developed.[21]

The newspapers of the time mentioned atomic spying, but the affair was in reality a good deal more complicated than that.

Administrative and technical personnel of the Soviet Embassy and four Canadian civil servants were involved in the proved accusation of industrial and military spying that became known as the "Ottawa scandal."

On February 19, 1946, Defense Minister Howe declared curtly to the press: "The spy affair does not involve either atomic secrets or the smuggling of uranium. It's another matter entirely!"

According to the Exchange-Telegraph Press Service, the spies had come into possession of information on radar and on Canadian factories engaged in the production of war materials, "continuously obtaining information over a period of several months." To be exact, since August 1945.

On March 4, 1946, the Royal Canadian Commission of Enquiry made public its final report. We do not know whether it is complete or was censored. It gives a list of the individuals concerned and a list of Soviet requests for information concerning twenty-one different military, industrial, organizational, and scientific areas or matters. These included: radar, snorkels, V-2 torpedo rockets, floodlights, the locations of known and secret military factories and what they produced, the units and deployment of the armed forces, large troop movements, supply services, special air and field grenades, antisubmarine bombs, industrial and chemical techniques, samples of uranium, explosives, atomic centers, the correspondence and movement of diplomatic officials, highly placed persons who might be corrupted, projects under study at the Canadian National Research Council.

The official report ended with the following observation: “We can demonstrate completely only the activity of four of the agents employed in the service of the Soviet embassy. The evidence indicates that many other agents besides the four specifically mentioned were involved and information more intrinsically important has been sent out of the country. We are not in a position to report on it yet because further evidence has to be taken.”

The sequel was never made known. Since secret matters were involved, the veil of secrecy fell over all.

And since military secrecy does not recognize friendships or alliances except in the hour of danger, even the United States was kept in the dark as to what was being done in, so to speak, its neighbor’s backyard.

LET WHOEVER DOES IT WAIT FOR IT

In order to understand this curious inconsistency better we must go back to the end of 1945, when the Americans were walking tall because of their brilliant victory over Japan and their exclusive possession of the atom bomb. They had not yet experienced the anxieties and disappointments of the “cold war” and the small “hot” wars in colonial countries. American power spread over the whole world, and the world that was rising out of the ruins of war was hungry: hungry for flour for underfed masses and hungry for money for industries with empty bank accounts.

Even England needed economic and financial assistance, and it asked for help in the name of the recent victorious alliance. Help was given, but psychologically and practically England was made to feel obligated.

In January 1946, just as they were beginning to be openhanded about giving important information to the press, the British authorities had to come to a reckoning concerning the sudden but not completely unexpected American objections to the exchange of scientific information. This exchange had been agreed upon during the war and had made it possible for the Allies to meet and beat the Germans' formidable technological potential. Now America refused to bring the British government up to date on the atomic secrets being studied at the various centers in the United States with an excuse that must objectively be recognized as almost an insult to the United Kingdom.

The sensational development that suddenly spotlighted one of the "silent struggles" dividing the two biggest Western powers had begun on October 8, 1945. On that day President Truman declared that the secret industrial and mechanical processes that had led to the production of the atomic bomb would be communicated "to no other nation." He indirectly explained why this rule was also applied to England, stating that although England had spent $100 million to develop the atom bomb before turning the work over to the United States (that is, before 1943), America itself had subsequently spent $2 billion before the bomb was ready for use. Ergo: the bomb had become by fact and right an exclusively American property.

American obstructionism was then extended to the mining of uranium and to the processes for its peaceful, or industrial, exploitation. A news story published by the British press in January 1946 aroused the indignation of every good British and Dominion subject:

"The American authorities," the papers said, "have recently forbidden the communication of the results of researches on atomic energy to Great Britain because she has nothing to give America in exchange. British plans for the development of atomic energy are virtually at a standstill since the plant of an experimental station in Berkshire is hobbled by the lack of trained personnel. In addition, the lack of plutonium and uranium 235 that Great Britain has failed to obtain from America has delayed the start of experiments for which one and a half million pounds have been allocated."

Could touchy British pride take this hidden blackmail lying down? After all, it also involved powerful financial interests that were being seriously hurt.

The flow of official statements on aeronautical matters stopped almost abruptly. In addition, the secret negotiations being conducted with the highest American authorities who had been invited to take part in the development of new methods of flight that they could not comprehend, or underestimated, were interrupted. These negotiations had, however, come to a standstill when the Pentagon demanded to know exactly what the British had in mind and what advantages those particular projects would offer over and above those already being developed in the United States. This had occurred during the time when Secretary of Defense Forrestal was trying to impose his own style of Anglo-American collaboration, on the basis of an approach that he claimed would give equal voice to the two countries but that might later, in practice, perhaps be translated into a new Yankee hegemony extending to the field of new aircraft construction.

The British and Canadian authorities then decided to go it alone also in the field of nuclear energy, and they succeeded completely.[22]

As for the New Aviation then aborning, on June 24, 1947 (that is a real "date to remember"!), a formation of nine circular-shaped suction aircraft took off from a secret Canadian airfield and really let America's leaders know that England did have "something to give in exchange."

NOTES

1. Planned during the final phase of the Pacific War by the research and development division of Fairey Aviation Company as a defense against the Japanese Kamikaze, the "Stooge" was a rocket bomb that resembled a torpedo seven and a half feet in length and a foot in diameter, with a rectangular-shaped wing having a span of nine feet and a conventional tail assembly with a rectangular surface. In its essential lines it followed the German V-1 flying bomb, except for the propulsive mechanism, which was a quadruple rocket using solid fuel and located in the after third of the body, and for the high-frequency control. It carried an explosive charge of 220 pounds, and its top speed was between 500 and 560 mph.

Thwaites, On the Design of Aerofoils for Which the Lift Is Independent of the Incidence (Aeronautical Research Council Reports and Memoranda No. 2612, London, H.M.S.O., 1947), p. 17. See also the same writer's Report No. 2611, The Production of Lift Independent of Incidence: The Thwaites' Wing Flap (London, 1947) and the report published in the Journal of the Royal Aeronautical Society, February 1948, the subject of which is "The Production of Wing Lift Independent of Incidence." This subject was not completely new, as can be deduced from the fact that as long ago as 1929 the German technician Oskar Schrenk had published a memorandum entitled "Researches on the Production of Lift without Recourse to the Angle of Incidence" in the Zeitschrift für Mathematik und Physik, issued by the University of Heidelberg.

3. Their appearance might well astonish even experts in aeronautical problems, who could look for information in the latest aeronautical texts without finding it. They belong to a secret experimental "family" of special suction airfoils called C.V.A., worked out by Professor Thwaites. Their application to flight was subordinated to the adoption of special norms. At the time the report was published, wild rumors were circulating among aeronautical circles in England stating that these profiles were designed for a "flying wing" project that would be circular in plan view and for the main section of "all body" (wingless) aircraft of mixed lift (aerodynamic-jet). The idea of a fuselage with lift must have been suggested by examination of data the Germans had obtained on the aerodynamic behavior of the spindle-shaped inclined body of the V-2 rockets when they were tested in the supersonic wind tunnel at Kochel. These tests were carried out initially to study drift patterns and subsequently, in function of the relationship between lift and resistance, to lengthen the gliding range of the missiles. Later on, the idea, which in its basic form derived directly from the German studies, was also studied by the Americans with their Pluto project; but the Marquardt low-level supersonic unlimited-range vehicles—missiles with a nuclear ramjet without wings or with only vestigial wings—which were supposed to be ready to fly in 1963 really existed only on paper.

5. Nevertheless, to avoid any misunderstanding, it should be noted that after the AW-52 "flying wing" was shelved, the appellation "boomerang" was given to another type of wing with a tapering plan that also more or less vaguely resembled the weapon of the Australian aborigines: the crescent-shaped swept-back wing (it was also called the "scimitar" and "half-moon" wing). The Germans had conducted studies on this shape in 1944 for their heavy jet bombers. The British subjected it to prolonged testing in the National Aeronautical Establishment's wind tunnel and mounted it on the Handley Page HP-88 (an experimental single-engined plane that crashed in 1951), the HP-80 (a heavy bomber with four jet engines), and the HP-97 (an unsuccessful transatlantic airliner powered by four jet engines).

6. For example, they had the subsonic "Jindivik" aerial target built by the Australian subsidiary of the Hawker Siddeley Group take off from a gyroscopically controlled bogey in order to prevent the target from running off the airstrip. The turrets of the fast Centurion Mark III tanks were stabilized by the Foucault top. They built a secret apparatus to stabilize fighter planes automatically during the time the radar-controlled firing was in operation. They used electric gyrostabilizers to regulate their air-to-sea torpedoes. (They may have taken as a model the ingenious G-13-C electrical roll stabilizer designed for winged naval torpedoes that had been tested in the hydrodynamic tank of the experimental aeronautical center of Guidonia in 1942 and that had given results on the order of a tenth of a degree. The G-13-C never got beyond the test stages because of the turn the war took and also because of a persistent lack of interest by the so-called responsible authorities in Italy.) These examples are sufficient to indicate the degree of interest the British showed in stabilizing devices.

7. Professor Shenstone knew Germany quite well, having worked at Junkers in 1930 and maintained cordial relations with German scientists up to the outbreak of the war. Hence he had been included in an Anglo-Canadian team responsible for investigating German aerodynamic researches with particular reference to the problems of suction.

11. See "Man Made Flying Saucers," The R.A.F. Review (London, April 1953), pp. 11–12. When the magazine published the schematic profiles of the "Omega" (as it was called in the American press, perhaps because of its shape in plan view), it was seen that it was not, in fact, a device having the shape of a saucer turned upside down—as might have been expected after a number of close-range North American sightings—but a more or less horseshoe-shaped "flying wing." According to the British magazine, the craft had been designed as a test of the new formula and for the subsequent building of fast supersonic interceptors. It was supposed to be relatively small, with a wingspread and overall length both of about thirty-six feet. Along the leading edge of the machine were about twenty air intake slots to supply the propulsor in the wing of the craft. At the sharply cut off tail there was a large, elliptical exhaust nozzle containing ten deflectors by which the craft changed direction (deflector vanes for control) by means of a flow of compressed air coming from the central turbo-compressor. (There were ten of them, but a couple would have done the job.) The burned gases were discharged from the numerous exhaust ducts, thereby propelling the craft. In the middle of the back was a narrow cabin for a single pilot, topped by a teardrop-shaped cupola in transparent plastic from which the pilot could enjoy perfect visibility over 360° at the level of the horizon. (However, he was completely blind as far as vision beneath the horizon was concerned.) Around the vertical axis of the aircraft and inside the wing a large turbine engine revolved, but no details about it were supplied. However, a short time later the magazine The Aeroplane made good the lacuna by publishing a schematic longitudinal section that was purely hypothetical and based on the adoption of a radial centripetal turbine that exhausted the gas that expanded in the collector. Nevertheless, granting for the sake of argument that the "Omega" actually did exist, wouldn't a centrifugal radial turbine be the most likely kind of power plant, since it was easily adaptable to the flat conformation of the plane and to its special propulsive arrangement? The plan indicated the collector of the air that was to be compressed, the combustion chambers of the turbine, the fan for the centrifugal compressor, and the duct for excess air. In the sketch the exhaust gases mixed with part of the fresh, rammed air from the front air intake were erroneously shown to flow in from the rear aperture. Although this justified the type of turbine that was suggested, it was clearly contrary to the original news from Canada. However, the rotation of the motor was supposed to give a gyroscopic stability to the interior of the craft, since a rotating gyroscope could maintain its position in space without change. (True, but what about the violent forward motions that would have obtained while the craft was in flight?)

12. During the last years of the war the most incredible tricks and stratagems to mislead the enemy and to wreak havoc among his troops were worked out at the Inter-Services Research Bureau, which had its headquarters in several rooms in the Victoria and Albert Museum. There explosive rubber snakes and orchids were thought up for the Burma front, explosive souvenir statuettes for Japanese-occupied Borneo; rubber tunas loaded with light arms and ammunition for the Maquis to be washed up along the French coast; coffins with radio transmitters for Norwegian partisans, and other such devices. It was in the obliging penumbra of this old Victorian building that the plans for “bird lures” were born: more than five hundred false objectives made to mislead the Luftwaffe: fuel deposits, railway yards, generating plants, workshops, and airfields built of wood and tarpaper, which drew a large number of bombs away from the real, camouflaged objectives in the vicinity. (It has been estimated that 5 percent of the bomb tonnage dropped on England hit only the “bird lures.”) In the same building the idea of the “Starfish” took shape. The “Starfish” were fires lighted at night to simulate burning cities, and they drew off into the open countryside the fury of the German bombers. In the same building too, British countermeasures against the German radio finders guiding the raiders across the Channel were coordinated. (When a German pilot flying over England at night asked the central radio for his location, the British stations received the answers and retransmitted them in altered form, thus confusing the enemy pilot; flying over the outskirts of London, he would be led to believe that he had flown far off course and was over Manchester, about 200 miles north.) Therefore it should not astonish anyone that in 1942, on the suggestion of the Inter-Services Research Bureau, the British fast and furiously “built” a whole cruiser out of a laid-up tanker in Alexandria. The point of this was to mislead Italo-German reconnaissance and give the impression that the British had established naval equality in the eastern Mediterranean.

During the war these expedients were generally called “psychological weapons." In times of peace they successfully serve to distract the attention of third parties (the general public or the national press—journalists being the thorn in the side of generals and cabinet ministers—or even agents of foreign secret services, although they have exceedingly sensitive noses) from things the military have accomplished or are interested in. Was the wooden mock-up at Malton a genuine full-scale model of the new machine? Or was it rather an expedient thought up to mask one of the many postwar secrets? It seems that even Field Marshal Montgomery, at least at first, was allowed to see only the mock-up. Can this be possible? Certainly. In England one can be a high-ranking officer and still be subject to heavy restrictions if national security so demands. In corroboration of this little-known truth we cite a news story that appeared in British military publications shortly after the war. In March 1942 a secret airfield was set up at Tempsdorf in Bedfordshire for two "special" squadrons of night bombers. What was special and secret about these squadrons was their job of dropping supplies to the European resistance movements and of flying French, Dutch, Czech, Polish, and Norwegian agents into their respective areas. The pilots and crewmen at the airfield had absolutely no contact with the local residents and the secrecy about their activities was so strict that even if a high-ranking R.A.F. officer unfamiliar with the functions of the airfield asked them for information, they were required to give him false information. Besides this, not even the mechanics who worked on the planes had any idea of what they were actually being used for. Colonel Pickard, the commander of the formation, is the only person involved whose name is known, for the Air Ministry and the War Office have never given out the names of the pilots who took part in these missions. Were the first cautious statements and the later contradictory ones, as well as the whole matter of the Avro disc, merely part of a smoke-screen that was handled very expertly? If the British had any interest in confusing the issue (and they did!), they succeeded marvelously. Even today the truth about the UFOs seems to have fallen into a bottomless well, and the most daring conjectures and the most foolish nonsense are all one as far as most people are concerned.

13. For the “Stingray” a jet take-off was planned by inclining the craft at a seventy-degree angle on a special ramp. This was certainly not the ideal solution, but this curious type of take-off was necessitated by the installation of an exclusively propulsive engine. (This was, in fact, a “flying wing” with a shape that tended toward the circular. It was a type of installation that would never have permitted the craft to hover in the air, one of the characteristics of real flying saucers. In addition, it would have been impossible to pilot such a plane, which appeared to lack elevators or any other kind of aerodynamic or gaseodynamic vanes capable of producing the basic climbing and diving maneuvers. The Frost project was completely extemporaneous—in the matter of new conceptions the British aircraft companies were already officially orienting themselves toward the gradual application of jet lift—and basically was only a badly worked out imitation of an excellent product which, strange to say, owes its fame above all to the fact that it is still secret and thus unknown and uncopiable.

14. Or, to be exact, the Canadian press returned to the now forbidden subject only once more, but this time apropos of the other flying saucers, those called UFOs. The American ufologist Donald Keyhoe, in the first of his well-known editorial labors, states that from the beginning the Canadian authorities were openly skeptical about the flying saucers, but that in the spring of 1952, “after a long series of exceptional sightings, their attitude changed and a conference of highly placed persons was held in Ottawa. Four days later, the secret service of the R.C.A.F. publicly admitted that it had begun a serious investigation. At the same time the commission for Defense Research announced the creation of an office (modeled on the American Project Blue Book) that would conduct its inquiries in secret.” (But why, then, even mention the fact?) In September 1954 the Canadian press reported that “after three full years of continuous and absolutely useless sky watch, the government has decided to transfer the personnel of the office and of the relative station ta less speculative duties than those of hunting down the phantom saucers.” In reality, during 1952 the discs flew over the region more than once. As soon as construction on the observation station was begun, the saucers obstinately began to avoid that part of the sky: who knows through what underground channels the Martians got wind of the matter?! A successful bit of extraterrestrial spying? Ufologists find it easy to consider highly surreal opinions perfectly valid, but if we subject the whole affair to the cold light of reason, it seems to have the same amount of credibility as movie adventures of the James Bond type.

15. After debunking all 131 reports of sightings in North America during the first half of 1955, Mr. Quarles stated that the government had "some time ago initiated negotiations with the Canadian government and with Avro-Canada for the preparation of an experimental model of the Frost flying disc. This aircraft will then be mass produced and used for the common defense of the sub-arctic area of the continent." After they had rejected various projects that appeared too costly or inefficient, the choice of the American experts finally fell on Type Y. News release No. 1053-55 put out by the Office of Public Information to report the statement of the Air Force Secretary, informed the press that a photograph of the projected disc (or, more accurately, a photograph of an "artist's conception" of the disc) was available on request from the Pictorial Branch of the Department of Defense. This curious publicity photograph —which depicted the disc flying over American skyscrapers (see Figure 29, which is an enlargement of the disc detail)— revealed that project Y was something radically different from the Omega. The new Frost project had the classical external shape of a saucer turned upside down, like the real discs, but it depicted, to be blunt, an absurd propulsive system for a machine of that type.

16. Nevertheless, shortly afterwards the decision was revoked. The Arrow, a twin-jet fighter with a delta-wing formation, was originally designed to replace the CF-100 Canuck beginning in 1951. But because of a long series of modifications in both the developmental and the manufacturing stages, necessitated by the continued lack of jets of the proper power (the planned Iroquois turbojet being delayed in mounting), the prototype did not fly until autumn 1957, when it was temporarily equipped with two Pratt and Whitney J-75 turbojets. It was estimated that the plane would go into assembly-line production in 1959. On the other hand, to get an unfortunately somewhat sketchy idea of the extraordinary potential of Avro-Canada, one need only recall that at the end of the first six months of 1955, the date of the last progress report that was made public, the jet engine division had already produced 1500 Orenda turbojets and over half a million turbine vanes, succeeding in producing toward the end about 100,000 vanes a month, each of which required sixty different mechanical operations, most entailing a high degree of precision.

17. In autumn 1959 a very out-of-focus photograph of the Frost disc (subsequently called the Avro Air-Cushion Aircraft and finally simply the Avro-Car) was making the rounds of the press. It was claimed that a "free-lance photographer" had taken the picture during a "surprise flight over the Avro factory at the moment the 'disc' was taken out of the hangar" for testing in "a tethered condition." It was necessary, however, to await the release of the official photograph, which did not come until August 1960, to be able to make any accurate deductions about the mysterious aircraft. On the top surface of the machine—whose thick rounded edge revealed that the designers intended to remain within the lower subsonic speed ranges (one of the U.S. Army's contract specifications)—the first thing noticed is the central air intake with its large, shrouded vertical fan driven by three Continental J-69 turbines housed within the lens-shaped body. The superpressure of the underside (the air cushion) was created and maintained (but only when close to the ground) by a jet of air coming from the fan and expelled through the Venturi tube ring nozzle around the edge of the disc. For horizontal flight, the jet flow from the ring was directed toward the rear, thus developing a component of forward motion and the ordinary aerodynamic lift produced by the flat belly of the aircraft moving at a slight positive inclination was added to the lift component. In 1960 the final objective of the project was to perfect an efficient and reliable method for swinging the ring jet through a 90° arc in order to limit the thrust developed by the lift-jet to vertical movements of the aircraft (i.e., to take-off and landing) and to use aerodynamic lift for horizontal flight. This would, in any case, have been the first step toward the realization of the future supersonic type (requested by the U.S. Air Force). The circular wings, by reason of their low aspect ratio, are, however, very unstable, being subject to tipping over suddenly. This basic and serious defect, which proved to be unremediable despite every effort, signed the death warrant of the project.

20. The A. W. Hawksley factory of Hucclecote, which had been absorbed by the Hawker Siddeley Group for the production of rough-finished aeronautical parts and accessories, produced tens of thousands of prefabricated houses during the 1945–1947 period. These were made of a light alloy called "Airoh," and after home needs had been fully supplied, a good part went to Australia and Canada.

21. In the postwar period, before the United States' defensive radar network was extended to the Far North (that is, up until the end of 1952), Soviet long-range reconnaissance planes from Siberian and subarctic air bases often returned the visits that American reconnaissance planes based in Japan made over Manchuria and eastern Siberia, by flying over Alaska, the Yukon Territory, and the Mackenzie District, areas which proved within their range. If the secret reconnaissance has not been repeated and extended with the technological advances in flying, this is owing mostly to the installation of the triple radar chain extending across Canada that the American military authorities have set up as a first line of defense for the United States and, beginning in 1958, also to the disconcerting availability (on payment) of all the aerial photographs made for the Ministry of Power and National Resources. According to news stories in the Ottawa papers in 1966, a good part of the photographs, which now cover virtually the whole of the nearly four million square miles of the country, reproduce military stations, barracks, bridges, ports, and airports. All restrictions on the sale of this precious material were in fact lifted in 1958, when it was concluded that the advent of spying by means of stratospheric photographic reconnaissance planes of the U-2 type rendered further precautions superfluous. Later on, various secret types of both American and Soviet strategic reconnaissance satellites equipped with high-resolution telephoto lenses were added to the U-2s. Nevertheless, it remains true that an underground installation or one that is properly camouflaged with live vegetation easily escapes being identified from a distance photograph and that the maps relative to a specific zone can be quietly retouched beforehand in the photographic offices of the military censors. (Unless, in the meantime, the UFO bases have been moved elsewhere, having fulfilled their original mission.)

22. And American obstructionism naturally continued. On January 26, 1956, the scientific editor of the London Daily Telegraph revealed, in fact, a new disagreement between the British and Americans over the development of nuclear energy. "Pressure," he wrote, "is being brought to bear by the U.S. to discourage Britain from making thermonuclear weapons. This will almost certainly be one of the matters discussed when Sir A. Eden sees President Eisenhower. The American action is in line with her invariable policy since the end of the war of denying to all other countries any information or material that would aid in the design or manufacture of atomic weapons or other military developments such as nuclear-powered submarines. Under this policy, Britain and Canada, who collaborated with her in making the first atom bomb, have been treated in the same way as other countries. One reason for this is the fear in America that bad security might permit data gained by other Western countries to reach Russia. Another is belief in the political expediency of keeping other Western countries dependent on America. America could deny Britain supplies of heavy water, which has double importance in the atomic field. It weighs about 1 percent more than ordinary water and occurs as about .02% of all natural water. Heavy water is an ideal working medium for some types of atomic reactors used in electric power production. It is also a starting point in the manufacture of lithium deuterise, a nuclear explosive used in hydrogen bombs. Britain, as reported in the Daily Telegraph on Monday and confirmed by the British Atomic Energy Authority last night, has abandoned the only project of its own for industrial-scale manufacture of heavy water. This was to have been in New Zealand, at Waireki. Steam from hot springs was to have been used for heavy water production and electric power generation. Partly because of a substantial increase in the cost of plant since the idea was first mooted, Waireki heavy water would have cost about £90,000 a ton, instead of an estimated £40,000. Britain has been paying between £65,000 and £75,000 a ton to Norway for supplies from the Norsk Hydro. In August the Americans offered to sell some of their own surplus supplies at £25,000 a ton. Admiral Strauss, head of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, said to me then in Geneva, 'Of course we shall want to know what it is going to be used for.' The condition that America has actually made is that recipient countries should satisfy her that none of it is being used for weapon manufacture. While Britain pursues her declared intention of manufacturing thermonuclear weapons, it would be difficult to give satisfactory proof that supplies from America were not being diverted to this purpose, or were not releasing supplies from other sources for that use. The trouble is that even if the Waireki project had been pursued it would have produced only some tens of tons of heavy water a year. For a single reactor producing 100 megawatts of electricity, enough for a city of 70,000 people, 400 tons might be needed. This means that if the Americans did not relax their conditions for Britain she might have to give up, for the time being, any plans for power reactors of this type until other sources could be expanded."

The American reply was not long in coming and generally confirmed the old precautionary measures. On November 2, 1957, the Democratic senator Clinton Anderson declared to the press that especially following the sensational Soviet missile achievement the most important internal American problem at the moment, susceptible to important international repercussions, was that of changing the federal laws on nuclear secrets in such a way as to share the data and scientific and technological discoveries in nuclear energy with the most qualified Western countries. He felt it necessary, however, to add immediately that Congress should examine the proposal to exchange with Great Britain the secrets inherent in atomic weapons and missiles with the greatest care in order to make sure that the English did not intend a "one-way" exchange. In addition, unfortunately, they had little or nothing to offer in exchange for U.S. weapons and the rest of the NATO countries had still less. Senator Anderson then stated that the secrets of the Nautilus atomic-powered submarine had been given to the English against their promise of turning over to the Americans information about their gas-cooled atomic reactor, but that after receiving the plans of the Nautilus, the English had not given the United States any details on their reactor. Naturally, it is very difficult in cases like this to separate right from wrong. But the facts speak for themselves.

How to Do the Impossible

“In the light of logic and our experience of the methods generally employed by the Great Powers in the development of weapons, can we reasonably hypothesize that we are dealing with a secret weapon?” the journalist Franco Bandini rhetorically asked his readers at the time of the great “celestial invasion” of 1954. And he answered: “No! For, examining the technical side of the question, if we concede that the flying saucers have the performance attributed to them by the public, it is clear that they are not in an early stage of experimentation but something already perfected, gems of aeronautical science with astonishing characteristics. And all this has been achieved without the least scientific preliminaries, without preliminary studies or a movement in technology that might at least suggest that such result was in the offing?! Clearly, the secret weapon hypothesis arouses the greatest perplexity.”

“Let us suppose,” Bandini had written some years before, in 1950, “that some new and terrible weapon built by one of the two great powers, Russia or the United States, is really concealed under the generic name of flying saucers. Is this possible? The strongest evidence against this supposition is that the saucers apparently show no geographical preferences. One time they appear here, another time there, without, one would say, the least reason. Instead of showing a preference for desert areas, the seas, or the polar regions, as would be natural if it were a secret weapon, they dally like carefree tourists over cities, coast lines, the most crowded areas; they make low passes over industrial plants, and it almost appears that they are methodically exploring every corner of the earth. Let us add that they hover in the air for a quarter of an hour at a time (many reports speak of hours), making it easy for local photographers to shoot miles of film. What secret, then, could these extraordinary ‘secret weapons’ possibly hold?! If these devices belong to the United States, why do they also fly on the other side of the Iron Curtain, with all the risks and dangers of being shot down and comfortably and carefully examined? If they are Russian, why do they fly over American territory, running the same risks? And if they are experimental, how could they maintain the same forms over a number of years? And is it possible that in the meantime not even one of these saucers has ever crashed or been shot down or, in any case, examined in sufficient detail to yield positive information? Are these saucers, then, already ‘perfect’? And if they are, how can the silence that the interested power has maintained be explained—not to mention the silence of the power that is the object of their perennial and gigantic threat?”

Let us examine these objections in detail, one by one. They appear—but only “appear”—to be very well founded, if one thinks along ordinary lines or is forced to for lack of sufficient evidence.

There is no law that says an air weapon, if possessed in sufficient quantity and already at the necessary stage of technical perfection, must remain forever in the plants where it has been secretly prepared. Indeed, sending squadrons of unidentifiable flying machines that are so fast they cannot be intercepted through the air space of a (potential) enemy in time of peace would be a tacit but eloquent show of strength! (If, on the other hand, Bandini's reasoning were correct, the Russians should have jealously hidden their guided missile systems in their Siberian arsenals. Instead, they installed a good number of them in Cuba, right on America's doorstep.)

Any device, whether a weapon or not, can remain secret indefinitely even if exposed to the gaze of the public, provided that no one can determine its provenance, the way it operates, its manufacturing details, its purpose, and so on. And truly one cannot gainsay that for over two decades a whole complex of prearranged and fortunate circumstances have conspired to erect and maintain an impenetrable wall of silence around the real solution to the "mystery of the UFOs."

The fact that the discs have never attacked planes in flight or on the ground (contrary assertions by some ufologists are all without foundation), never dropped bombs or done anything that might be interpreted as aggression has, therefore, led those who support the idea that the discs are of extraterrestrial origin to speak of the "feelings of benevolent observation" that the pilots of the mysterious space ships are supposed to have concerning us. The list of these people, some of whom are innocents and others complete charlatans, is very long, but all their books are riddled with unlikely details and clear fabrications.[1]

In fact, one can now calmly maintain that the UFOs do not fly over the areas in which they are sighted with any deliberate intention of exploring them; they are simply in transit, coming or going to far more distant places.

We can unhesitatingly agree that they are secret. "Weapon," however, is far too restrictive a term. Strictly speaking, anything indispensable to war is a weapon. Extremely useful instruments designed for peaceful use can, if necessary, be adapted to military use, thereby acquiring the attributes of a weapon. A knife, obviously, can cut, and it can kill. In the first case it is a tool; in the second, a weapon. In short, what you call it depends on what you do with it. The UFOs cannot, therefore, be called weapons. They could be weapons, and they would become weapons (very deadly ones) when and if necessary; but at the moment they most certainly are not weapons. And if one finds the term "unidentified flying objects" that is so beloved of the ufologists displeasing, one need only call them "special aircraft with a secret operating cycle."[2]

What about the charge that the behavior of the UFOs is incautious? This doesn't seem to be the case. When some conventional plane tries to approach a UFO too closely, the device invariably pulls away, climbs, and disappears. On the other hand, even if one takes a series of photographs of the object hovering motionless in the sky, often at a very high altitude or surrounded by clouds of gas or vapors, how much secret information does one acquire? None, clearly; for the camera lens registers exactly what has been seen by the eyes of observers—that is, merely the external form of the device—and this means nothing to anyone who does not have the highly specialized information known only to the designers and builders of the mysterious machines.

The assertion that the UFOs cross the Iron Curtain is not completely true, although this idea has been fairly widespread for some time, thanks to the efforts of ufologists. With the exception of rare flights over German and Austrian territories previously occupied by the Soviets (but geographically a part of continental Europe), the UFOs have never appeared at altitudes at which they could be seen over territories belonging to the U.S.S.R. in such numbers or with such frequency that they aroused mass hysteria even remotely comparable to that aroused in the United States in 1947 and 1952 or in Europe in 1954.

The discs are marvels of engineering, but absolute perfection is not, alas, of this world. Even if today they are, logically, more evolved and reliable than at the time they first appeared, like any man-made machine, they were born with latent imperfections. One need, in fact, only recall the pitiful end of the little "flying oyster" that crashed in Montana to bring things back to their proper proportions.

If the "formula" seems to be much better than one can hope for today in terms of aeronautical safety, that certainly is not the result of superhuman help but devolves from the intelligent fusion of certain revolutionary technical principles. For there are no miracles in aeronautics but only a good dose of farsightedness, great daring, and a very large number of experimental studies, a great part of which are secret.

FORTUNES AND MISFORTUNES OF MILITARY SECRECY

"We know," Bandini continued in his careful examination, "that at times the flying saucers literally infest the skies. They go in pairs, in threes; some have seen them in the hundreds. This posits large-scale production of technologically very complicated objects, the existence of laboratories and experimental centers, special airfields, recently built factories, special bodies of trained crewmen and pilots, an enormous consumption of television and radio-control apparatuses, a complex of activities and an absorption of energies of enormous proportions. Information would inevitably have leaked out, with the usual accompaniment of spying, treason, and the like. Is it possible that such a big secret could have been maintained so long, so perfectly?"

Certainly—provided we leave out the word "perfectly," which does not apply to the case after what we have set forth in this book. More—we have illustrious and well-known precedents.

In 1943 the neutral press printed some strange news about an apocalyptic experimental American bomb that had destroyed every living thing on a small island during its first test. The facts as reported were not true, but the rumors were based on concrete data, or on the first rare leaks that were coming out concerning the frenzied preparation of the supersecret atomic center at Oak Ridge. The news, then, was in advance of the appearance of the new bomb. A kind of science fiction before the proper time.

Two years later vague references to unknown, large-scale phenomena ("a deafening roar and a towering column of smoke”) that had been noted in the desert region of New Mexico appeared in some Texas and Arizona newspapers. Mass hallucination or a meteor, the military authorities declared brusquely. Then it was learned that precisely at 5:38 on July 16, 1945, under the code name Trinity, the first American atomic bomb had been detonated on the top of a high steel tower a dozen or so miles from the air base of Alamogordo. “We learned of the existence of the A bomb at the same time the Japanese did!” the surprised citizens of the United States exclaimed. And it was perfectly true![3]

Isn’t it perhaps likewise true that all the inventions of the last war (the flying bombs, the rocket torpedoes, magnetic mines, radar, jet planes, even the atom bomb) were revealed only at the moment they were used in the field? The public —journalists and technicians included—always remained in the dark about what was going on, whether at home or elsewhere, even when the military authorities already knew something of the enormous and complex train of work in researching and preparing the new enemy inventions. Generally the exceptional inventions (those that interest both the government and the military) deceive or surprise even clear-sighted people who are trained and equipped to understand. At the time of the First World War (to cite an example from a less mechanical-minded epoch than the present), it was not until the war was over that people were convinced that Big Bertha was actually a Krupp cannon of very long range that was bombing Paris from a distance of about seventy-five miles, a range inconceivable up to then for any type of artillery.

Every war of importance and every stormy postwar (or prewar, if you like) period has its well-guarded secrets. A random example. The following interesting paragraph appeared in the newspapers on July 9, 1947: “Professor T. D. I. Leech of the University of Auckland, New Zealand, head of a group of scientists responsible for the construction of an ultrapowerful weapon that is very close to the atom bomb in importance, did not wish to comment on the appearance of the shining discs in the United States.”

Here is half (or almost half) of a revealed secret. Here is a “leak” that was made voluntarily. Who can tell us about it?

And who knows when they will tell us? Perhaps tomorrow, perhaps in another twenty years. A British Top Secret is maintained with all the inflexibility of a Polynesian taboo.

The curious affair whose chief protagonist was Count Helmut von Zborowsky is the best demonstration of the magic power that military secrecy has in its relations with outsiders.

In 1943 Von Zborowsky, who worked in France after the war on the development of the tubular-winged plane called the "Beetle," was at the Bayerische Motoren Werke, directing research to perfect a hypergolic propellant for use in rocket engines. Long trains of tank cars carried mysterious liquids labeled Tonka, Salbei, and Mell to Camp R Zuehlsdorf and to certain decentralized hangars of the Allach plant.

One day a B.M.W. executive became suspicious about such strange supplies. Rockets using hundreds of tons of salvia and molasses? Was this a joke or was it a cover for black marketing? From the encyclopedia that he immediately consulted, the observant executive learned that the tonka-bean tree "belongs to the family of the South American papilionacee, which resembles our plum tree, and from whose fruit coumarin, a perfumed substance resembling vanilla, is extracted." Perturbed, he started a rapid inquiry to determine why large quantities of exotic plants were being used in the experiments on rocket engines—exceedingly costly plants to boot, and presumably in very short supply.

His request for clarification as to the use of these materials, Von Zborowsky later said, laughingly, was nevertheless phrased "discreetly and urbanely."

"For experiments," was the curt written reply.

After four weeks, the top executives of the factory asked the next logical question: "For what sort of experiments?"

"Secret experiments," came the reply from the secretariat of the R center. Such was the shadowy power evoked by that disturbing adjective that the B.M.W. administration never again dared to ask further explanations, and until the collapse of Nazi Germany, without batting an eyelash, it regularly paid the invoices for the large supplies of exotic beans (in reality a complex mixture of natural and synthetic hydrocarbons), sage leaves (nitric acid 98 percent) and molasses (methyl alcohol).

THE SUCCESSES OF AERIAL RECONNAISSANCE

Following a proposal advanced by generals Becker and Dornberger and supported by Kesselring, then a Luftwaffe general, an experimental center for the study and testing of self-propelled long-range projectiles was set up in 1936 at Peenemünde, on the Baltic. The station was to be shared by the army and the air force.

That was where the Luftwaffe tested the winged flying bomb FZG-76 (later called the V-1). With the deliberate intention of going beyond the stratosphere and working in the field of supersonic speeds, the army completed at Peenemünde its development of the A-4 torpedo rocket (the famous V-2), which it had begun two years earlier at the old and by then inadequate center at Kummersdorf.

Despite the lack of interest and understanding that the highest Nazi authorities at first showed, a V-2 rocket launched over the sea on October 3, 1942, in its first test had a range of 120 miles. Nevertheless, it was agreed that further improvements were necessary to make the deadly torpedo practical. It did not have its baptism by fire until September 8, 1944.

During eight years of intense work no less than 65,000 modifications were made on the weapon, requiring a select group of specialists (one now famous name can represent all the others: Werner von Braun) and a work force composed of over 7000 technicians and workers skilled in widely disparate specialties. Despite the participation of so great a number of people, the many years' work—including the period during the war—was carried on rather smoothly under the label Geheimnis (top secret). And yet Germany was overrun with spies and informers of all nationalities, its position in the center of the continent making it an area easy of access. And if at the beginning of the war the British had a vague inkling of the existence of the studies for the rocket bomb, they owed it to an unknown informer who never revealed his identity and whose information was therefore suspect.

In October 1939 an anonymous letter reached the naval attaché of the British Embassy in Norway. Out of pure anti-Nazi sentiments and with no desire for recompense, the writer offered to reveal important German secrets. If the British accepted, all they would have to do was to alter the conventional introductory remarks in the B.B.C.'s nightly German-language news bulletin according to a prearranged formula and on a specific date. The Intelligence Service gave the instructions to the B.B.C., and right on time the unknown informer replied by radio on a previously arranged wave length. He reported that the Germans were working on a rocket bomb, two different types of radar, turbine aircraft engines, and other weapons whose details were gradually supplied by radio and immediately recorded by the competent British authorities.

Most of the secrets concerned the aircraft industry, and it was Professor R. V. Jones, the former director of the Scientific Research Department of the Air Ministry, who revealed the whole story (known in Intelligence Service circles as the Oslo Report) on February 20, 1947, simply because the threat from those weapons had disappeared with the end of the war.

Nevertheless, it was not until the night of August 17–18, 1943, that the British decided to subject the experimental station to heavy bombing, and they did so only after having noted, in a certain sense de visu, the seriousness of the prospective threat—apparently via certain troubling reports from agents operating in Sweden.

The 2000 tons of bombs dropped by 600 R.A.F. bombers devastated the precious machinery and killed a large number of technicians, but they did not halt the course of events. The V-2 had already moved into the construction stage at the invulnerable underground factories of Mittelwerke at Nordhausen in Saxony, at Bleicherode, Konstein, Sonderhausen, Sallfeld, and in still other parts of south-central Germany, as well as in Ebensee and at the Rax Werke in Wiener Neustadt in Austria.

The air attacks on Peenemünde, which was so furiously defended by fighters and flak that the British lost over forty bombers there, did, however, delay the final perfecting of the V-1 by eight months, thereby saving the Normandy invasion troops what might have been a frightful decimation. This device too was conceived and grew in a propitious atmosphere of unbroken mystery until several radio-controlled prototypes accidentally veered off the experimental path and instead of plunging into the western Baltic crashed on Swedish soil and on some Danish islands.

On May 15, 1942, returning from a photographic reconnaissance flight over Kiel—a flight which from the start gave little promise of yielding anything of interest—Lieutenant D. W. Steventon swung his Spitfire toward the Baltic. Flying at a very high altitude, he looked down on the island of Usedom, in the estuary of the Oder River, some sixty miles northeast of Stettin. The island had never attracted the attention of the R.A.F., since it held only some small villages occupied for the most part by simple fishermen. Nevertheless, something caught the pilot's eye. Undoubtedly that carefully smoothed out terrain was a recently constructed airfield. And what about those narrow concrete runways? And those unusual-looking buildings, unusual even on a military airfield? Keeping below the clouds, the pilot shot his last few feet of film and then returned to his base with his throttle wide open, believing he had done a good day's work. And he had. With those photographs as a clue, the agents operating in Sweden and Norway managed to poke their noses into what was going on at Usedom by pretending to be herring fishermen. And in December a voluminous bundle of papers (the Secret Weapon Trials Report) was on its way to London, where it now rests in the files of the Intelligence Service.[4]

While the Anglo-Swedish work on the reconstruction of a V-2 rocket that had crashed near Baeckedo went on feverishly, additional "confidential" news came from Stockholm in the spring of 1943 alerting the Allied authorities to the fact that the remains of two German secret devices that had been experimentally launched had been found on the coast of Skania. Two British agents immediately made contact with the people who had the wreckage in their possession. Although the violent shock of the crash had rendered them almost unrecognizable, fragments of glass and aluminum and pieces of wing surfaces permitted the agents to make a hasty reconstruction that differed radically from that of the torpedo rocket that exploded in the sky over Baeckedo.

The belief that the islands of Ruegen and Usedom were hiding war secrets of the greatest importance was confirmed. In May a British reconnaissance plane flew over the region and in the center of some camouflaged buildings spotted and photographed a strange device placed on inclined rails, ready for launching. From photographic enlargements the R.A.F. experts learned that it was a small pilotless aircraft and that the dark marks on the ground—caused by the very hot exhaust gases—meant that a jet-propulsion system was being used. It was the final experimental model of the V-1 flying bomb, and its being caught on the launching ramp was truly fatal for Germany, even though a total of 26,000 flying bombs did leave —too late, however—the production lines set up first at the Volkswagen factory in Fallersleben and then—after it received the ruinous attention of the R.A.F.—in the vast subterranean factories in Nordhausen.[5]

In the spring of 1943 the great Zeppelin factory at Friedrichshafen, which suffered from its proximity to the Swiss frontier, met a similar fate. The secret agents who swarmed in every neutral country had their eyes on it. They discovered that in 1937–1938 its subsonic wind tunnel had measured the aerodynamic characteristics of the tail assemblies to apply to the A-3 and A-5 rockets (the precursors to the V-2), and that among the various things in gestation under the veil of military secrecy were highly advanced antiaircraft radio finder apparatuses. On June 20 sixty Lancaster bombers devastated a great part of the plant, but they were unable to stop the production lines of the various subsidiaries that had meantime been relocated in underground or camouflaged quarters in the Black Forest.

This whole series of unfavorable events would certainly not have occurred if these vital secrets had been hidden, as they are today, in the middle of some vast steppe, on the edges of a desert or in a large mountainous and wooded land, instead of being on a plainly visible islet in the Baltic or along a heavily trafficked central European border.

But let us continue our criticism of Bandini’s requirements.

THE POSSIBILITIES AND LIMITS OF SECRET MANUFACTURE

More than once the flight characteristics of the UFOs have been described by experts in aeronautical matters as “far beyond anything our technology can achieve.”

But since 1947, and on up to today, the speeds and altitudes of the UFOs have been approached even by conventional air technology (progress never stops, not even to please the ufologists). Are the aforementioned experts—almost always members of civilian research institutes—aware that a private body cannot even remotely compete with a military institute or with one subject to military control, which is favored by an almost unlimited wealth of experimental and financial means?

For example, the German rockets financed by the Nazi government were reaching altitudes of sixty miles when their Anglo-American counterparts developed by private initiative were barely able to get up to twelve miles or so, and with ridiculously small payloads. In the postwar period the V-2 rockets and their derivatives wiped out all the second-rate efforts produced by American, Russian, and British designers.

An appropriate and typical case is that of the turbine-powered planes that were secretly flown in prototype at German research centers during 1939–1940, just when the most authoritative and highly quoted technical journals in the field were expressing doubts about the practical solution of the problem of the rotary internal combustion engine for the near future. And that wasn’t all. The secret was so well kept even from friendly powers that the first news about German turbine-engined planes came to the ears of Italian military authorities only in 1942. The general public did not learn about them until two years later, during the winter of 1944, at the time of the first official German communiqués.

The first real turbojet plane (the Heinkel HE-178), in fact, first flew on August 27, 1939, powered by a Heinkel-Hirt HE-HI-S-3 giving 1,100 pounds of static thrust. In following years came different, greatly improved and more powerful types, but it was only when the first models were delivered to the airfields that the secrecy was in large part relaxed.[6]

The appearance of the German jet planes was a bitter surprise for the Allied fighting men, particularly for the bomber crews of the American Eighth Air Army, which on August 14, 1944, encountered the first ME-163 rocket fighters over Leipzig, with heavy losses for the bombers.

The existence of this daring new plane was known to the British General Staff only through photographs. On June 23, 1943, the British airman E. P. H. Peek had photographed an experimental model of the fighter ready to take off on the Peenemünde airfield. The Allied authorities, faithful to an old and tested system, said nothing about it until the war was over. There was no reason to do so before. It would only have demoralized their own crews and let the enemy know that one of their war secrets had become known and so force him to plan further measures.

When questions that involve the destiny of a whole country are concerned, a single day can change the whole course of events (as the Arab-Israeli Six-Day War demonstrates). The UFOs constitute too important a trump card not to wait until the proper time to make them felt upon the course of history. History, therefore, goes on . . .

FURTHER REFLECTIONS ON WHAT CONSTITUTES "PROOF"

Mr. Bandini said that if he were to be convinced that the flying saucers were of terrestrial origin, he would have to be shown somehow that there existed:

1) an experimental center that could handle the job;

2) production lines actually in operation at certain companies, which logically could not long hide their highly specialized type of construction.

He summed up his ideas with the following: "What nation can be interested in conducting its experiments publicly, and in air space that is not its own? Can we possibly grant that for a number of years a group of specialized mechanics and equally specialized pilots and strange installations—in short a rather conspicuous and costly organization—could have existed without anyone’s having found any traces of it even in the budgets of individual countries? In addition, since these discs have been sighted all over the world, we must suppose either that their radius of action is virtually ‘world wide’ or that a chain of bases must be scattered about here and there. The first supposition encounters almost insurmountable obstacles: it is impossible today to conceive of any rocket plane capable of flying nonstop around the world. The second likewise seems impossible. A single base can be so well situated and hidden as to make it virtually disappear from the face of the earth. Not so a chain of bases. Among other things, it is necessary to build the bases, equip them, bring in the rockets, the fuel and the personnel to operate them. Too many things are involved to be able to hide them all.”

The list of the “proofs” he demanded thus included the following:

3) select personnel of three types: navigators, specialists, and flyers;

4) one or more specialized and visible airport installations from which the mysterious devices would take off;

5) a series of financial allocations that could be observed in the military budgets of the nations building them;

6) the presence of auxiliary bases in different parts of the world.

The sixth point is immediately eliminated because of the special operating cycle of the UFOs, which do not require the auxiliary bases that are absolutely indispensable to aircraft of the conventional type. But to go into this matter at the moment would be premature.

The remaining objections can all be easily demolished. Let us, then, take up each of these points in order.

Today there is no plane that is wholly built by the firm whose name it bears. The system of subcontracting is the rule. Electrical and radio equipment, hydraulic circuits, certain parts of the landing gear, the tires, sometimes even the engine and propeller or the jet engine, all the ball bearings, cables, nuts and bolts, semi-finished parts, paint, instruments, Plexiglas for the cabin, parts in rubber or plastic, certain types of pumps and auxiliary electric motors, oxygen masks, various sorts of pressure tanks, a large part of the gears and gear boxes, fire-control systems, weapons, and so on, all flow to the contracting company from a myriad of small companies. The central firm is responsible first of all for the planning and design of the new airplane, then for the preparation of the most important elements in the construction (wings, fuselage, tail, etc.), and finally for the assembly of the whole machine, which leaves the plane ready to fly.

Within limits, the central firm can also order the elements that it would normally build from subcontractors, who would construct them within certain tolerances. In such a case the central firm would then do nothing more than assemble the parts (in sheds or on secret sites)—or not, as in the case of planes built on licensing agreements.

If the planes are to be built secretly—that is, outside the plant of the contracting firm—the flow of materials follows a broken itinerary on trucks or trains operated by or under the supervision of the personnel of the subcontracting firms. Not knowing the design of the whole, they cannot logically guess what sort of aircraft these components are destined for. They have merely supplied certain girders bent in a certain way, certain sheets cut or curved in some special shape, anonymous tubing in light alloy shaped according to detailed designs that gives no hint about itself other than its shape and dimensions, and accessories common to many well-known types of aircraft.

When the material is brought into military warehouses, all civilian interference automatically ceases. Halfway to the secret bases, the highly trusted representatives from the bases themselves come into the picture. This representative joins the personnel of the warehouses and is responsible for making sure that the various parts of the aircraft get where they are going by the most suitable and most appropriately camouflaged means available. When they reach the base, they are assembled by crews of trusted specialists.

Not tons of thousands but a few hundred, or fewer, highly selected men can thus gradually get ready whole fleets of new, supersecret flying machines.

The same procedure works even more easily in supplying the food, fuel, barracks, and everything that makes life tolerable for a relatively small human nucleus secreted in a remote or deserted area.

CAMOUFLAGING MILITARY SECRETS

Special, deliberately misleading buildings with conventional signs provide a tested method of masking secrets of this type.

Organized by the Gestapo—which, as everyone knows, did not take matters of secrecy lightly—the Volkswagen factory was concerned in 1938 with the publicity campaign for the "one-thousand-mark utility car." Described as the ne plus ultra of this type of automobile (four seats, four forward speeds, fifty-five mph, twenty-eight miles per gallon), the car caused a sensation and an avalanche of orders came in. With the money that was collected, three huge factory buildings were constructed in a few months for mass production of the car under the supervision of the Labor Front, headed by Dr. Ley.

The first models of the people's car were a big hit at the Berlin automobile show in February 1939. Then came the summer, the ideal time for taking a vacation in the little car. But nothing was coming off the production lines. Indeed, no cars could come off the production lines because all three factories were really producing parts for the Panzers that three months later were swarming off toward the Polish plains. The individual parts were secretly shipped to military warehouses, where crews of trusted mechanics took care of the final assembly. Q.E.D.

And now let us come down to more recent times.

In August 1941 the British used the generic name of "compressor" to refer to the plans for the first De Havilland "Goblin" turbojet engine in order to mislead enemy spies. And when the jet engine began its bench tests on April 13, 1942, at the experimental center of Hatfield, the military authorities spread the rumor that a new type of electric-power station was being tested, in order to explain the characteristic whine of the new engine. As expected, the populace accepted the odd explanation; so did even the technicians at the center who had nothing to do with the project.[7]

Again in 1941, this time in occupied France, the SO.CE.M.A. firm secretly began its project for a turbine aircraft engine of 3000 horsepower called the T.G.A., the initials of which were officially interpreted as Turbo-Groupe d'Autorail (railway turbine). To add verisimilitude, the contract was placed under the aegis of the Ministry of French Railways. Naturally, this interpretation sought to mislead the German occupying forces, who, though they had excellent informers, never suspected the true nature of the project.

Agreed, these projects were somewhat limited in scope. But the Manhattan Project, which was responsible for the research that made the atomic bomb possible, was certainly not. The population of the state of Tennessee truly believed that the imposing complex of concrete walls in Oak Ridge was a hydroelectric power station under construction, temporarily being used as a military depot for unspecified war materials—until the historic day that the bomb was dropped on Hiroshima. Indeed, a strange news story from the papers of the time confirms the almost incredible state of ignorance of a great part of the people who actually took part in the enterprise:

"The seventeen thousand people who worked in the huge government establishment on the production of the bombs never knew exactly what they were doing. Working in shifts, shielded by thick walls of reinforced concrete, they put together the various pieces of the mechanism without knowing the final result, until President Truman announced that a new bomb of unheard-of power had been dropped on Japan."

Examples of this sort, taken from the events of the last war, could be multiplied by the hundreds. But it is well known that the British and Americans have a special predilection for this kind of camouflage, which they also adopt in peacetime for their confidential plans. These misleading labels serve not only to keep the public ignorant of this or that stage of research or production (generally the public doesn't even know about the existence of the project itself), but to keep the parts of the military not concerned with the project in the dark about what is going on and thus minimize the danger of involuntary leaks of information.

It is clear, then, that secret activities never come to the attention of the profane (especially if the project centers are set up in areas difficult to get to), and experts are deliberately kept at a distance by clever subterfuges of various kinds.

A word or two on the matter of transatlantic shipments during the period 1945–1946. A state of war provides a favorable atmosphere for keeping “confidential” materials concealed, since people are accustomed to seeing continuous shipments going off to distant or unknown destinations. It was precisely in this sort of propitious atmosphere that the plan for the UFOs ripened. It should not be forgotten that their first public appearance goes back to June 1947. Estimating at least a year for the preparation of the airfields and the machines as well as for the first small local flights (the real experimental flights), one comes to the spring of 1946. Hostilities against Japan had ended only a short time before, in August of the preceding year. During all of 1946 the traffic of men and materials from the pacified sectors of Europe and Asia toward the American continent was exceedingly heavy. Could there have been a better moment to complete the delicate and extensive shipments that were necessary to the whole plan of the new machines, without their being obvious both to lay observers and to the agents of other countries? In the vast general confusion brought about by the ending of the war, who would have noticed?

In any case, these limited and furtive movements of men and materials were, after all, merely a problem in logistics, which in the military sphere are always set and solved privately by specially trained personnel.

There is certainly nothing new in the formation of small specialized groups, carefully chosen from units already composed of selected men with a high degree of competence in their own fields, strong, healthy, bright, able to get along with one another, possessing a strong esprit de corps, sober, reasonably abstemious (in vino veritas! heavy drinkers talk too much), possessing no moral skeletons in their closets, having an excellent military, technical, and cultural background and a high sense of duty, and preferably without any emotional, or at any rate forbidden ties—all these qualities bound together by strict discipline and a high sense of duty combine to form these nuclei of uniformed supermen.

In this way and this way alone the British formed their commandos and T-Men, who took part in exceedingly daring and successful enterprises, and the Italians their frogmen of the X Flotilla M.A.S. The legendary group of special troops organized by Colonel Skorzeny, the German torpedo men, the British submarine men who went into the Norwegian fjords to blow up the Tirpitz, the American frogmen who preceded the invasion troops on D-Day and removed the mines along the parts of the French coast where the debarkations would take place, the Japanese kamikaze and human torpedoes—to cite a few famous examples of special units—were all formed in the same way.

The world at large knew nothing of the complex job of selecting these groups, of their long and careful training and their technical and moral problems. Only when the enemy acknowledged the heavy damage that had been done—and this is how the veil of secrecy was lifted—did the existence of these groups become known to everyone. Had those special units been formed overnight? They had involved bringing special tools and weapons, food, fuel, barracks equipment, and so on together at one central point . . . just as with the UFO bases!

“PACKAGED” PORTS AND INVISIBLE AIRFIELDS

Even before the war it was thought that the various methods for disguising airfields would not guarantee them against enemy attack.

In England three different types of artificial underground arrangements for fixed airfield installations were investigated. The British study, which was supposed to be “classified” but which was fully divulged in the Deutsche Bauzeitung of September 12, 1938, contemplated the following arrangements:

1) the excavation of a long tunnel, with several lateral branches, in the side of a dune along the coast or in the side of a hill, followed by a large flattened and smoothed area to serve as the runway;

2) the excavation of a tunnel directly beneath an already existing runway that would be served by a ramp and winches for hauling the planes to the surface for take-off;

3) the excavation of a deep tunnel, without a runway and with a launching catapult located adjacent to an elevator shaft which would bring the planes up. A group of apparently innocent buildings would mask the opening and the catapult. This system, which had been suggested by aircraft carrier practice, seemed particularly well adapted for the protection of frontier areas.

Events moved along so rapidly that there was no time to experiment with any of these systems. In any case, it is doubtful that there was any intention to do anything about it for some time. Toward the end of the war, Germany was the only country that tried to put military airfields underground (the already mentioned U fields in Bavaria). Indeed, it put at least 300 factories producing missiles, planes, engines, accessories, and liquefied gas underground to protect them from the devastation of the air bombings.[8] Although this expedient came too late to save Germany from defeat, we know that it proved to be extraordinarily effective.

For example, the Heinkel firm mass-produced the HE-162 Volksjäger jet fighter in an underground factory hidden in a large salt mine near the Elbe. It was protected against any kind of aerial attack, for it was 1300 feet underground. It reportedly prepared 700 to 750 fighters a month and employed over 2000 workers. Only the fuselages, complete with accessories, were built in the salt mine; these finished products were then taken by night to Bernberg, where there was a camouflaged assembly hangar. Here the wings and jet engines were mounted, and the finished planes were then distributed to the various airfields in the vicinity.

The existence of the factory was kept top secret, and in order to distract attention from it, the normal mining of salt was carried on at 600 feet. Hundreds of electric trucks were used to carry manufactured parts through huge tunnels carved in the rock salt from one department to another, and at night enormous hoists carried them up to the surface.[9]

During the last winter of the war hundreds of ME-262 jet fighters came out of the huge network of tunnels dug in the hills of Kahla (Jena), but lack of fuel kept them from taking off and they were destroyed on the airfields in Thuringia.

In the autumn of 1944, in a large well-equipped natural cavern near Haigerloch, in Rhenish Prussia, the Germans prepared a large uranium pile that, when it was almost completed, fell into the hands of the Americans.

A small portion of the synthetic gasoline industry was also put underground.

The only aim of putting the plants underground then was to protect them from aerial attack. Nevertheless, after Germany was occupied the Allies had a hard job locating the whereabouts and the entrances to several underground factories, despite the fact that their presence in the zone had already been indicated with sufficient accuracy by secret agents.

This type of protective camouflage, then, worked very well even after the bombs stopped falling!

Since the old methods of camouflage by means of nets and branches have definitely seen their day (for modern aerial reconnaissance permits one to distinguish between live and cut vegetation by spectrographic photography), the only truly valid protective camouflage, aside from underground installation, is natural camouflage, which combines marvelously well with prefabricated buildings.[10]

At this point conventional people will, as usual, rise up and proclaim that in any event a large-scale movement of parts of prefabricated buildings and unusual equipment could not have escaped the attention at least of the technicians charged with transporting them, even if their destinations lay overseas, beyond the reach of the merely curious. And there would be all the more reason, they will say, for this complicated activity to have alarmed the inhabitants in the areas where the buildings were to be erected, particularly when the destination, even if sparsely populated, was Europe or North America.

Now if one were to talk to these conventional people not about airfields but about secret, prefabricated seaports, the least that could happen would be that they would be struck dumb, for if it is difficult for them to imagine hiding a certain number of hangars (which in point of fact can be set up anywhere, even in the depths of the remotest regions, by transporting them by air and dropping them by parachute), it would seem absolutely impossible that a port could be hidden. After all, by its very nature it must be located along some well-defined stretch of coast. And yet even this extraordinary "miracle" of military technology has already been accomplished a number of times.

In order to avoid any misunderstanding, we transcribe here the main points of a British news item of 1954 that treats of the construction of several stand-by prefabricated ports:

"Great Britain has quietly prepared a good number of 'stand-by ports' as replacements for her major ports in case they become damaged or destroyed by atomic attacks. These are prefabricated ports, made up principally of pieces in reinforced concrete similar to the huge floating caissons of the famous Mulberry artificial ports that were towed to the Normandy beaches in June 1944 and made it possible for the Allies to supply the forces on the beachheads quickly. The various parts making up the moles and warehouses—as well as the necessary ancillary material (cranes, elevators, railway tracks, mooring bitts, etc.)—have been concentrated at chosen strategic points in the vicinity of the ports where they would be installed in case of necessity. The necessary preparatory work of widening and dredging the channels has already been completed in the ports themselves, and new fuel tanks have also been constructed. The whereabouts of the warehouses containing the stand-by ports as well as the coastal areas that have been chosen to take the place of the great harbor areas that might be destroyed are kept secret. Those who have taken part in the various aspects of the undertaking still do not know what they are to be used for. Only a few trusted civil servants in the Admiralty know anything about the details of this vast plan worked out immediately after the war as soon as the government leaders became aware of the offensive possibilities of atomic weapons. In the last few years the work has been speeded up and tens of millions of pounds have been spent on it. It is estimated that Great Britain today has at least six large artificial stand-by ports ready to go into operation in case of emergency."[11]

While we are dealing with British secrets, it would not be a bad idea to remember that in February 1954 the Air Ministry revealed for the first and only time that Great Britain had a protective shield of radar installations throughout the Kingdom, with the key parts of the extensive organization in underground quarters and protected by massive concrete shields.

As with the artificial ports, the radar network was set up without the press' getting wind of it or the workers on the job knowing exactly what the underground installation was for. Rumor has it that the workers of one of the contractors involved in the construction were led to believe that they were working on the foundations for a new hot springs pavilion.

Whatever may be one's deep personal convictions about "unknown flying objects," one must certainly agree that these Cyclopean undertakings are even more astonishing than the UFO bases, because they were not secretly carried out in the fastnesses of some large forest on the coast of Africa or in the desolate reaches of the Arctic, but along the heavily populated coasts of England—which more than any other European country insists on freedom of the press.

After all this evidence, is it not perhaps legitimate to argue that only "a few trusted civil servants" in the Ministry of Supply, the R.A.F., and the Hawker Siddeley Group know anything about the impressive project to hide the bases of the so-called UFOs in the dense Canadian forests?[12]

1. That the authorities charged with keeping the secret tolerate, approve, and even, through more or less unknown dummies, encourage the wild theorizings of the ufologists can doubtless be understood, for so long as they succeed in making people believe that the UFOs come from somewhere in cosmic space, they can continue their work undisturbed.

2. It has sometimes been pointed out that there is an inherent danger in the UFOs, inasmuch as they are liable to "hostile action" vis-à-vis some great power, with international reactions and consequences that are difficult to foresee but would certainly be very serious. In fact, a power possessing an air weapon without another power's being able to identify either its ownership or the point from which it was launched could carry out sneak bombings over a period of time until the enemy country was annihilated, without having to fear any reprisal from the country that was bombed—and that, indeed, might possess even more powerful weapons—and without experiencing any moral condemnation for the treacherous aggression. If one really succeeded in making world public opinion accept the idea that a mysterious air weapon was of extraterrestrial origin, any attack would in fact pass for an act completely independent of the human will! Fortunately, the possessors of the portentous secret of the UFOs have not been and will not let themselves be tempted into some ruinous adventure which would not accord either with the mentality or the interests of the British ruling class; and besides, who can guarantee that the UFOs are really still not identified in the secret files of the Russian, American, and Chinese general staffs? Perhaps the statements prepared for the press and thus for the public at large—forever ignorant of everything—by the various scientific commissions of inquiry are as ambitious in their intentions as they are mediocre in their futile conclusions? . . .

3. Nevertheless, atomic secrets had already been violated several times, although the public at large did not know it, by both disputing parties. In February 1943 Anglo-Norwegian commandoes flying from England seriously damaged the Hydro-Norsk factory at Vermork in Telemark, which produced "heavy water" for the Germans. The latter were, in turn, generally aware that the United States was diligently working in the atomic field, but a surprise roundup of Nazi agents in 1942 cut off any possibility of trouble before it got under way.

6. On September 28, 1942, the aeronautical attaché of the Italian Embassy in Berlin had communicated to the Technical Direction of the Italian Ministry of Aeronautics the first vague confidential information concerning the twin-jet Heinkel HE-280 and a Messerschmitt jet fighter of analogous design (probably the famous ME-262). This information led Italian technicians to sit on and finally shelve Italian plans in the field of jet propulsion (Caproni-Campini jet engines). At about the same time, the Allied secret services also came into possession of some data regarding the new German products, which were expected to be "excellent from every point of view."

7. And since we have mentioned the De Havilland Company, it will not be amiss to quote from the Italian press what the aeronautical authority Charles Gardner wrote in the autumn of 1949 about a well-kept British secret of the period immediately after the war concerning the famous civil air transport four-jet DH-106 Comet, with a speed of 500 miles per hour: ". . . The story of the Comet is quite interesting. The first design goes back to 1944–45, but was not until 1946 that the chief designer of the De Havilland firm, R. E. Bishop, drew up the guidelines for its construction. . . . Until March 30, 1949, the particulars about the construction of the craft constituted one of the most impenetrable secrets of the entire field of international civil aviation. At Hatfield rumors circulated at one time about a stratospheric craft with swept-back wings and a cruising speed of 453 mph, but the company maintained absolute silence in this regard, refusing to contradict or confirm the rumors. There was a good reason for the policy of secrecy: England was then and still is the only nation that constructs commercial turbojet or propjet planes, and these machines—which include the DH-106 and the Vickers 'Viscount'—were to restore its old prestige to British civil aviation and make up for the years lost during the war. British supremacy in the field of jet engines is beyond question, but until the new craft had been finished and flown, it would have been possible, at least theoretically, for our rivals [the Americans] to introduce something similar. . . ." Since the performances of the UFOs decidedly surpass all conventional limits, it seems logical to deduce that the secret concerning them has rightly lasted and will last much longer.

8. In addition, with the enormous work force available in the huge numbers of prisoners of war, who were used for the hardest labor, they put a number of special experimental facilities underground in man-made caverns. One good example is the wind tunnel for measuring the ballistic behavior of aircraft weapons. This wind tunnel, built completely underground at the L.F.A. center in Volkenrode, was a good 1300 feet long and could be brought down by means of powerful pumps to 1/30 atmosphere so as to simulate air pressure at 32,000 feet altitude. But this tunnel was particularly distinguished by the fact that the two ends (which housed, respectively, the weapon being tested—mounted, if necessary, on the complete airplane—and the target) were camouflaged as "model farm" buildings, with many stables, hay lofts, barns, etc., so that we can easily understand how even the most skillful air reconnaissance pilots finally had to give up trying to locate the L.F.A.

9. The factory functioned, however, for only a brief period because of the worsening military situation and the difficulty of supplying raw materials. When it was occupied the Allies learned that only four fuselages a day were coming out of the mine. From the technical point of view, however, it functioned perfectly.

10. The American U-2 reconnaissance planes uncovered secrets from the air on the basis of previous briefings by agents operating directly on Soviet territory or on its borders. The routes of the U-2s were carefully studied and worked out in advance. If the pilots had flown over the vast reaches of Siberia at random, one could be mathematically certain that they would not have photographed anything really interesting or that at the most they would have discovered only one important objective for every ten or so completely fruitless but dangerous flights.

11. See News Chronicle and Messaggero Marittimo No. 61, 1964. One must also add, to be perfectly candid, that the British were not novices at this sort of enterprise. Two "secret ports" of somewhat smaller size were in fact readied at Gareloch-on-Clyde and at Carnyarn in Scotland between the autumn of 1940 and June 1942, to spread out coastal ship traffic endangered by German submarines and bombers. (Cf. "Porti segreti in Scozia," Rivista Marittima, Ministry of the Navy, Rome, August-September, 1945, p. 54.)

12. The thick forests of British Columbia are well known. The region is favored by regular rainfall and a rather temperate climate, as well as by the characteristic mountain and river system of the region (tortuous mountain chains alternating with wide valleys). Here centuries-old trees thrive—pines, cedars, spruce—which easily grow as high as 150 feet and, in some particularly long-lived species, even 300 feet. (They were saplings when the Lombard invasion was breaking up what was left of the Roman Empire after it collapsed in Italy.) Thus, considering that the UFOs can take off and land vertically—as proved by their ability to hover motionless in the air—it follows that a UFO airport does not need the long cement or asphalt runways that characterize our airfields and make them visible. Simple round open spaces cleared in the midst of forest glades or on the shores of peaceful mountain lakes, properly camouflaged and marked by hidden radio beacons, could easily take care of the take-off and landing of a number of flying machines without too many operative complications. These installations would easily be overlooked by aerial reconnaissance, even if a plane's route happened to coincide with the location of the secret airfield. For what, in fact, is a total of a square mile or two covered, for example, by possibly a hundred open spaces and prefabricated circular hangars compared with the nearly four million square miles of Canada?

CHAPTER 10

In Which, for the Present, We Conclude . . .

In order to demolish completely the grotesque edifice of idiocies and mental blocks fabricated by the ufologists, it remains to clear up the fifth question: How was the undertaking financed?

In aeronautical jargon—which is appropriate to the subject matter—we now have to make another long power dive into the past and focus our light on the misunderstanding about the so-called R.A.F. scandal, which had a profound impact on British public opinion some dozen years ago.[1]

At the beginning of 1955—while British aeronautical authorities were preparing to mount a propaganda campaign supporting the R.A.F.'s claims to the category of Senior Service, traditionally held by the Navy—the opposition press unleashed a bitter attack on the air force, illustrating “with an abundance of facts what experts term the disastrous situation of our air defense.”

On January 15 the principal exponent of this dissatisfaction, the London Daily Herald, under the headline, “Britain Has the Men—But Not the Planes; Britain Is Unprepared for a Full-Scale Modern War,” wrote, “Britain is rapidly losing her claim to be among the countries with effective air-power. . . . During the last 3 years the Government aimed to spend nearly £1000 million on aircraft and equipment for the RAF and on research. Much of this money has been spent but the goods have not been delivered. . . . The failure in the electronic field is an ominous pointer to the development of British guided missiles. Several have been launched and engaged targets successfully. But these were only test vehicles. It might be better for us to build American missiles under license—missiles which are proved successes.”

Naturally, these depressing statements made a great impression on the ignorant public, alarmed by the huge headlines, and the members of the opposition got up in the House of Commons and demanded explanations. To hear them, it seemed that England was about to go under from one minute to the next: the Air Force was without airplanes, the Army was short on men and arms, the Navy was in decline.

The situation in England was not, in fact, rosy, for military life no longer appealed to the younger generations as it once had, and in the Commons Churchill himself had evidenced some concern about this state of affairs, which was still, however, far from being or even seeming catastrophic.

As far as the Air Force was concerned, the opposition pointed out that the number of extremely modern prototypes was constantly being exaggerated, yet they remained unproduced for far too long a time. The opposition even spoke of a “great R.A.F. scandal” and of chaos in high military circles, indicating that the guilt lay with the Ministry of Supply, which was accused of perpetual shilly-shallying, inability to coordinate, obtuseness, and still more.

Directly involved, the government defended itself by publishing a White Book. A picture of the fluid situation that had resulted from the transitional epoch introduced by nuclear arms emerged from the White Book, despite all obvious uncommunicativeness and the lacunae dictated by the necessities of military secrecy. It also said, in no uncertain terms, that the R.A.F. was the central pillar of defense of the British Isles and the Commonwealth and that it would be developed to the maximum.

Instead of stopping, the criticisms mounted in intensity; and severe punishment of those responsible and a detailed accounting for aeronautical expenses were demanded—unsuccessfully. The British government not only took refuge in stubborn silence but also, in the annual allocation of the military budget, increased the R.A.F.'s share by £22 million, sizably decreasing the amounts destined for the Army and Navy.

In sum, during the fiscal year 1955–1956, British aviation —scandal or no—had a budget of £513,900,000, which, like the previous billions, were largely spent without anyone's knowing how or where.

The opposition would not give up, however, and finally succeeded in getting a special parliamentary commission set up to investigate aeronautical contracts. On January 21, 1957, it concluded its work and in its subsequent report recommended to the government that the entire contract system be reviewed. In particular, it hit at the costly financing of several types of airplanes that were never constructed. Ghost planes, the critics called them. "The 8 jet Boeing 52 [the American strategic superbomber] is years ahead—five years ahead, at least—of anything we have got."[2]

"We have spent too much time and money in relation to what has been achieved," concluded Sir Roy Fedden, former chief engineer of the Bristol Airplane Company and a member of the investigating committee. "In five years, from the budget of 1950–51 to that of 1955–56, more than seven billion pounds have been spent and we have had seven ministers of defense, all of which, however, has done little to improve the military efficiency of the United Kingdom."

In the allocation of monies, the lion's share always went to the Ministry of Supply, and rightly so, in view of its functions. In 1946 alone its budget for "aeronautical research" ran to £28 million. Previous to that it had received other money for various reasons, and it received much more in successive budgets.[3]

In the area of military expenditure, to ask for greater clarification would be grotesque, to say the least, but even if the British authorities prefer to remain silent concerning the destination of that stream of money and its fruits, the figures speak loudly enough.

THE TUG OF WAR BETWEEN THE U.S. AIR FORCE AND THE UFOS

While the storm generated by the opposition in England was about to reach its peak, in the United States the press was again exerting pressure on Air Force authorities to express an opinion on the wave of UFO sightings of the previous autumn, which, although mainly observed in Western Europe, had also appeared sporadically in various parts of the United States, causing the usual conflicts between public, press, and authorities.

As usual, there was a flood of reassuring if inconclusive statements. Summing up seven years of investigation and study (ad usum Delphini), the most authoritative figure in the country, President Eisenhower, declared parenthetically to the press that he was personally in a position to exclude the possibility that the UFOs had an extraterrestrial origin!

For their part, the experts of the Air Technical Intelligence Center in their nth final report repeated their previous assertions, protesting that they did not possess “any authentic physical evidence . . . establishing the existence of space ships from other planets or secret experimental weapons launched by the United States or by any other nation on earth, again for experimental purposes. The flying saucers, we repeat, exist only in the imagination of the so-called witnesses.” It was the intention of the Air Force that the UFOs were and were to remain nothing more than a modern myth.[4]

Although the intervention of the highest political power in the country did not dissipate the suspicions of those who believed in the existence of the mysterious machines, as had been hoped, it did succeed in eliminating once and for all the suspicion that the UFOs were American-made airplanes.

Catching the ball on the bounce, the specialists in extraterrestrial flying saucers and similar mysteries aggravated matters by maintaining that if the craft were not extraterrestrial something would surely have leaked out after eight full years of continuous sightings, because “no secret weapon in a democratic regime could remain secret for such a long period of time!”[5]

From that moment the activities of Project Blue Book—which had been reestablished without fanfare and on a completely different basis—were quietly continued in order to keep the principal source of “official” information for the public under strict control.

Periodically—but sometimes at long intervals—the Department of Defense, in agreement with the U.S. Air Force, sent out a new series of news releases for the press that were designed to wear out even the most indefatigable petitioners.[6]

The news release of October 25, 1955, carried Secretary Quarles’ statement verbatim, with its reference to the Avro-Car. A lengthy release followed on November 5, 1957. It repeated the usual identifications, thereby reducing the proportion of flying objects that remained “unidentified” to less than 2 percent. The third release, on November 15, 1957, disposed of certain inexplicable electrical phenomena that had accompanied the appearance of the UFOs over the south-central states.

The fourth release, which came nearly a year later (October 6, 1958), demolished at one fell swoop all the incidents that had taken place up to July 31, reasserted that such apparitions were in no way dangerous, and praised the work of Dr. J. Allen Hynek, now “Chief Scientific Consultant” to the Air Force on matters concerning UFOs.

The brief release of January 22, 1959, again summed up the 269 American sightings of the preceding year in statistical form, rejoicing in the obvious drop (.67 percent) in the annual percentage of sightings that could not be explained by reference to ordinary phenomena. On July 15 a very short release—tabulating the cases that had occurred during the first part of the year—declared with ill-concealed disappointment that there had been a 2.09 percent rise in the notorious rate of popular illusions, notwithstanding that the number of sightings had clearly dropped by half.

The two complementary releases of January 29 and July 21, 1960—after concisely summing up all the data gathered since 1947, which brought the total U.S. sightings to 6,312 cases (of which 1,501 pertained to the well-known 1952 flights over the capital)—went off into a wordy explanation that was taken whole cloth—without changing even a comma!—from the release of November 5, 1957. Evidently Project Blue Book wanted to perform a kind of brainwashing on the ufologists, who appeared disinclined to accept the repeated, passionate declarations of ignorance and innocence made by the new leaders of the project. A special scolding was then administered to the various private associations that accused the Air Force of concealing the most significant information or that boasted of officially exchanging information with the Air Force concerning the activities of the extraterrestrial airships.

The tug of war between the U.S. Air Force and the UFOs, or, better, between the Air Force and the ufologists, then began to decrease rapidly in intensity and pungency with the beginning of the astronautical program, which divided the attention of the public—which is inclined to focus its immediate interest on what is visible, tangible, and explicable—until . . .

Until August 1965, when, after years of sporadic sightings that were of little interest for the ufologists, a new wave of unknown flying objects appeared in the skies over New Mexico, Texas, Kansas, and Oklahoma, catching the attention of, among others, numerous qualified observers, such as police officers, weather bureau experts and radar specialists of the U.S. Air Force.

Strangely enough, however, for the first time the American press—perhaps influenced by the enormous amount of military counterpropaganda—was not inclined to build up a new "case," and this was a mistake because the phenomenon had been verified on a large scale over Mexican territory as well, and new appearances of UFOs were about to complicate matters, as at the time of the tumultuous "celestial invasions" of 1948 and 1952.

THE "UFO SUMMER"

The first UFO appeared over Wynnewood, Oklahoma, a little before dawn on July 31 and remained visible to the eye for about forty minutes. Its presence was also detected by the radar screens at the Tinker and Carswell air bases (even though Air Force authorities subsequently decided to deny the fact).[7]

The next night, triangular and diamond formations of UFOs and scattered, individual UFOs flew by at an altitude estimated at slightly more than 10,000 feet, going north and showing "frequent changes of color, from reddish to blinding white and from white to greenish blue, sometimes shifting from one side of the formation to the other."

Project Blue Book's immediate denial was as punctual as it was futile: A spokesman said that no radar sighting of unknown flying objects had been confirmed. It was suggested that "the objects observed may have been the planet Jupiter or the stars Rigel, Capella, Betelgeuse, or Aldebaran, which were visible. At the time of the reported sightings, the azimuth and elevation of the reported sightings supports this preliminary conclusion." A planet that frequently and rapidly changes color and whose radar image splits and resembles objects propelling themselves through the sky? That is indeed a novel occurrence and should not fail to interest astronomers, even in these times of telescopes and extragalactic mysteries.

Three days later, as the result of a "very bad occurrence," the gray eminences of Project Blue Book were flatly contradicted by the personnel of the U.S. Air Force bases at Keweenaw Field in Houghton, Michigan. (Perhaps someone, out of regard for truth, compromised his career.) A "solid radar contact" had been established with about ten UFOs flying at hypersonic speed (9300 mph?) at a high altitude over Lake Superior and going in the direction of Canada. The incident was also reported to the U.P.I. press service, which immediately sent it out over its teletypes.

The official explanation, "a flight of weather balloons," took advantage of the simultaneous appearance of other objects that had been seen while "they hovered motionless or moved slowly, frequently changing direction, over several outlying sections of Minneapolis." This city is, in fact, the site of one of the largest American centers for the production and launching of the gigantic stratospheric weather balloons. But when seven of these phantom "weather balloons" were pursued by a jet in the sky over Duluth, they rapidly left the jet behind while it was flying at a speed exceeding a thousand miles an hour. Since when do the winds of the stratosphere blow with such terrible violence?

The curve of these appearances reached its peak during the night between August 2 and 3, and were concentrated over New England in particular. In fact, although not neglecting more distant states, such as Texas and California, the UFOs seemed to show a decided preference for the southern regions of New Hampshire, where, according to numerous inhabitants, they had flown over the local high-tension wires several times, perhaps in order to get recharged. This strange suspicion—strange but not impossible—subsequently led ufologists to launch a new case, called the "incident at Exeter" in honor of the small town where the greatest number of sightings took place, the last of which, on September 3, seemed to bring the display of luminous bodies and their mysterious operations to a close.[8]

After three months of intensive observations, which occurred with an almost regular daily rhythm, the number of sightings rapidly and progressively decreased as before. Project Blue Book's news release of October 27, 1965, which was got up with the public relations offices of the Pentagon, brilliantly solved the affair by referring to high-altitude exercises which had been carried out at that very time by the bombers of the Strategic Air Command (S.A.C.), and on a widespread "thermal inversion" produced by a thick layer of cold Canadian air which had crept between two warmer layers over the New England states. According to the Air Force experts, this natural phenomenon had the miraculous power of making the stars and planets seem to tremble in such a way as to give the impression that they were flying in the sky.

"They can stop kidding us now about there being no such things as 'flying saucers,'" the Fort Worth, Texas, Star Telegram rightfully protested. “And it’s going to take more than a statistical report on how many reported ‘saucers’ have turned out to be jets and weather balloons to convince us otherwise.”

Taking the lead from the insubordinate behavior of the Houghton radar operators, the Alameda, California, Times Star in turn commented in an indignant editorial: “. . . the Air Force spokesmen, whose job it is to explain away the seemingly improbable in terms of the commonplace, have been getting such a workout lately that either they are starting to break down or their superiors are finally coming to the conclusion that they are making the Air Force appear ridiculous.”

Notwithstanding a spate of such acid comments in the press, the Air Force did not budge an inch from the line to which it had always adhered. It was sure that its previous experience of mass psychology would be repeated. Experience had taught it that even the most incredible statements are forgotten by most people with the passing of time, together with the facts that prompted them, and those who are really skeptical can, in any case, think what they please.

AFTERTHOUGHTS AND NEW INVESTIGATIONS

The news release of February 1, 1966, taking advantage of the winter disappearance of the objects in order to implant the anti-UFO dogma decreed in high places ever more firmly in the minds of the American public, with almost saintly patience reiterated the old explanations (birds, balloons, airplanes, sputniks, meteorites, and so on) with consummate ability and the sober language of the hidden persuaders. But it was fated that all this art and craftiness would in the final analysis prove self-defeating.

With the coming of spring—specifically between March 20 and 23—renewed activity on the part of the UFOs again posed the same old dilemmas for the Americans. For the most part, the characteristics of the new sightings did not differ from those of the past summer and of the preceding years. The area, however, was restricted to the states of Michigan and Ohio, and one brash UFO went so far as to fly right over the Wright-

Patterson base, the permanent home of Project Blue Book, giving rise to no little hilarity among those who already harbored little esteem for the illustrious group.[9]

Without even waiting for the last UFO to disappear, the scientific consultant for the Air Force, Dr. Hynek, held a press conference in Detroit to "debunk" the events of the month.

Having conducted a personal investigation, he said, he felt it was certain that the wandering lights observed by more than fifty witnesses in the environs of Ann Arbor were nothing more than natural gases produced in the swampy ground; spring gases that burst into flame on contact with the oxygen of the air, causing will-o'-the-wisps of varying sizes. According to the investigator, proved hoaxes and false reports had also influenced a number of witnesses.

This hypothesis was not much more far-fetched than some of the others, and it too might have achieved its aim, but this time the decisive entry into the controversy of ufological associations—headed by the powerful N.I.C.A.P.—did not give the U.S. Air Force authorities the chance to shelve the affair so quickly.

The Republican congressman Gerald Ford proposed that a special congressional committee of investigation be set up, and the proposal added fuel to the already heated dispute between the press and the military, causing even Secretary of Defense McNamara and Chief of Staff General Wheeler to intervene and deny, with the full weight of their authority, the physical existence of the UFOs and quash the possibility of adding a civilian office to the one that had long been operating so efficiently within the Air Force.

However, perhaps Dr. Hynek had tired of blindly supporting the Air Force's strictly negative policy. Leaving aside the possibility of a wildly Machiavellian scheme to achieve exactly the opposite of what he claimed, the following August the magazine Science published an excerpt from an open letter from Dr. Hynek in which, reversing opinions that he had held for twenty years with regard to the UFOs, the scientist proposed that the problem be faced squarely once and for all.

Published in its entirety by the Saturday Evening Post of December 17, 1966, the contrite confession of the greatest

American UFO-phobe set forth the following four possible explanations:

1) are they hallucinations or hoaxes? If so, it must be proved, and given the present state of our understanding, it would be even more difficult to prove this than it would to prove the opposite;

2) are they military devices that someone is experimenting with? The affair has gone on for too long and has involved too many countries in every part of the world for this to be acceptable;

3) do they come from outer, even interstellar, space? This cannot be totally excluded, even if conclusive proof is lacking. "Some skeptics who scoff at reported UFO sightings often ask why the 'flying saucers' don't try to communicate with us. One answer might be: Why should they? We wouldn't try to communicate with a new species of kangaroo we might find in Australia; we would just observe the animals."

4) are we faced with a natural phenomenon that as yet defies our scientific knowledge? "Think how our knowledge of the universe has changed in 100 years. In 1866 we not only knew nothing about nuclear energy, we didn't even know that the atom had a nucleus. . . . Who can say what startling facts we will learn about our world in the next 100 years?"

Concluding this belated self-criticism, the scientist declared: "Although the Air Force has probably spent less on UFO's so far than it has on wastebaskets, I realize that it is impractical to expect the service to set up a costly 'flying-saucer' surveillance system across the country. . . . [But] all of the valuable data that we have accumulated—good reports from all over the world—must be computerized so that we can rapidly compare new sightings with old and trace patterns of UFO behavior. . . . I recommend that every police chief in the country make sure that at least one of his squad cars carries in its glove compartment a camera loaded with color film."

Dr. Hynek emphasized his views on a "controversial subject": "During all of my years of association with the Air Force, I have never seen any evidence for the charge about UFO's most often leveled against the service: that there is deliberate cover-up of knowledge of space visitors to prevent the public from panicking. The entire history of the Air Force and the UFO's can be understood only if we realize that the Pentagon has never believed that UFO's could be anything novel, and it still doesn't. The working hypothesis of the Air Force has been that the stimulus behind every UFO report . . . is a misidentification of a conventional object or a natural phenomenon. It is just as simple as that.

"Now, after a delay of 18 years, the Air Force and American science are about to try for the first time, really, to discover what, if anything, we can believe about 'flying saucers.'"

THE UNIVERSITY OF COLORADO INVESTIGATION

Would the $313,000 rushed through to the University of Colorado as a special fund for a new series of investigations furnish an answer that would satisfy both the demands of the Pentagon and the curiosity of American taxpayers?

Such was the sum that the Air Force allocated to the University to finance a new program of scientific research on the UFO question along the lines suggested by Dr. Hynek, to study future sightings, to reexamine the 10,147 reports accumulated by Project Blue Book, and to clear up—if possible—the 646 cases that remained unexplained.[10]

News release No. 847–66 of October 7, 1966 (Title: Air Force Selects University of Colorado to Investigate Unidentified Objects Reports) faithfully reflects the orders of the then Air Force Secretary, Harold Brown, but it does not clear up in any convincing way the real reasons for the liquidation of the Air Force's Project Blue Book. For better or worse, Project Blue Book had been functioning for almost twenty years, had been under attack several times in the past (when people were ingenuous enough to demand the truth), and had never been seriously strengthened even after the attacks. Why had it been ditched for a new organism that was completely unprepared simply because it was new?[11]

Nor was the reason the Air Force gave for choosing the University of Colorado at Boulder in the least convincing: it is ". . . an institution of sufficient prestige to enjoy the faith of the public"—and, obviously, escape the absurdity of what was considered an unimportant matter.

The length of the contract between the Air Force and the University of Colorado was fixed at fifteen months, extendable if warranted, and at its expiration a detailed report was to be written and presented—at the specific request of the Department of Defense—for final critical evaluation by a group of eminent specialists designated by the National Academy of Sciences to attest to the "validity of the methods and means used in the investigations." Was this a ready-made alibi in order to camouflage possible—and not unlikely—failure? High-level censorship? Or was it an attempt to set up a highly authoritative and final liquidation of the UFOs?

Some biographical data on the leaders of the new investigation, which some ufologists proposed calling—rather prematurely—"Operation Clearance," sheds some light on this cloudy affair.

The organizer of the enterprise seems to have been Dr. J. Allen Hynek, director of the Lindheimer Astronomical Research Center and chairman of the Astronomy Department at Northwestern University at Evanston, Illinois, "Scientific Consultant to the U.S. Air Force," and "Special Investigator of UFOs," again for the Air Force. It was he who, as we said, suffered a sort of scientific "crise de conscience" over the attitude that the Air Force had always maintained and still maintains on the thorny problem of UFOs (an attitude which is, in brief, frivolous and which Dr. Hynek himself had energetically supported for some twenty years).

The sixty-four-year-old Dr. Edward U. Condon was appointed director of the new project. Dr. Condon had formerly been a member of the staff of the nuclear center at Los Alamos for the development of the first atomic bombs.[12] Professor of physics and astrophysics at the University of Colorado, Condon immediately put all his cards on the table when he was appointed to investigate the UFOs, stating that he would not be able to dedicate all his time to the project; hence he should be considered only as its "scientific director." In fact, he continued to exercise his old and new functions in an office in the Joint Institute Laboratory for Astrophysics, of which he had been an influential member for some time.

The job of principal assistant and actual coordinator of the entire program—the project coordinator—was, therefore, assigned to Dr. Robert G. Low, formerly Assistant Dean of the University of Colorado Graduate School. Some hundred scientists chosen from the University of Colorado, other American universities, and various governmental and civil agencies scattered throughout the country would be working under him, though with complete freedom of action. When the "UFO Probe Committee" was installed in the old Woodbury Hall building it included the following members:

—three psychologists (Drs. Stuart W. Cook, David Saunders, and Michael Wertheimer), all from the University of Colorado;

—one astrophysicist (Dr. Franklin Roach) of the Environmental Science Services);

—one astrogeophysicist (Dr. William Blumen, a Fellow of the University of Colorado);

—one physicist (Dr. Joseph H. Rush of the National Center for Atmospheric Research High Altitude Observatory);

—two University of Colorado graduate students in psychology and one in liberal arts;

—two secretaries and one typist.

The total full-time membership of the staff, including leaders, amounted to fourteen actual members, not one of whom was skilled in the fundamental technical disciplines that concern aviation, such as aerodynamics, aircraft construction, electronic engineering, chemistry, and applied physics.[13]

Failure to enlist the aid of such experts certainly signified that the promoters of "Clearance" still believed that the UFOs were—or should be, for the public—unknown natural phenomena or flights of the imagination.

Aside from the fact that after years of tedious repetition the strings used in manipulating some of the tricks were becoming visible, it was clear that—despite the enthusiastic endorsement of the new committee by the American and world press—we should not have expected great things or sensational revelations from it. The hope early went glimmering that the Colorado project might finally acquaint everyone with everything—or at least part of it—that only a very few have known for some time.[14]

Now that the contract has expired, nothing will be easier than for the Air Force—after simply denying for more than twenty years that the phenomenon exists—to stop deriding the easy (because indemonstrable) explanation of a putative extraterrestrial origin for the UFOs, and even to accept the existence of some new or at least unexplained type of atmospheric phenomenon, in order to supply the required though meaningless sop for the millions of American taxpayers who are disturbed by the fantasies and foolishness of ufologists, and so to protect the sacred principle of "freedom of the press."

A WAITING GAME?

When we examine the whole of the many years' work that has gone on backstage, we see that the behavior of the various American authorities—especially at the time the first investigations covering the period from 1947 to 1955 were carried out—has frequently been contradictory and sometimes, but only in appearance, even incoherent.

For a short time, in 1954, the alternation of hasty explanations with subsequent reversals was even taken to be an astute plan to cover up indefinitely the secret that the UFOs were American-built, or as a clever way of gradually informing the world that they were indeed standing on the runways of secret national airfields. The ridiculous references to the inhabitants of Mars or Venus, to the Uranians, or to star people made by third parties, or certain scattered allusions to the possibility that the UFOs might have come from behind the Iron Curtain (the impossibility of which was obviously discounted to begin with)—these things were taken to be part of a game by a complex bureau whose aim was to encourage friends and warn enemies by frightening the public. The protestations of technical people, or their refusal to make statements, was, moreover, interpreted to mean that the invention was in the process of being perfected.

Otherwise, it was said, how could one explain the inexplicable calmness which the leaders of the country had on several occasions exhibited in the face of an extraordinary phenomenon that was upsetting the whole nation?

For example, when reporters asked an official at the control tower of a civil airport in Washington in July 1952 why he had not alerted the antiaircraft defense center when the machines first approached, he answered drily: "We were too busy with more important matters, and besides those 'things' don't harm anybody"!

A high Air Force official, commenting on the formation of Project Blue Book, declared in effect: We do not know the causes of the observed phenomena, but we are convinced that they represent absolutely no threat to our country. They have been around for five years and they have never struck. If they are man-made, the men who make them are aeronautically superior to us. If it turns out that they are enemy aircraft, we will capture them.[15]

Aircraft of huge size, with no recognizable system of operation, perhaps (or not even "perhaps") with men on board, from some admittedly unknown country or world (friend? neutral? enemy?), capable of rising vertically with dizzying speed and flying horizontally at speeds unmatched by even the fastest known types of jets—was none of this even a potential threat? On the face of it this view, if taken literally, is an absurdity.

In fact, these unknown machines roamed far and wide, undisturbed, over the entire United States, and not infrequently remained for lengthy periods over or in the neighborhood of military bases, governmental scientific laboratories, and centers for nuclear research. Yet anyone who is at all familiar with air routes and who travels by air knows quite well how much governmental red tape and regulations—certainly partly justified on the grounds of everyone's safety—must be put up with by anyone who wants to go, not to the Antipodes, but merely from one local airport to another.

Thus one cannot a priori exclude the possibility that, while unimportant military offices were stumbling around in the dark, Air Force top brass was far better informed than it would have had people believe, at least from 1952 on. Nor can one exclude the possibility that it might finally have got wind of something through secret service channels (though it could not copy the craft for lack of detailed information or of specific technologies). Nor the possibility that, through diplomatic channels (a report made to a confidential Blue Book?), the builders of the UFOs (for no other reason than the need to make a rendezvous in the sky over the capital, as in the summer of 1952) had secretly notified some high-ranking person—let us say the President of the United States or someone in his immediate circle—to avoid precipitating some dangerous anti-aircraft activity, which, in fact, never occurred either in Washington or at the more heavily armed missile bases which the UFOs overflew a number of times.[16]

PROJECT BEACON

And this is not all. Beginning in June 1952, Air Force investigating authorities seemed particularly interested in the intense, changing lights that usually accompanied the moving objects, rather than in the saucers themselves—which leads some of the most highly qualified experts to suspect that the United States was already aware of where the saucers came from and that it especially wanted to glean some useful data on the type and chemical composition of the formidable fuel used by the UFOs.[17]

During this period, while the Project Blue Book investigations were getting under way, the Air Force Chief of Staff, Hoyt S. Vandenberg, did, in fact, have the Laboratory of Applied Physics at the University of Los Angeles construct a spectroscopic motion-picture camera which could photograph the flight of an unknown object and provide an instant analysis of its light energy.

This project, which went under the name of "Beacon," envisaged setting up two hundred such cameras at an equal number of observation posts established along the routes that the machines most frequently traveled, principally in the southwestern area of the United States. Seventy-five American military bases abroad were also supposed to receive these UFO-detectors.

The final report on this highly specialized investigation, which was slated to come out in December of 1953, was never published. Was it perhaps, as American ufologists maintained, because no solid information was obtained (1953 was, in fact, a year that was almost totally devoid of American sightings)? Or was it, as the French ufologist A. Michel wrote, because it was judged opportune to draw the curtain of military secrecy over the results that had been obtained?

Neither hypothesis corresponds to the truth. Captain Ruppelt himself reported that the apparatus, which was completed after a year of study, "wouldn't satisfactorily photograph a million-candle-power flare at 450 yards. The cameras themselves were all right, but in combination with the gratings, they were no good." Which leads one to suspect that the project never really got under way, at least to the extent publicized by the press.

That secret information reached the Pentagon, on the other hand, seems to be indicated by the following enigmatic episode, also revealed by Captain Ruppelt after he had taken the bitter step of handing in his resignation:

"In some aspects the Washington National [Airport] sightings [of July-August 1952] could be classed as a surprise . . . but in other ways they weren't. A few days prior to the incident a scientist, from an agency that I can't name, and I were talking about the build-up of reports along the east coast of the United States.[18] We talked for about two hours, and I was ready to leave when he said that he had one last comment to make—a prediction. From his study of the UFO reports that he was getting from Air Force Headquarters, and from discussions with his colleagues, he said that he thought that we were sitting right on top of a big keg full of loaded flying saucers. "Within the next few days,' he told me, and I remember that he punctuated his slow, deliberate remarks by hitting the desk with his fist, 'they're going to blow up and you're going to have the granddaddy of all UFO sightings. The sighting will occur in Washington or New York,' he predicted—'probably Washington.'"

And they did, in fact, fly over Washington, passing back and forth a number of times.

Finally, it is certain that if any one of the three American service branches—Air Force, Navy, or Army—really had had those flying machines in operation, no military office, bureau, or committee—every one of which is a direct extension of the Pentagon—would ever have set foot on the treacherous ground of speculation, and then of dispute. They would have cut short all speculation by the press at the start with a dry "No comment!" The United States would never have been subjected to the bitter, repeated humiliation of unsuccessful satellite launchings, because then it could have quietly shelved the little artificial moons altogether, or put them in orbit with different and less chancy methods. And, viewing the matter with the advantage of hindsight, we can say that what is astonishing is the rash attitude taken by the responsible agencies, which at the time of the first sightings perhaps actually did tremble at the idea that those phantom aircraft secretly bore the emblem of the Red Star.

Once it was clear that there was no threat and the true nature of the sightings became evident, there was no sensible alternative for these agencies but to issue something like the following communiqué—which, unfortunately they did not do: The authorities of the United States are cognizant of the origin and purpose of the so-called UFOs. They are perfectly harmless mechanical constructions, and it is absolutely forbidden to any pilot, military or civilian, to interfere in their activity. The authorities could then have curtly refused to answer further requests for clarification, promising to do so at "the proper time." Such are the demands of military secrecy, that incurable but unfortunately necessary disease which retards progress by preventing scientific exchange among nations, forces the inventive genius of man into the shadows, and tempts him to blackmail and treason.

NOTES

1. As long ago as 1952 the editors of the London aeronautical magazine Flight (see No. 2300) bemoaned the lack of high-speed rocket interceptors in Britain's air defense. They complained principally of alleged operational deficiencies in the R.A.F. and deplored the shelving of the Miles supersonic plane, the failure to develop the Vickers and Fairey antiaircraft rockets, and the overemphasis on preparing the Class "V" superbombers ("Victor," "Vulcan," and "Valiant"). Nevertheless, these complaints of British experts were only a very modest skirmish in the huge storm that had been brewing for some time.

2. See ANSAER No. 96 in ANSA: Notiziario Aeronautico (Rome, January 21, 1957).

3. Cf. the statements of Undersecretary Strachey in the House of Commons (session of March 12, 1946). In addition, from the 1946 White Paper we learn that of the £411-million British budget, about £30 million were assigned to the Ministry of Supply and an additional £100 million were assigned to the Air Ministry for production and various services.

4. After welcoming the wildest explanations, the European press, which only a few months before had opened its columns to extensive coverage of the mysterious apparitions, did an abrupt about-face, printed the authoritative American denials, and seconded them warmly. Most curious of all the interpretations of the "myth" was that suggested by the French weekly L'Illustration. In the autumn of 1952 the magazine had unsuccessfully tried to get in touch with the first American eyewitness, and in 1954 it tried to at least get hold of "a copy of The Coming of the Saucers of which Kenneth Arnold is allegedly the author" but still without success. The French writer then came to these surprising conclusions: "These facts are somewhat suspicious and have led us to form three different hypotheses: 1) Arnold made a mistake in good faith, and his silence means that he wants both the mistake and himself forgotten; 2) he deliberately lied out of a mania for exhibitionism or a desire to create the biggest hoax of the century;
3) he does not in fact exist as a person of flesh and blood. The origin of a myth, he is himself a myth. Behind his name is concealed some military body or organization that has 'invented’ the whole story for mysterious reasons. There are, indeed, some who lean toward this last hypothesis—which injects a new mystery into the greater mystery of the flying saucers.”

5. This is a foolish notion. Exceedingly well-founded rumors and evidence of some time ago make it certain that beginning in 1946 several models of electromagnetic cannons—captured in Schlosscranzbach, Germany—have since been developed at a secret experimental center belonging to the U.S. Army. See Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-committee, Geschäft für Gerätebau: Electric Guns (Report No. XXXI-59, London, H.M.S.O., 1945), p. 19; “‘Toothpaste’ Shell May Beat Atom,” Union Jack (Southern Italy Edition, June 19, 1946), p. 1; and Col. L. Simons, “Electromagnetic Artillery,” German Scientific Establishments (Report PB 19849, Brooklyn, 1947). No clear details, however, have as yet leaked out. Here, then, is a “democratic” secret whose life also spans two decades—and it remains unfathomed. Nevertheless, it is probable that the mysterious “green suns of Arizona”—mistaken for a new type of flying saucer in 1951—are the sole visible manifestations of those experiments. See R. Vesco, “I getti di metallo fuso antiaerei,” Rivista Militare (Rome, Ministry of Defense: Army, September 1954), pp. 910–921.

6. See Lt.-Col. L. J. Tacker, Flying Saucers and the U.S. Air Force: The Official Air Force Story (New York, Van Nostrand, 1960), pp. 136–161.

7. Isolated UFOs had, however, already previously appeared elsewhere. On July 3, 1965, the military and scientific personnel of several Argentine, Chilean, and British naval bases in the Antarctic saw and photographed a large, circular, shining body that passed over at a low altitude. Before disappearing over the horizon, it had changed speed and direction several times, circling several miles away from the tender Punta Medanos, whose compasses temporarily “went crazy,” indicating intense electromagnetic interference which undoubtedly came from the object. There was official confirmation from Argentine and Chilean sources. Photographs were not released. (Cf. Frank Edwards, Flying Saucers—Serious Business, New York, Bantam Books, 1967), pp. 160–183.

8. See John G. Fuller, Incident at Exeter (New York, Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1966). It is doubtless possible, and even probable, that a substantial portion of the sightings reported can be explained as the spontaneous production of local electroatmospheric phenomena caused by high-tension transmissions which were present in the areas of the principal sightings, as suggested by several experts of the Westinghouse Research Laboratories. See Philip J. Klass, "Plasma Theory May Explain Many UFOs," Aviation Week and Space Technology, vol. 85, no. 8, New York (August 22, 1966), pp. 48–61, and "Letters: UFO Theory," Aviation Week and Space Technology, vol. 85, no. 15, New York (October 10, 1966), p. 130. But the production of corona effects and of discharges of the globular type caused by temporary overloading in the distributive network —due to damage or testing—does not eliminate the certainty of the fleeting presence over the region of flying machines that were unknown because radically dissimilar in design and in behavior to ordinary airplanes. There really seems to be no reason why the two phenomena could not coexist and sometimes appear simultaneously, without thereby mutually eliminating one another. Moreover, the cycle of summer sightings of 1965 was not limited to the territories of the United States. Flights of UFOs also took place over France, Portugal, Spain, Argentina, Chile, Peru, Brazil, and in the vicinity of the Australian airport of Canberra. The skies of northern Mexico —which had on several occasions been traversed by UFOs— were also crossed by a formation of "fiery balls," which at a certain point seemed to converge in an orderly fashion toward a large cigar-shaped craft at the head of the silent, lofty procession. This sighting and maneuver remain inexplicable, but they had previously appeared in the annals of ufology (cf., for example, the French sightings of Oloron and Gaillac in 1952). The Air Force has several times stated that "skepticism is healthy" when dealing with UFO reports. True, but only if it is not transformed into a convenient screen and the screen into an outrageous abuse.

9. On March 27, 1966, a highway patrolman, G. Landversicht, having observed a strange, shining object in the sky heading toward the air base, took several feet of motion-picture film and handed it over to his direct superiors. The frames were then examined by experts of the Air Technical Intelligence Center, which maintained the most absolute silence on them. If the UFOs do not exist, why not make these innocuous frames (preferably without biased mutilating or retouching) public property?

10. Cf. Luke Frost, "A Cloak of Respectability: $313,000," Flying Saucers—UFO Reports, No. 2 (New York, Dell Publishing Co., 1967), pp. 26–29. The director of Project Blue Book, Major Hector Quintanilla, was to fulfill only the functions of "special military consultant" to the new committee, since the whole matter had been handed over to civilians. In addition, he was instructed to place at the disposition of the investigators the whole body of reports gathered in 1966 (of which there were 1060, the highest figure after the 1501 sightings caused by the so-called "mass hysteria" of 1952), as well as whatever reports might be received by the military office in 1967.

11. The proposal to entrust the task to civilians was apparently advanced as early as 1965 by Major General E. B. Lebailly, the director of the U.S. Air Force Information Bureau, for two seemingly valid reasons: 1) to quash criticism from the public and press regarding the behavior of the Air Force, which according to him was wrongfully accused of keeping the most interesting news secret; 2) to dissipate growing suspicions that the Air Force was developing special, top-secret starships for the War in Space. His suggestion, which was examined and favorably received by the Air Force's Scientific Advisory Board, was promptly translated by the eager board into the "recommendation" that "an independent UFO investigation unit" be set up—independent (at least in theory) from the Air Force but coinciding in its "declared" aims, perhaps in homage to the mechanical principle that the vectors of two equal but opposing forces (in this case, civilians and the military) cancel one another and their common origin (in this case, the UFOs) no longer has any direction. However, it was specified that the investigation—which was then entrusted to the University of Colorado—wouldn't kill off Project Blue Book. The reason given for this duplication of effort was: "The Air Force will continue to collect reports of UFO sightings, as in the past, unless persons are reluctant to work through USAF channels and prefer direct contact with the University of Colorado scientists. Under a regulation issued last month by Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. John P. McConnell, the USAF's Foreign Technology Div. at Wright-Patterson AFB, Ohio, is authorized to 'use other government agencies, private industrial companies and contractor personnel to assist in analyzing and evaluating UFO reports as necessary.'" See "Colorado to Study UFOs," Aviation Week and Space Technology, vol. 85, no. 16, New York (October 17, 1966). Everything was clear, everything was arranged with the greatest care and started off for a happy ending, but it would remain to be seen what hidden role would be played by competent bureaus of the Central Intelligence Agency, given the precedent of the "Robertson Report." In 1953 the Air Force called a top-level scientific meeting on the UFO problem, which had become particularly acute after the incidents of the summer of 1952. The meeting was presided over by Dr. H. P. Robertson of the California Institute of Technology, and gave rise to many animated debates conducted on a "very concrete level," but—according to the subsequent testimony of one of the participants, the physicist James E. McDonald of the University of Arizona, and there is no sound reason to doubt him—the minutes of the gathering and even the final report were "classified" at the specific request of the C.I.A. Cf. "Dr. Condon Diagnoses the UFOs—Will He Unravel the Baffling Riddle?" UFOs '67, No. 1, 1967 (New York, K.M.R. Publications), pp. 36–39.

12. In 1948 he was investigated by the House Un-American Activities Committee. Then, cleared of all charges against him, he resigned from the post of Director of the National Bureau of Standards and joined the Corning Glass Works as a civilian scientist, where he was part of a team that developed cones for atomic missiles and heat-refracting screens for space capsules.

13. This omission is rather significant because it forces to mind a sort of aphorism that has always been dear to high-ranking officers of the Air Force. The aphorism makes plain the tacit connivance between those officers and the world of a certain self-satisfied branch of science. It goes as follows: Astronomers, astrophysicists, and their assistants are the only people really qualified to express an opinion on the subject of UFOs. (Cf. Lt. Col. Lawrence J. Tacker, Flying Saucers and the U.S. Air Force.) Now the privilege of taking part in this "monologue" is apparently also extended to experts in psychology.

14. Once again, in order to quell the doubt, curiosity, or fear of the "man in the street," would nearly a third of a million dollars be spent just in order to go through the motions of an investigation? So it would appear, according to certain authoritative program specifications. Did not Dr. Condon himself perhaps candidly declare just before taking on the job that when the contract expired the mystery of the UFOs might still not be completely solved despite the best efforts? And hadn't the Secretary of the Air Force perhaps imprudently revealed his hidden intentions when he made clear that the choice of the University of Colorado was suggested above all by its "proximity to the famous National Center for Atmospheric Research (N.C.A.R.) and to the Research Headquarters of the Environmental Science Services Administration, organizations specializing in research on the properties of the natural environment in which man lives, including in particular the physical characteristics of the atmosphere and of outlying Space"? According to Mr. Brown, these organizations could thus furnish "tremendous help" to the Boulder investigators. . . .

15. An opinion and a confidence that is much more widespread among the upper ranks of the Air Force than ufologists think or say they think. When asked to express his confidential opinion on the UFOs, Chief of Staff General Twining gave a halfbrusque, half-facetious reply to the pilots of the Amarillo Air Force Base in Texas on May 15, 1954: "Even if they did come from Mars we would not be afraid of them!" Then he made clear that he did not seriously believe either in explorers from Mars or in the existence of the "so-called UFOs."

16. This fact is all the more disconcerting since, according to Captain Ruppelt, any attempt to intercept—or better, to approach—a UFO by means of jet fighters entailed an average expenditure of about $2000 per air hour, with absolutely negative results because of the manifestly inferior maneuvering ability of the pursuers. A volley of radio-guided earth-to-air missiles or seek-destroy air-to-air rockets would have cost much less than the countless futile efforts to learn something about the discs by sending up interceptors and much less than the money that would probably be wasted on the civilian program now under way. In any case it would surely have downed the UFO, and experts could then have examined it on the ground with all the care that circumstances demanded. In 1944 the English "reconstructed" the V-2 torpedo-rocket found in the vicinity of Baeckedo by patiently reassembling the more than ten thousand fragments. The Swedish air force experts who found it had previously succeeded in reconstructing the gigantic rocket on paper. In regard to the U-2 spy plane piloted by the American flyer Powers, even though it was flying at an altitude of more than 54,000 feet, the Soviets reacted in a rather harsh but extremely profitable manner: one well-aimed shot. And by piecing together the various bits of wreckage, they also "reconstructed" the evidence. People in aeronautical circles uncontaminated by the ufological craze are asking why on earth the Americans have not taken a similarly resolute and drastic but definitive step with regard to the UFOs? Politesse toward our Brothers from Space? Apparently not, for the military authorities have never evidenced the slightest belief in their existence. Fear of diplomatic complications which would follow the shooting down of a craft that might turn out to be Russian? Even this should not have stopped them from intervening against the invaders of their air space, especially in view of the fact that they so decisively met the much more serious problem of Cuban-Soviet missile bases. And then, since the Russians did not stand on ceremony in the U-2 case, there is no reason why the Americans should not do likewise. Ignorance of the real nature of the UFOs? Given their potential danger, this should have been all the more reason to take any steps that would clarify matters. Whoever feels himself threatened by an obscure danger attacks first, if he is able. And then? . . . And then one does not shoot at "strangers" who are friends through ancient racial ties, even if the political, economic, and military bonds between Americans and British are getting looser and looser. It has long been the custom to develop one's military secrets—or potential secrets—jealously and in private, revealing them to a friendly nation only when war changes friend into ally. These are almost metaphysical subtleties, but no other motive stands up to the most elementary criticism. Besides, the only report of an armed attack against the UFOs was never confirmed, even semiofficially, by the appropriate Air Force offices. We refer to the alleged communiqué issued by the head of the U.S. Air Force Defense Headquarters-D in Tokyo on May 9, 1953, quoted by an English ufologist, in which he says that "in recent weeks our ships and planes have observed numerous unidentified flying objects. In pursuing them we got a line on their course, which permitted us to draw some conclusions regarding their take-off and landing bases. One of these craft [without crew and radio-controlled?] was hit by one of our planes armed with special equipment, and went down in the ocean off Tinian Island in the archipelago of the Mariannas." Even if authentic, and there are grave doubts on the matter, this operation apparently was transformed into a chase without any prey!

17. Without neglecting, of course, the aerodynamic and mechanical aspects of the flight of UFOs. We do not know what actual means the U.S. Air Force uses to conduct its secret investigations but one presumes that everything the press suggests today (with the exception of the firing of antiaircraft rockets) has already long since been put in motion without the public or ufologists ever having been informed of the fact or of the results obtained. As Captain G. H. Oldenburg—an official of the Information Service of the Air Force base at Langley, Va.—declared in no uncertain terms on February 13, 1958: “to make public the data gathered on UFOs is contrary to Air Force interests and regulations.” Cf L. Jerome Stanton, “Science vs. Saucers,” Flying Saucers, UFO Reports, no. 2 (New York, 1967), pp. 40–44.

18. The institution that could not then be named was, in all probability, the RAND Corporation (i.e., Research and Development Corporation), a civilian organization of a very high scientific level that does every kind of research and consulting work for the U.S. Air Force (from reports on technical progress in the U.S.S.R. to analysis of the “productivity” of national industries, from the selective control of projects to “confidential” investigations of the UFO problem), and that is cited in passing in the book by Lt. Col. L. J. Tacker (The Flying Saucers and the Air Force, p. 16). Tacker says, in fact, that the RAND Corporation was also involved in 1948—together with the Scientific Advisory Board, the Weather Bureau and the Federal Bureau of Investigation—in the first attempt to work out a preliminary scheme for an initial standardized approach to the problem. Moreover, Ruppelt himself recently indirectly confirmed this identification by also mentioning the RAND Corporation—“a group of high-level researchers that have nothing to do with the industrial company of the same name”—in a detailed review of saucer history (see Capt. Edward J. Ruppelt, “Why Don’t the Damn Things Swim So We Can Turn Them Over to the Navy?” The True Report on Flying Saucers (Greenwich, Conn., Fawcett Publications no. 1, 1967), pp. 36–39 and 57–74. The conclusions that the RAND experts reached in 1949—on the basis of the examination of 375 sightings selected by Dr. Hynek—did not differ from those which prevailed in Air Force circles: We have found nothing that seriously contradicts the simple, rational explanation of the various phenomena observed by the appearance of weather balloons, conventional airplanes, planets, meteorites, pieces of paper, optical illusions, hoaxes, psychopathic hallucinations, and so on. (One assumes, however, that these were the conclusions for the public and the press.) It seems that the RAND Corporation had also cooperated with Air Force Intelligence in the elaboration of the famous (and infamous, for the ufologists) internal regulation, Air Force Regulation 200-2, compiled at the order of the then Secretary of the Air Force H. Talbot, issued for the first time on August 26, 1953, and continuously brought up to date. A true masterpiece of precision, prudence, and foresight, which sometimes even verges on the superfluous. The reading of this regulation—which every ufologist should know by heart—is particularly interesting because it offers clear proof of the fact that the Air Force really does take the question very seriously, seeks to obtain detailed technical information on the behavior of the UFOs, and does not at all neglect sightings over foreign territories! The last version of the Regulation (AFR. 80-17 of September 19, 1966) was drawn up by the Air Force Research and Development Department rather than by Air Force Intelligence as in the past, and Paragraph Two (Objectives of the Program), Section A (General Provisions), states that the Air Force is interested in the UFOs in order to establish whether they constitute a possible threat for the United States and in order to take advantage of the technical and scientific data gained from the study of the related reports. The Regulation says it is possible that foreign countries may succeed in building aircraft with revolutionary shapes and means of propulsion. Consequently one must know what these means of propulsion are and, if possible, copy them and perhaps even improve on them, especially if it is established that they are of Soviet origin and hence particularly to be feared. Here then is one more irrefutable proof that the Air Force is engaged in a deliberate game of duplicity, one, it goes without saying, that was forced on it by the demands of national security but was conducted with means and methods that seem to us to be self-defeating or disproportionate to the case.

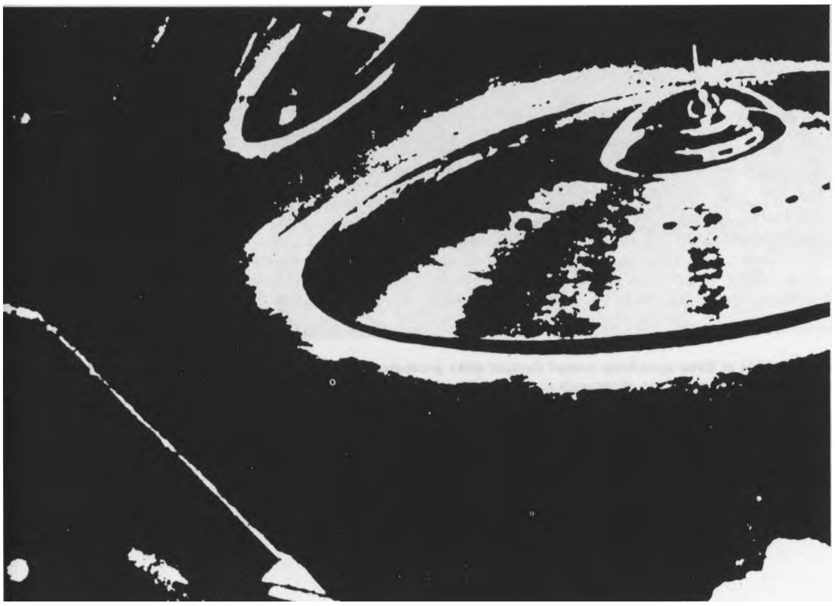
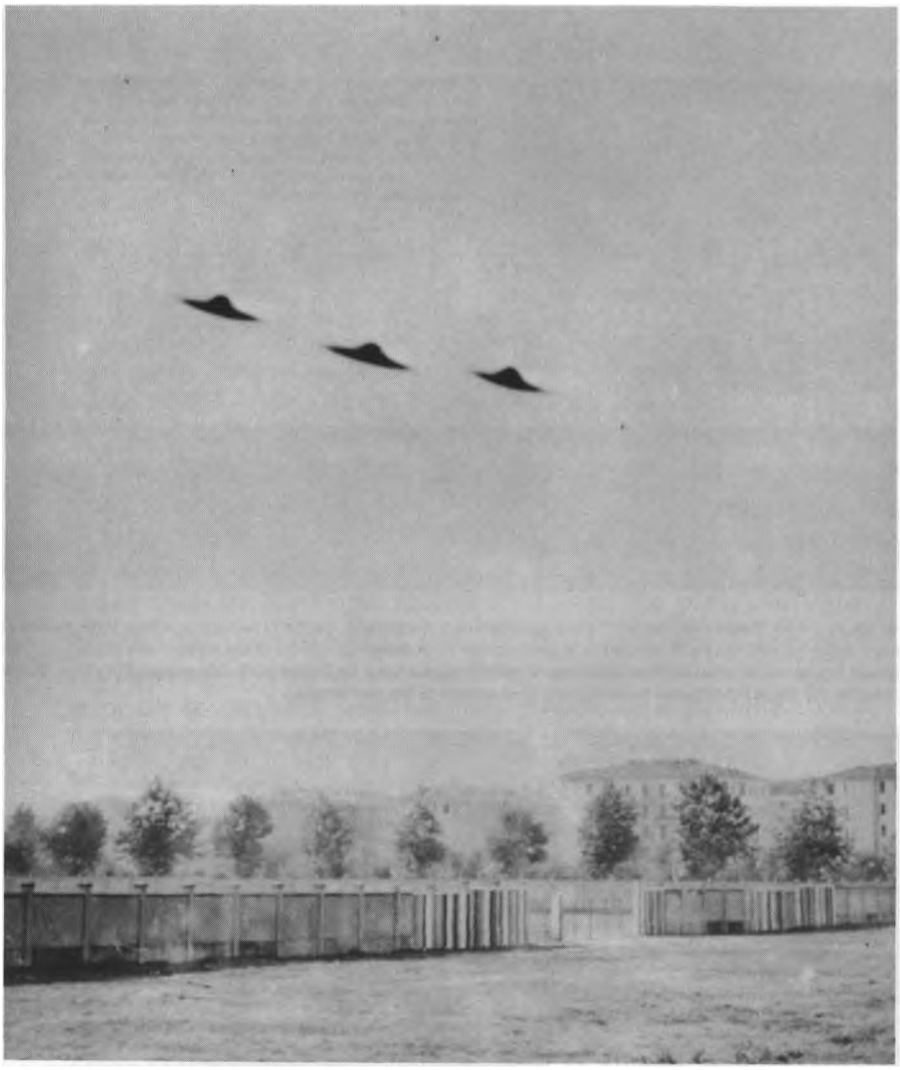
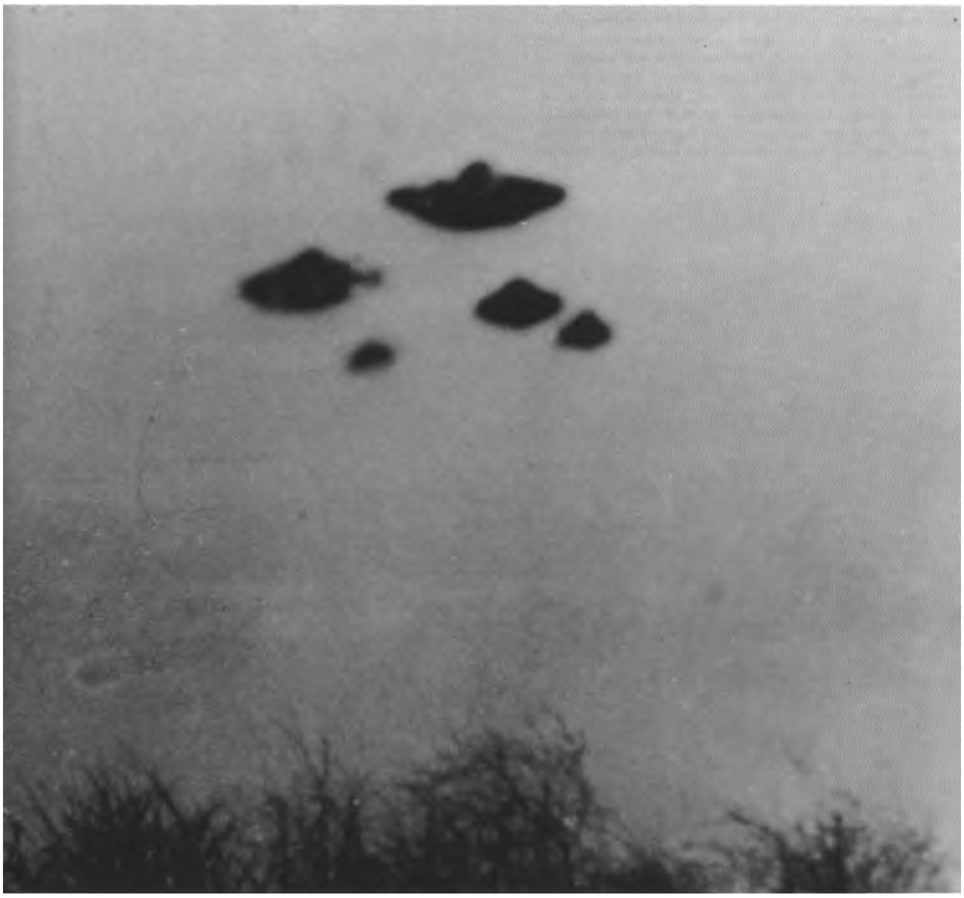
Above, the so-called "Darmstadt saucer," photographed near Darmstadt, Germany in August, 1953. With its low round dome and flattened disk shape, it seemed to supersede the older tower-type UFOs of the McMinnville kind. But as the decade advanced, a newer configuration also began to appear—the lenticular or double-convex UFO disk. Below is a page from an Air Force Intelligence manual alerting personnel to the new shape.



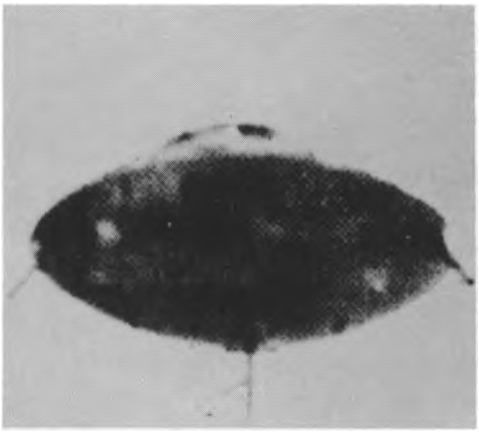


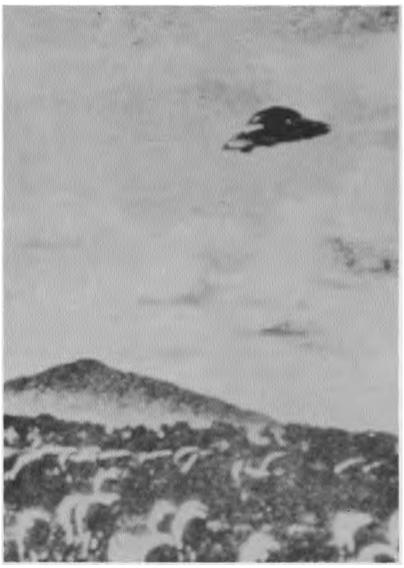
A formation flight of three apparently domed daylight disks photographed somewhere in Italy on September 26, 1960. Project Blue Book evaluated the photograph as a "hoax," but didn't say who perpetrated it or how it was done.



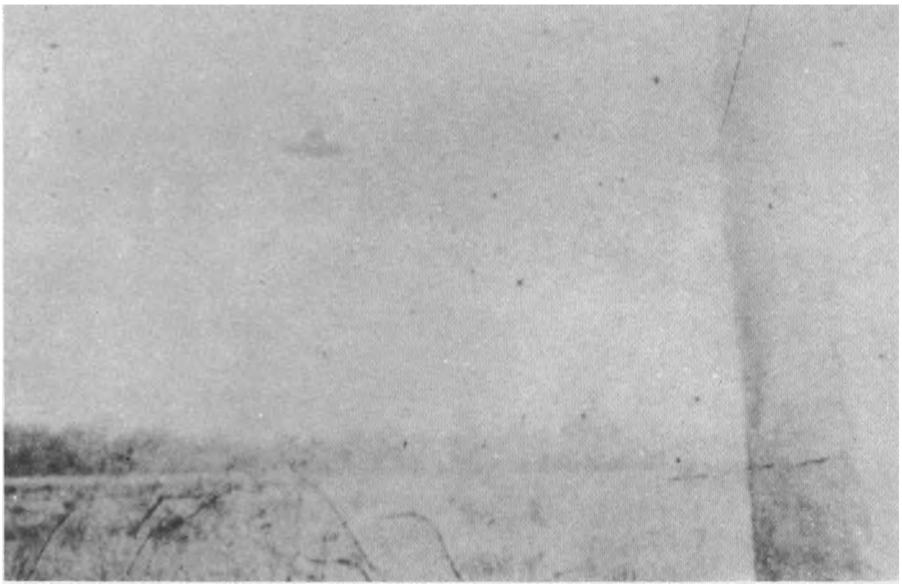
Five objects photographed on May 25, 1962 by Alexander Birch, a 14-year-old schoolboy from Sheffield, England with a cheap box camera. Alex happened to be in a field near his home with two of his friends when one of the boys began to shout excitedly and point skyward. The boys stared in amazement at five dull, black, disk-shaped objects that were hovering not far from them at 600 feet. After a few seconds, the boys' vision was dazzled by brilliant white blobs of light that appeared from behind the objects. At this point, Alex remembered his camera and snapped this picture. After about 20 seconds, the objects streaked away at terrific speed toward the northeast. At no time did the percipients hear any sound coming from the UFOs.

When Radio Officer T. Fogl aboard the SS Ramsay out of Vancouver spotted this UFO about 2:30 one afternoon in 1957, it was too far away for a good picture—about a mile from the ship. Eventually the disk came near enough and Fogl took this and later another picture. The object was seen to have a flat dome, no ports, was silver and black, and had tripod-like protuberances on its underside. Moving very slowly, the UFO stayed with the ship for a few minutes, then shot off with great speed toward the California coast.

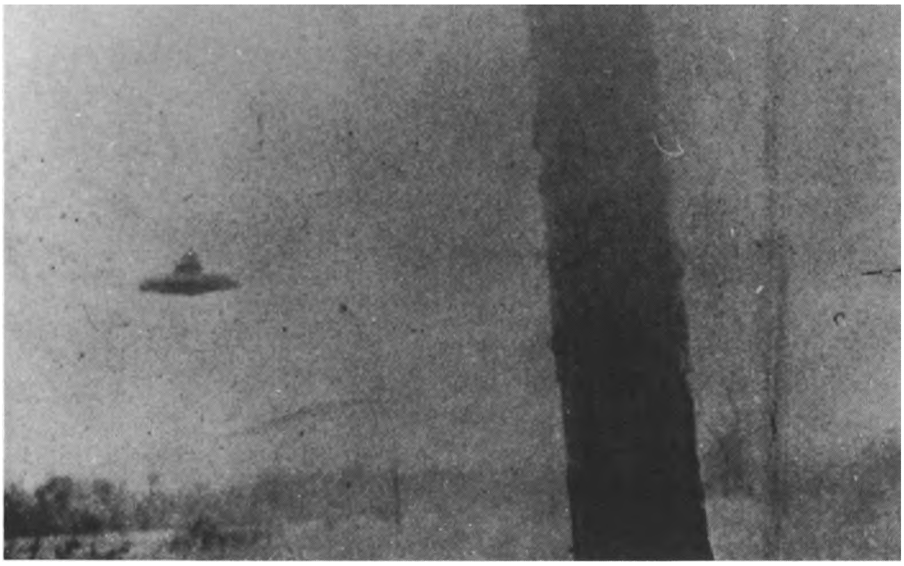


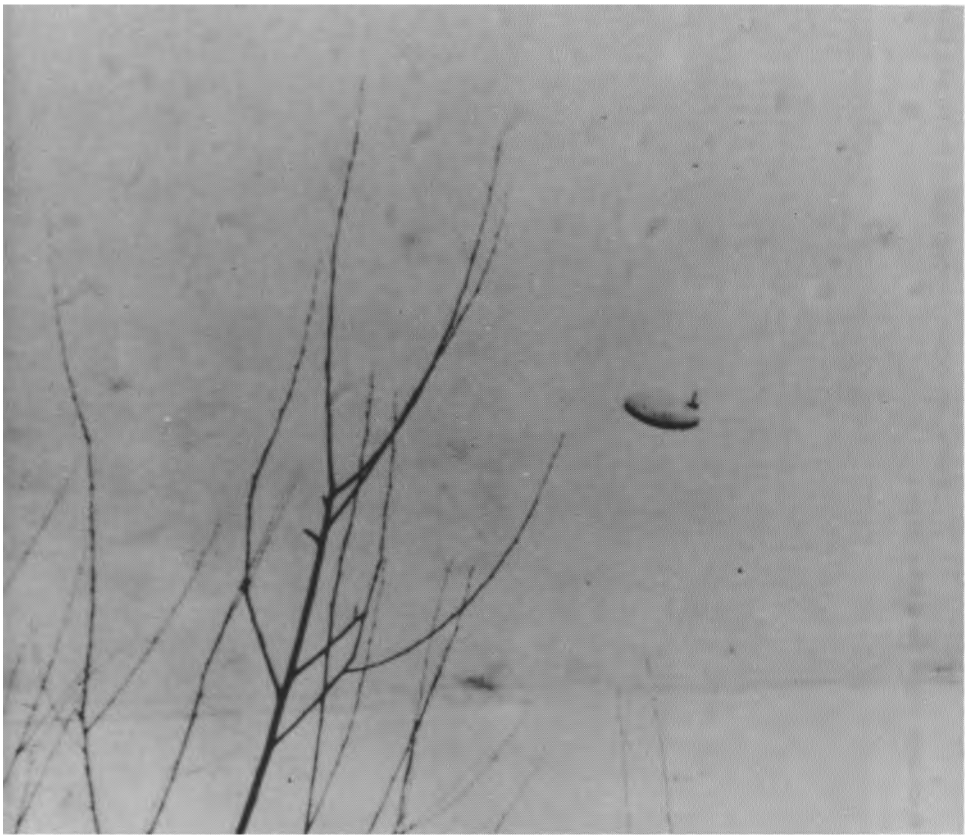


This domed daylight disk, snapped over grazing sheep, was photographed by W. D. Hall in Australia in 1954. It is known in UFO circles as the “Petrol Tank Saucer” because Hall remarked that it looked like a gasoline tank.



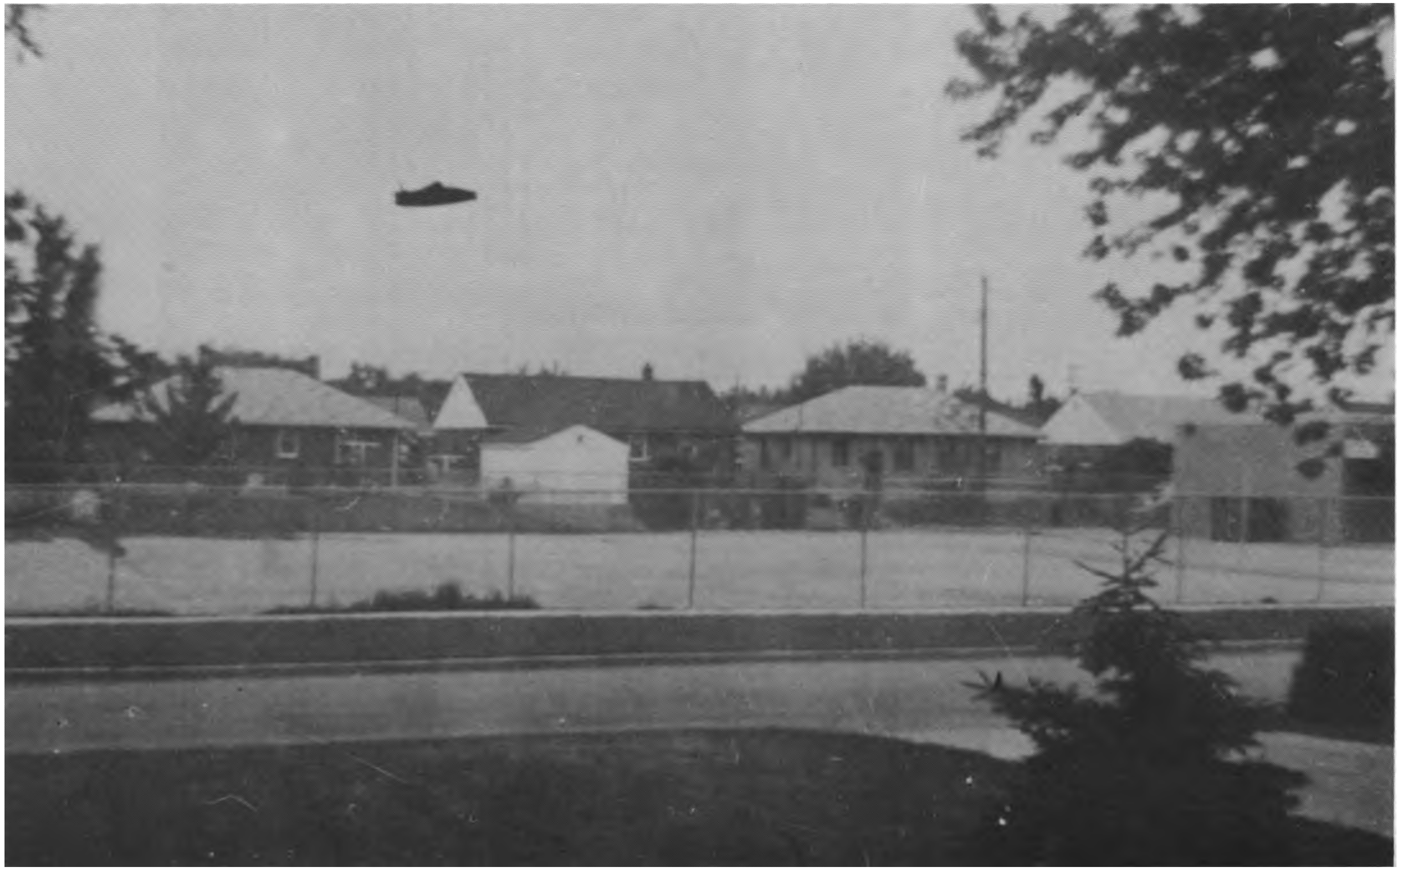
As dusk was descending over Milledgeville, Georgia on October 22, 1967, an unknown photographer took these two pictures of an apparently high-towered UFO. Object was approaching in upper photo, then was seen to hover as second photo was taken.



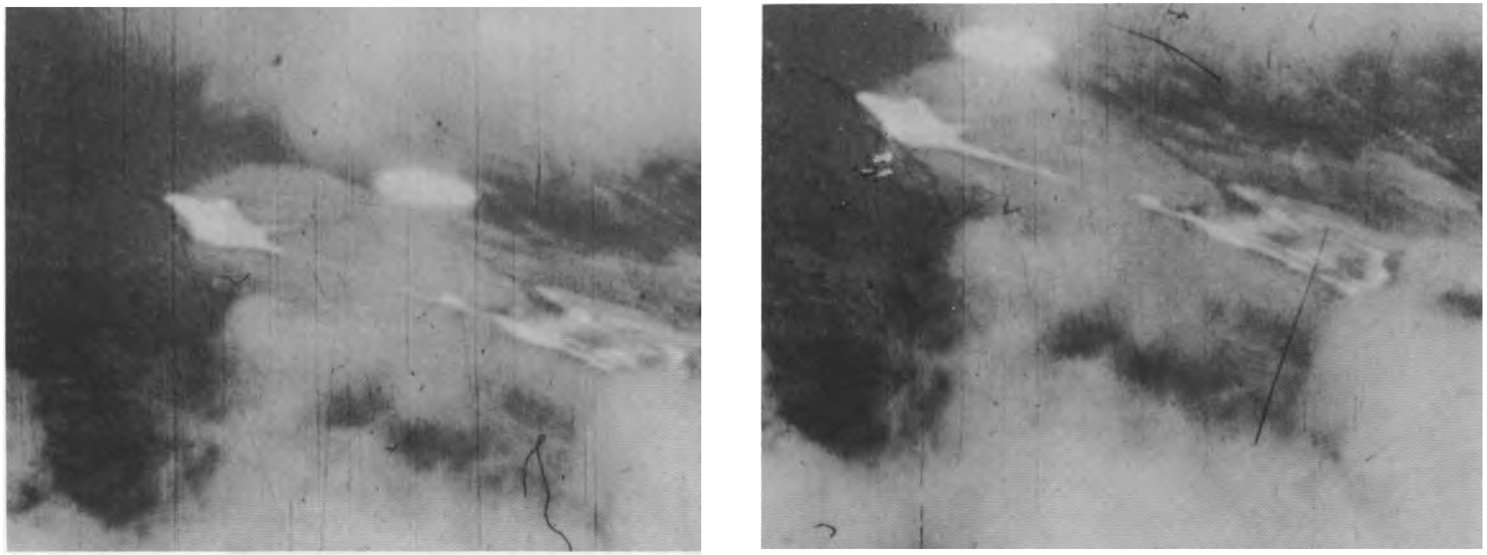


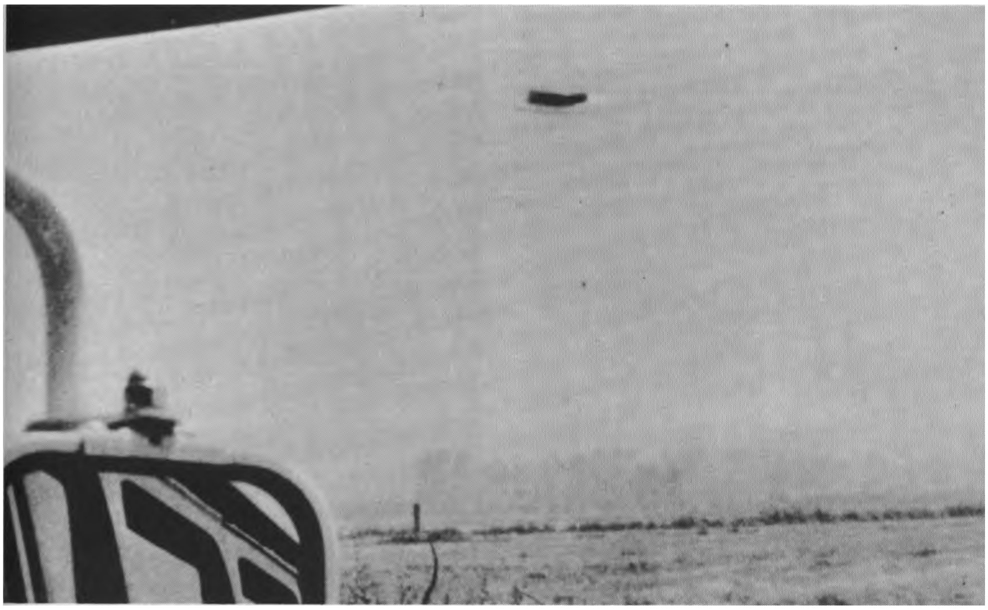
On January 9, 1967, two teen-age brothers, Dan (opposite, left) and Grant Jaroslaw, made some photos of a domed object with an apparent tower on one side over Lake St. Clair, Michigan. They photographed it from the backyard of their Mt. Clemens home, about a mile from Selfridge Air Force Base. The object (above; enlarged opposite) was moving slowly at a very low altitude—probably too low to be picked up on radar at the Base. It remained in view about 10 minutes—ample time for the boys to take their pictures with a small Polaroid. When they released them to a wire service, the Air Force requested the originals for analysis. Evidently the brothers were wary of lending out their original prints, for they kept them under lock and key in a bank—but they did give the UFO officer at Selfridge a set of copies. This officer was quoted as saying they were "the best I've ever seen." Nevertheless Blue Book, seizing on the fact that they'd been denied the originals, slapped an "insufficient data" tag on the case. Dr. Hynek, however, was impressed with the photos and thought the chance of a hoax having been perpetrated was "unlikely."

Below, an object photographed in Ontario, Canada on September 29, 1967, which Blue Book said might be a fake photo.



Below, two photos of a pair of alleged UFOs taken within about a minute of each other over Johnson Island in the Pacific Ocean on October 5, 1961. First photo is at left. Note that the lacy cloud formation at middle right in both photos is basically unchanged—an important point in authenticating sequence shots. Note also that the topmost UFO seems to have caught up with its partner in photo 2. Blue Book's evaluation: "reflections."





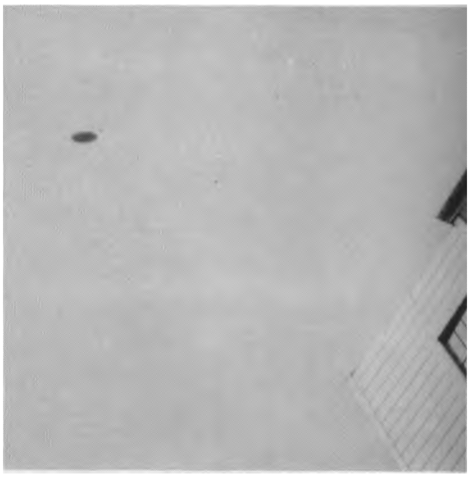
These are the famous daylight-disk photos taken by Rex Heflin on August 3, 1965 near Santa Ana, California. Heflin, a traffic inspector for the Orange County Road Department, had been driving very slowly along the shoulder of Myford Road inspecting overhanging growth by the roadside. At about 12:30 PM, he stopped his van and tried to radio his superintendent to report some limbs obstructing a sign. But suddenly his radio "went completely dead." Then Heflin caught a glimpse of an aerial object with a domed top out of the corner of his eye. At first, he thought it to be a conventional aircraft, possibly from the nearby El Toro Marine Corps Air Station. "The UFO," stated Heflin, "moved from my left to in front of me and momentarily hovered there. . . . I grabbed the camera from the seat . . . and took the first photograph [opposite, above] through the windshield. . . . The object then moved slowly off to the northeast. I then snapped the second picture [opposite, below] through the right door window (window closed). This is when I saw the rotating beam of light emitting from the center of the UFO on the bottom side [not discernible in this reproduction]. The UFO positioned itself to another angle of view and I snapped the third picture [above] through the same side window"

As the object moved away, Heflin said it had a wobbling motion and "hovered momentarily." It maintained "a relatively level altitude (150 ft.) in relation to the flat terrain, however the UFO acted similar to a gyroscope when losing its stability. . ." Once it "tipped its top toward me . . . then it increased its velocity . . . leaving a deposit of smoke-like vapor. . . circular in shape as though it had emitted from the outer ring of the UFO. . . . [It] then disappeared. . . ."

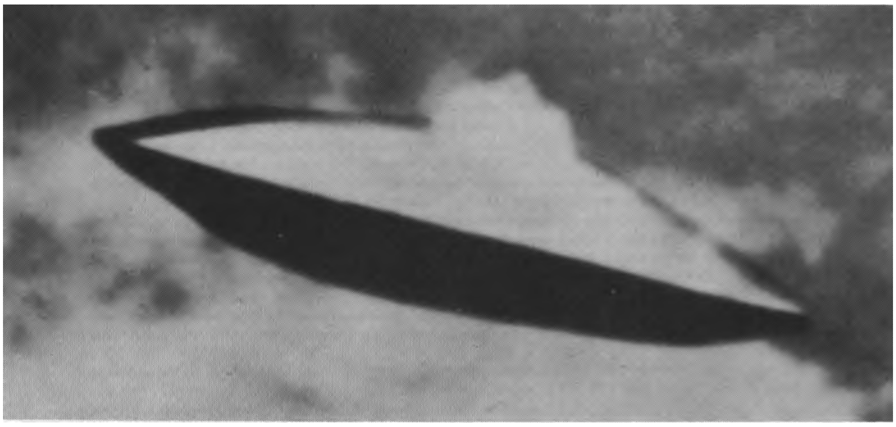
Heflin now drove quickly north for about a mile, passing under the Santa Ana freeway, and stopped where the smoke ring still hung in the air. Jumping out of the van, he took the fourth and last photo (next page). He then found he could radio in to his boss with no trouble. He later described the UFO as being about 30 feet in diameter, silver or metallic, and it made no noise.

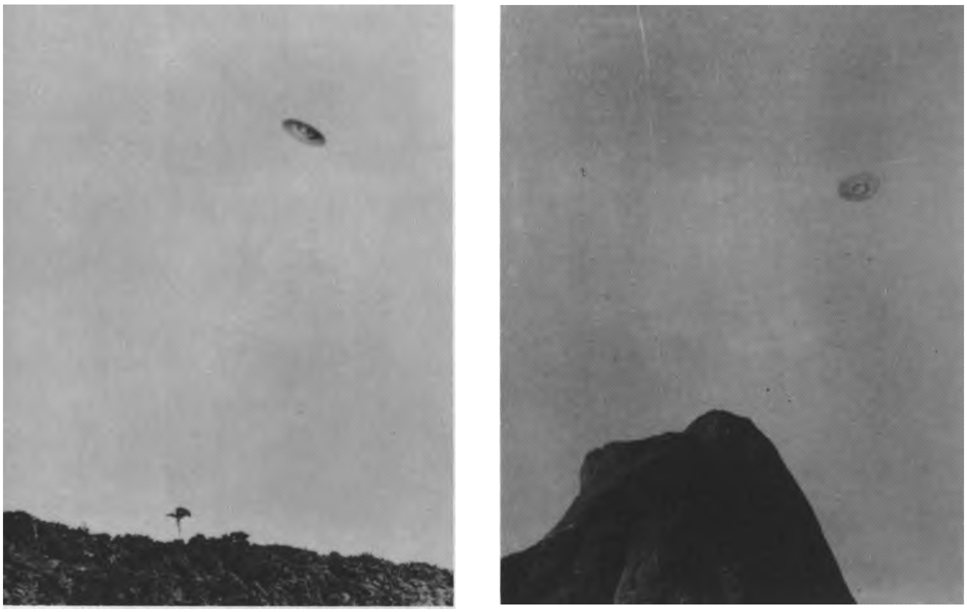
Although in 1969 the Condon Report (p. 168) said the case was of "little probative value" in "establishing the existence of extraordinary flying objects," it still held it to be "of exceptional interest because it is so well documented." This was certainly true. The Air Force, NICAP, the press, even the Marine Corps—all went over the site with a fine-tooth comb and repeatedly interviewed Heflin. The Air Force and NICAP conducted "tests" by suspending a model by thread and tossing a tray in the air and photographing them—with results that looked surprisingly like Heflin's photos. On the basis of this, Blue Book, true to form, classified the case as a "photographic hoax"—which NICAP immediately branded as "an insult to the intelligence of the public."

The big UFO flap year of 1952 was developing quickly by spring. In April, Project Blue Book received 82 UFO reports. In May, there were 79—one of which was this daylight disk photographed by Paul Eisenberg over San Francisco on the fourth. In July, the monthly total soared to 536—the all-time high for any month in Blue Book's eventual 21 years of existence. By year's end, 1501 reports had been turned in to the Air Force—topping even the flap years of 1957 and 1966. UFO skeptics and detractors often put the reason down to "anxiety" in the early '50s due to the cold war, fear of Soviet attack, McCarthyism, and the Korean conflict.

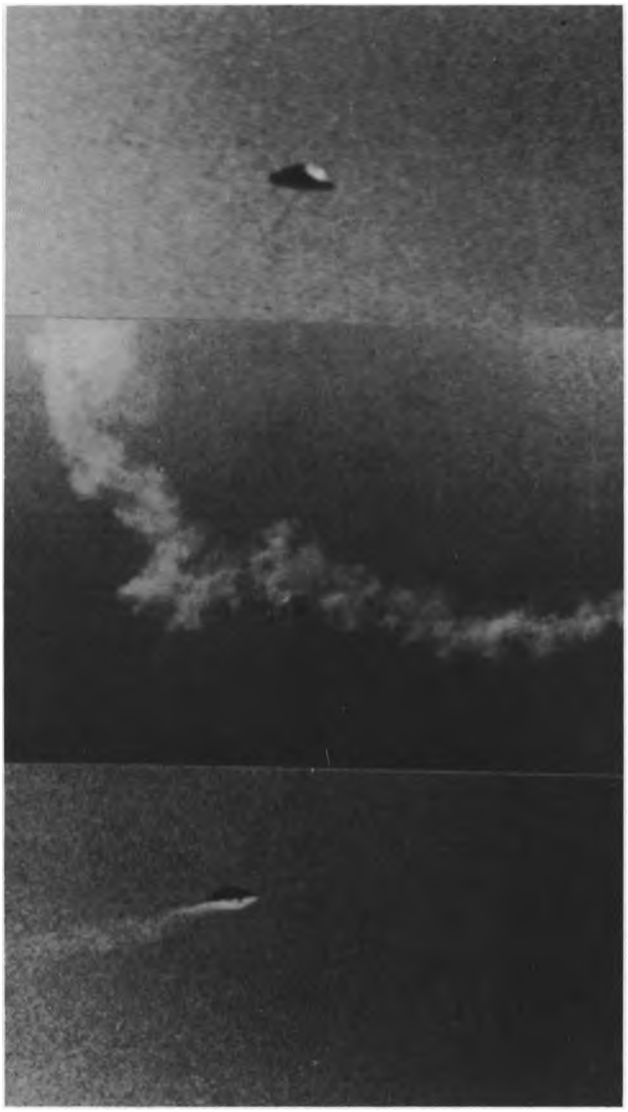


This UFO was photographed by a U.S. Marine Air Group photographer during the Korean conflict. For a few seconds, the UFO closely paced the Marine aircraft, then flew off at an estimated speed of 1000 miles an hour and disappeared. The photographer noted that a bright flash of radiation issued from the pilot-house portion of the UFO and "burned into" his film.





Two of five photos showing the famous Barra da Tijuca daylight disk. The Condon Report (pp. 168–9) said of it: "This case has been presented as one of the strongest and demonstrably 'genuine' flying saucer sightings.'' On the afternoon of May 7, 1952, at Barra da Tijuca, a Brazilian coastal town near Rio de Janeiro, a photographer and reporter for O Cruzeiro magazine were out on an assignment. At 4:30 P.M. the reporter saw a flying object approaching them at great speed. Thinking it at first an airplane, he was soon amazed to see that it was flying "sideways." "What the devil is that?" he shouted to the photographer. The latter grabbed his loaded camera and made five pictures in about a minute, thus obtaining a credible photographic sequence of the object. At left above is the second photo of the series; at right, the fifth; opposite, a blow-up of the second. After analysis by a local UFO expert and the Brazilian Air Force, a report was issued stating that the photos constituted "absolute evidence that the unconventional objects called UFOs . . . are real." However, Professor Donald Menzel (p. 91) pointed out a possible inconsistency: the disk in the second photo is clearly lit from the left, but the palm tree and foliage on the hillside seem to be lit from the right. Even so, concluded the final report, diagrams depicting distances and altitudes of the event demonstrated "the absolute impossibility of a hoax."



These three photos, taken in sequence from top to bottom, were made by a Belgian postman near Namur. He said the vapor trail in photo 2 was produced by the object, and that the self-luminosity seen in photo 3 occurred as it departed. The photos are believed authentic because in picture 2 the UFO is seen behind the vapor trail which, according to meteorologists, could not have formed lower than about 5000 feet. The postman said the object was much lower than that, thus bearing out his story that it created its own vapor. A professional astronomer said the negatives were not fakes.

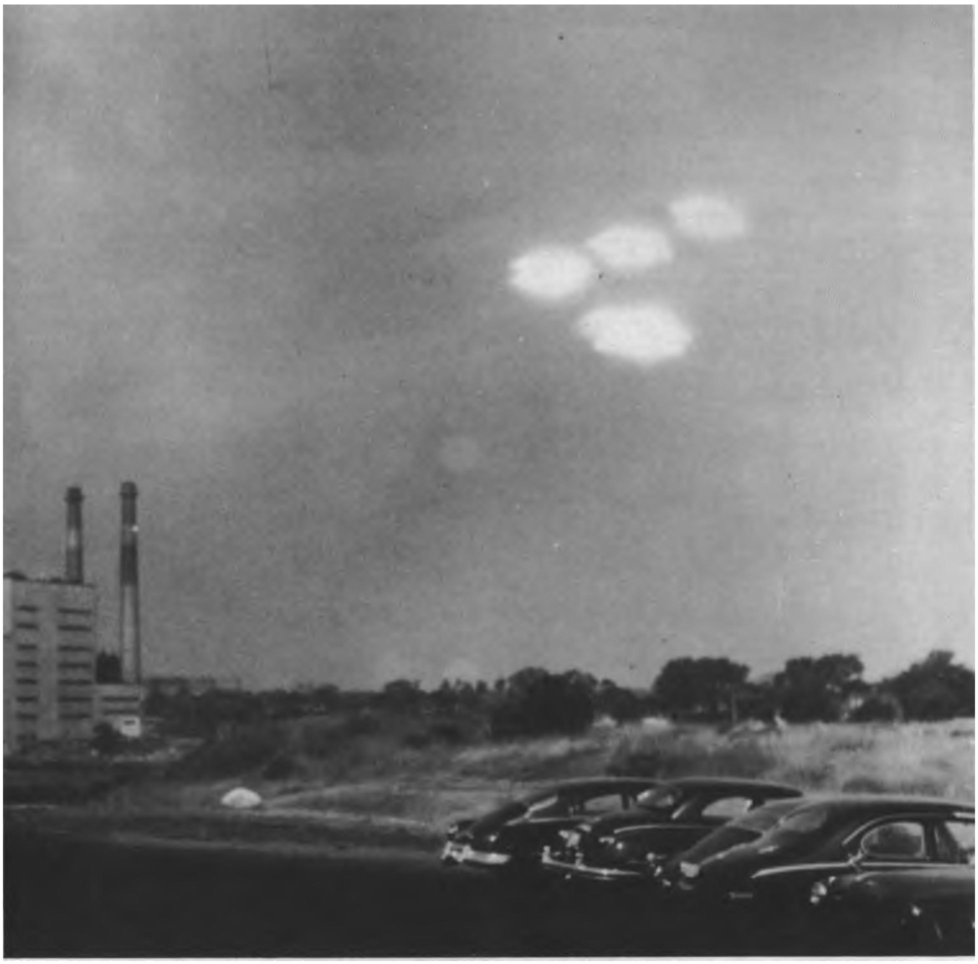
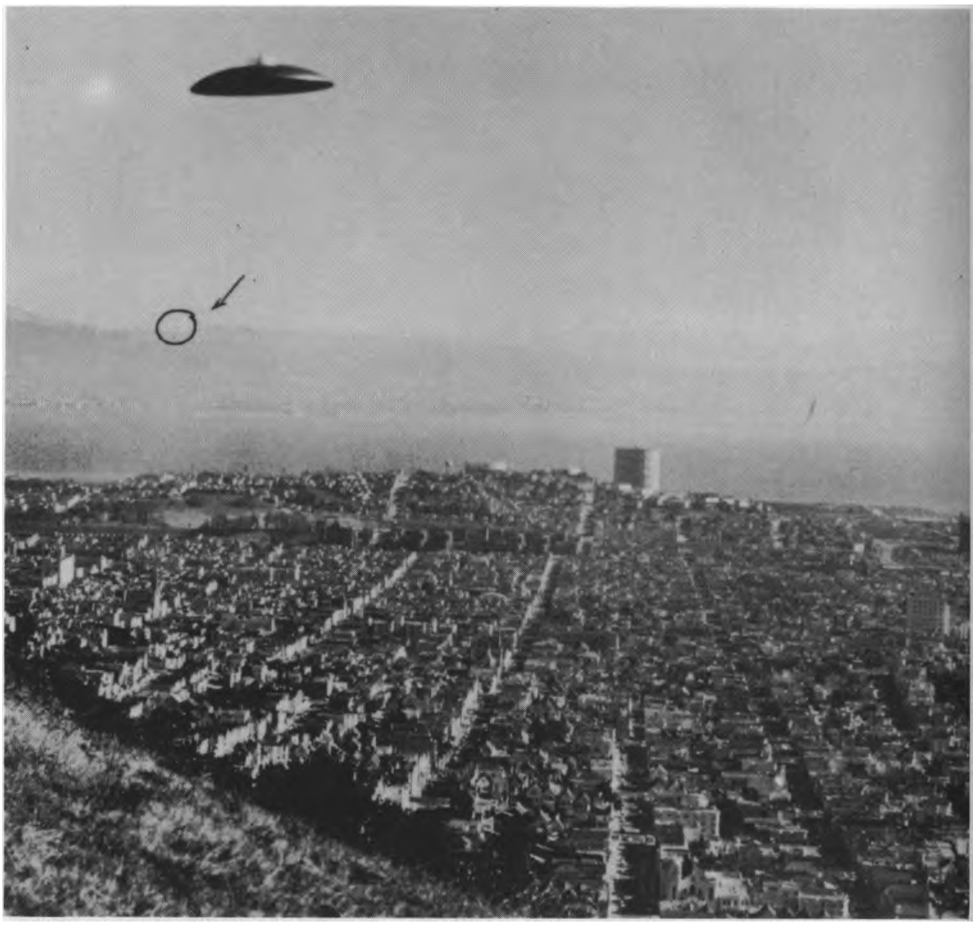
Spectators on a bridge at Taormina, Sicily watch two UFOs cavort over the city in the summer of 1954. The objects, estimated to be about 100 feet in diameter and silent, were filmed by a press photographer. Hundreds of people watched them until an Italian military jet arrived and they quickly disappeared.

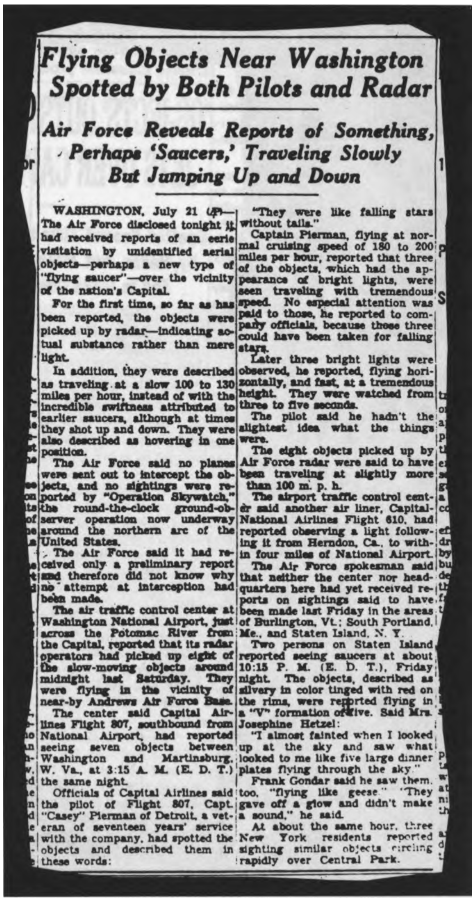


Reports poured into the Air Force daily during July—the biggest month for UFO sightings in Blue Book's history. Many were by military personnel. A Coast Guardsman named Shell Alpert, photographing through a barracks window at Salem, Massachusetts on July 16, 1952, caught these four brilliant ovoid white lights on film. An official letter in the files of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP) states simply: ". . . it has never been determined what caused the phenomenal lights. . . ." But the years progressed and the case was investigated more thoroughly. Photo experts now believe the "UFOs" represent light reflections from an interior source—probably the ceiling lights playing on the window through which the photo was taken.



This striking photograph of a UFO was taken by Mr. Joe Kerska from the south side of San Francisco's Twin Peaks facing east on October 10, 1956. Presumably a second UFO can be seen in the distance indicated by the arrow. Mr. Kerska was "set up" at the time to take an ordinary photo of the city when the object hove into view at about 12:30 P.M. Note that it bears a good resemblance to the photo taken by a Marine Corps photographer on p. 50. The National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP) considered the photo "dubious" because a small model could have been thrown in the air and photographed.

The UFO sightings over Washington, D.C. on two succeeding weekends in July, 1952 were the most sensational since the Mantell tragedy of 1948. They marked the zenith point of the 1952 flap. On July 19–20 between 11:40 P.M. and 3:00 A.M. radar operators at Washington National Airport reported apparent UFO "targets" on their scopes. At first the UFOs moved slowly, between 100 and 130 miles per hour, but then they were observed on the scopes to zoom away at "fantastic speeds." Radarmen at nearby Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland also reported such targets. Many people on the ground in the Washington area were seeing eerie lights too—sometimes over the restricted air lanes above the Capitol Building and the White House. Contrary to the front page New York Times story at right, the Air Force did scramble two F-94 jet fighters to intercept the UFOs. When they arrived, however, the "targets" had vanished from the radar screens and the pilots never did see them. Next day, "flying saucer" stories were all over Washington.



Flying Objects Near Washington Spotted by Both Pilots and Radar

Air Force Reveals Reports of Something, Perhaps 'Saucers,' Traveling Slowly But Jumping Up and Down

WASHINGTON, July 21 (UP)—The Air Force disclosed tonight it had received reports of an eerie visitation by unidentified aerial objects—perhaps a new type of "flying saucer"—over the vicinity of the nation's Capital.

For the first time, so far as has been reported, the objects were picked up by radar—indicating actual substance rather than mere light.

In addition, they were described as traveling at a slow 100 to 130 miles per hour, instead of with the incredible swiftness attributed to earlier saucers, although at times they shot up and down. They were also described as hovering in one position.

The Air Force said no planes were sent out to intercept the objects, and no sightings were reported by "Operation Skywatch," the round-the-clock ground-observer operation now underway around the northern arc of the United States.

The Air Force said it had received only a preliminary report and therefore did not know why no attempt at interception had been made.

The air traffic control center at Washington National Airport, just across the Potomac River from the Capital, reported that its radar operators had picked up eight of the slow-moving objects around midnight last Saturday. They were flying in the vicinity of near-by Andrews Air Force Base.

The center said Capital Airlines Flight 807, southbound from National Airport, had reported seeing seven objects between Washington and Martinsburg, W. Va., at 3:15 A. M. (E. D. T.) the same night.

Officials of Capital Airlines said the pilot of Flight 807, Capt. "Casey" Pierman of Detroit, a veteran of seventeen years' service with the company, had spotted the objects and described them in these words:

"They were like falling stars without tails."

Captain Pierman, flying at normal cruising speed of 180 to 200 miles per hour, reported that three of the objects, which had the appearance of bright lights, were seen traveling with tremendous speed. No especial attention was paid to those, he reported to company officials, because those three could have been taken for falling stars.

Later three bright lights were observed, he reported, flying horizontally, and fast, at a tremendous height. They were watched from three to five seconds.

The pilot said he hadn't the slightest idea what the things were.

The eight objects picked up by Air Force radar were said to have been traveling at slightly more than 100 m. p. h.

The airport traffic control center said another air liner, Capital-National Airlines Flight 610, had reported observing a light following it from Herndon, Ca., to within four miles of National Airport.

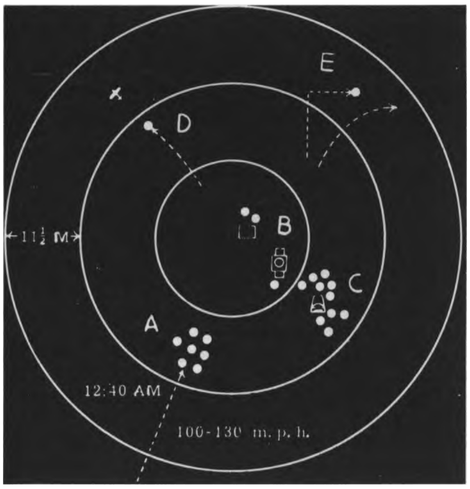
The Air Force spokesman said that neither the center nor headquarters here had yet received reports on sightings said to have been made last Friday in the areas of Burlington, Vt.; South Portland, Me., and Staten Island, N. Y.

Two persons on Staten Island reported seeing saucers at about 10:15 P. M. (E. D. T.), Friday night. The objects, described as silvery in color tinged with red on the rims, were reported flying in a "V" formation of five. Said Mrs. Josephine Hetzel:

"I almost fainted when I looked up at the sky and saw what looked to me like five large dinner plates flying through the sky."

Frank Gondar said he saw them, too, "flying like geese." "They gave off a glow and didn't make a sound," he said.

At about the same hour, three New York residents reported sighting similar objects circling rapidly over Central Park.



Antics of the July 20 UFOs over Washington can be traced on this diagram of a radar scope. At A, 7 objects approach the Nation's capital from the south. At B, some are seen over the White House and Capitol. At C, they appear over Andrews Air Force Base. At D, one UFO tracks an airliner. At E, one is seen to make a sharp right-angular turn.

'OBJECTS' OUTSTRIP JETS OVER CAPITAL

Spotted Second Time in Week by Radar, but Interceptors Fail to Make Contact

By The Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, July 27—The Air Force said today that jet fighter planes had made an effort to intercept unknown objects in the sky over Washington last night after the objects had been spotted by radar, but that no direct contact had been made.

It was the second time within a week that unidentified objects had been observed in the vicinity of the nation's capital, but no planes were sent up on the previous occasion, last Monday.

The Air Force said that at 9:08 o'clock, Eastern daylight time, last night the Air Route Traffic Control Center, operated by the Civil Aeronautics Administration, had picked up by radar "between four and twelve unidentified objects over the Washington vicinity."

The C. A. A. notified the Air Force and two jet fighter-interceptor planes were ordered up to make a check. These planes came from a base at New Castle, Del., about ninety miles from Washington.

The jet planes themselves appeared on the C. A. A. radarscope at 11:25 P. M. and were guided in on several of the unknown objects.

The Air Force said in its statement: "One of the jet pilots reported sighting four lights in front, approximately ten miles and slightly above him, but he reported he had no apparent closing [overtaking] speed. They disappeared before he could overtake them."

The sighting of the unidentified objects in the sky by radar indicated that something with substance was involved, not only light. Radar, which detects objects by radio, can "pick up" such things as cloud formations.

The Air Route Traffic Control Center made several further attempts through its radar observation of the unidentified objects to guide the jets to a contact. The efforts were unsuccessful, the Air Force said, until about 11:49 P. M., when the same pilot who had reported the first visual contact again reported sighting what he described as "a steady white light." The light disappeared within a matter of one minute, the Air Force said.

The C. A. A. radar operator at the traffic control center, located at the Washington National Airport, calculated the unknown object's position at about ten miles east of Mount Vernon, Va., which is near the airport.

The two jets left the area at 1:40 this morning, but two additional jet aircraft were sent over and they stayed in the vicinity for forty minutes.

The Air Force said that no further contact, either visual or by radar, had been made by the planes, although the "unidentified objects" were still apparent at 2:20 A. M. on the radarscope.

Air Force Explains 2-Hour Delay In Chasing 'Objects' Over Capital

WASHINGTON, July 28 (AP)—The Air Force said tonight the "flying saucer"

The UFO scare In Washington, D.C. quieted down—until the following weekend. Then, at 10:30 pm on July 26, National Airport radar screens again picked up more mysterious targets and started tracking them. Air Force officials were called to the airport and all passenger planes approaching Washington were rerouted to other airports. This time jets were Immediately ordered into the air to Intercept the UFOs. (Note In the story above that the Air Force still denies sending up fighters the previous weekend.) The jet pilots could only see lights In the sky. Whenever they tried to overtake them for a closer look, the UFOs darted off at great speed. Running low on fuel, the jets soon gave up the chase and returned to base. In the classification system of Dr. Hynek (p. 70), the Washington UFOs would qualify as a "radar-visual" case, since the radar sightings were supported by visual sightings of witnesses on the ground.

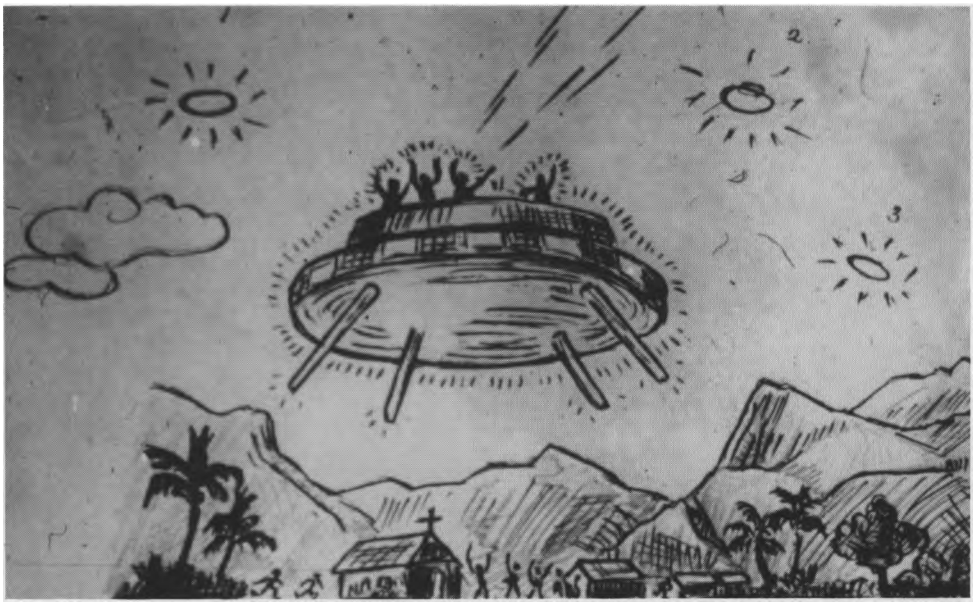
Amazing sighting from Papua



The last classic UFO sighting of the '50s was the Father Gill case in Papua New Guinea. It has been called one of ufology's best close encounters of the third kind, rivaled perhaps only by the Zamora case (p. 114). The famous sightings occurred at Boianai on June 26–27 where Father William B. Gill, an Australian Anglican priest, was doing missionary work. For months prior to this, odd flying objects had been sighted in the skies over New Guinea, but Gill took little stock in UFO tales. In fact, on the very day of his own historic sighting, he wrote a skeptical letter to a colleague about "flying saucers" and signed it "Doubting William." At dusk that evening of the 26th, at 6:45, Gill first noticed a bright light through the front door of his mission house. He strolled out on the porch to get a better look through the low patchy clouds, and summoned some of his islander pupils to watch with him. Soon 38 persons had gathered to stare in amazement as a large disk-shaped object with four legs hovered overhead. Gill's later account reads:

> As we watched it, men came out from this object and appeared on top of it, on what appeared to be a deck. . . . There were four men in all. . . . we noted the various times the men appeared. And then later on all those witnesses who were quite sure that our records were right, and that they agreed [they] saw the men at the same time that I did, were able to sign their names as witnesses of what we assumed to be human activity or beings . . . on the object. . . .

At 7:30 the object was lost from view in the clouds, but later other smaller disks arrived which Gill believed might be satellites from the large object—or "mother ship" as the priest thought of it. About 11:00 all objects disappeared in the overcast sky. The sighting had lasted over four hours. The next night at 6:02 the UFOs and their occupants returned and, in Gill's words:

> We watched figures appear on top—four of them—there was no doubt that they were human. . . . Two smaller UFOs were seen at the same time. . . . On the large one, two of the figures seemed to be doing something in the center of the deck . . . as though adjusting or setting up something. One figure seemed to be standing, looking down on us. I stretched my arm above my head and waved. To our surprise, the figure did the same . . . and [presently] all four of the beings seemed to wave back. . . .

Although next evening the UFOs showed up for the last time, no occupants were visible. Gill had sketches made from eyewitness accounts (opposite) of the waving incident; APRO (Aerial Phenomena Research Organization) artist Norm Duke made the one above. When the Air Attaché in Australia sent in its report to Blue Book, the famous sighting was labeled "stars and planets" because Venus had occasionally been visible on those nights! P.S.—when Gill wrote again to his colleague, he signed himself "Believing Bill."

Marconi’s Secret Saucer Base

The subject of man-made UFOs would not be complete without mentioning the popular belief in Italy and South America that Marconi and his followers built a secret manufacturing city in South America. Guglielmo Marconi (1874–1937), was a brilliant scientist, a friend of Nikola Tesla, and a mysterious figure.

In the esoteric writing of the Latin countries, Marconi has achieved a near legendary status, much as Tesla has recently in the United States. But most Tesla students are unaware that Marconi was supposed to have founded a secret high-tech city in the remote southern jungles of Venezuela.

The great Italian scientist Guglielmo Marconi was a former student of Tesla’s. Marconi studied radio transmission theory with Tesla and made his first radio transmission in 1895. Marconi was fascinated by the transmission of power, and in 1896, after receiving a British patent, sent a signal nine miles across the Bristol Channel. In 1899 he successfully set up a wireless station to communicate with a French station 31 miles across the English Channel.

It was thought that the curve of the earth’s surface would limit radio transmission to 200 miles at the most. When, on December 11, 1901, Marconi transmitted a signal from Poldhu, Cornwall, to St. John’s Newfoundland, 2,000 miles away, he created a major sensation. For this Marconi replaced the wire receiver with a coherer, a glass tube filled with iron filings, which could conduct radio waves. At the time there was no scientific explanation for this phenomena of long-distance transmission, and it was postulated that there was a layer in the upper atmosphere—the ionosphere—which reflected back electromagnetic waves.

MARCONI THE MYSTERIOUS

Marconi was the son of a wealthy Italian landowner and an Irish mother. When his first transmission in 1895 did not interest Italian authorities, he went to Britain. The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company was formed in London in 1896 and Marconi made millions off his inventions.

Marconi and Tesla are both given credit for the invention of the radio. Marconi's historical radio transmission utilized a Heinrich Hertz spark arrester, a Popov antenna, and an Edouard Bramely coherer for his simple device that was to go on to become the modern radio.

Marconi was given the Noble Prize for Physics in 1909 jointly with Karl Ferdinand Braun, who made important modification which considerably increased the range of the first Marconi transmitters.

Like Tesla, Marconi was a mysterious man in his later years, and was known to perform experiments, including anti-gravity experiments, aboard his yacht Electra. Marconi's yacht was a floating super-laboratory from which he sent signals into space and lit lights in Australia in 1930. He did this with the aid of an Italian physicist named Landini by sending wave train signals through the earth, much as Tesla had done in Colorado Springs.

In June of 1936 Marconi demonstrated to Italian Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini a wave gun device that could be used as a defensive weapon. In the 1930s such devices were popularized as "death rays" as in a Boris Karloff film of the same name. Marconi demonstrated the ray on a busy highway north of Milan one afternoon. Mussolini had asked his wife Rachele to also be on the highway at precisely 3:30 in the afternoon. Marconi's device caused the electrical systems in all the cars, including Rachele's, to malfunction for half an hour, while her chauffeur and other motorists checked their fuel pumps and spark plugs. At 3:35 all the cars were able to start again. Rachele Mussolini later published this account in her autobiography.

Mussolini was quite pleased with Marconi’s paralyzing rays, however it is said that Pope Pius XI learned about the device he took steps to have Mussolini stop Marconi’s research. According to Marconi’s followers, Marconi then took his yacht to South America in 1937, after faking his own death.

THE SECRET CITY IN SOUTH AMERICA

A number of European scientists were said to have gone with Marconi, including Landini. In the 1937, the enigmatic Italian physicist and alchemist Fulcanelli warned European physicists of the grave dangers of atomic weapons and then mysteriously vanished a few years later. He is believed to have joined Marconi’s secret group in South America.

Ninety-eight scientists were said to have gone to South America where they built a city in an extinct volcanic cater in the southern jungles of Venezuela. In their secret city, financed by the great wealth they had created during their lives, they continued Marconi’s work on solar energy, cosmic energy and anti-gravity. They worked secretly and apart from the world’s nations, building free-energy motors and ultimately discoid aircraft with a form of gyroscopic anti-gravity. The community is said to be dedicated to universal peace and the common good of all mankind. Believing the rest of the world to be under the control of energy companies, multinational bankers, and the military-industrial complex, they have remained isolated from the rest of the world, working subversively to foster peace and a clean, ecological technology on the world.

We have information on this astonishing high-tech city from a number of sources. In the South America the story is a common subject among certain metaphysical groups. Says the French writer Robert Charroux in his book The Mysteries of the Andes, (1974, 1977, Avon Books) “. . . the Ciudad Subterranean de los Andes, is discussed in private from Caracas to Santiago.” Charroux goes on to tell the story of Marconi and his secret city, plus the story of a Mexican journalist named Mario Rojas Avendaro who investigated the Ciudad Subterranean de los Andes (Underground City of the Andes) and concluded that it was a true story. Avendaro was contacted by man named Nacisso Genovese, who had been a student of Marconi’s and was a physics teacher at a High School in Baja California, Mexico.

Genovese was an Italian by origin and claimed to have lived for many years in the Ciudad Subterranean de los Andes. Sometime in the late 1950s he wrote an obscure book entitled My Trip To Mars.

Though the book was never published in English, it did appear in various Spanish, Portuguese and Italian editions.

"MY TRIP TO MARS"

Genovese claimed that the city had been built with large financial resources, was underground, and had better research facilities than any other research facility in the world (at that time, at least). By 1946 the city already using a powerful collector of cosmic energy, the essential component of all matter, according to Marconi's theories, many of which he had derived from Tesla.

"In 1952," according to Genovese, "we travelled above all the seas and continents in a craft whose energy supply was continuous and practical inexhaustible. It reached a speed of half a million miles an hour and withstood enormous pressures, near the limit of resistance of the alloys that composed it. The problem was to slow it down at just the right time."

According to Genovese, the city is located at the bottom of a crater, is mostly underground and is entirely self-sufficient. The 13,000 foot extinct volcano, high in the jungle mountains of the Amazon, is covered in thick vegetation and hundreds of miles from any roads.

The French author Charroux expressed surprise and disbelief at the statement that the city was on a jungle covered mountain 13,000 feet high. Yet the eastern side of Andean cordillera has many such mountains, from Venezuela to Bolivia, spanning thousands of miles. Several such cities, and mountains, could exist in this vast, unexplored, and perpetually cloud-covered region.

But a secret city in a jungle crater was the least of the claims. Genovese claimed that flights to the Moon and Mars were made in their "flying saucers." He claimed that once the technology had been conquered, it was relatively simple to make the trip to the Moon (a few hours) or Mars (several days). Genovese does not mention pyramids or what they did on Mars. Perhaps they created a Martian base in one of the ancient, sand-blown pyramids of the Cydonia Region.

There have been many reports of UFOs in South America, especially along the edge of the mountainous jungles of the eastern Andes, from Bolivia to Venezuela. Is it possible that some of these UFOs are anti-gravity craft from the Ciudad Subterranean de los Andes?

Summary of the Claims & Evidence

In the last ten years, more and more information has been coming forth in the UFO fields on the German genesis of Anti-Gravity craft. Magazine articles, video documentaries and books have appeared with regularity.

The claims can be briefly summarized in the next few pages. Secret societies such as the Thule Gesllschaft are often credited with leading the German Military Industrial Complex in its effort to master the mysterious energy which they called “Vril.”

Various forms of technology were combined, including the vortex turbines of Victor Schauberger, Hans Kohler’s converter device, and so-called Kohler tachyon magneto-gravitic drive, or “Thule tachyonator.” The Germans may have also constructed Mercury Plasma Gyros—an electrified mercury vapor in a closed gyro system. Christof Friedrich in his fringe-Nazi books Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions and UFOs Nazi Secret Weapon? mentions U-859, an ill-fated submarine that left Germany in April of 1944 and was sunk off the Straits of Malakka in Indonesia. The submarine had a cargo of mercury—33 tons! Where was this odd-ball cargo going at the time of the sinking of the submarine? Friedrich mentions that the cargo was salvaged 30 years later and suggests that the cargo was destined for Antarctica to be used as an integral part of the new technology being developed in secret Nazi bases there.

After various experimental prototypes, including the rocket powered Miethe and Schriever discs, production began on the small ten meter diameter interceptor-fighters of the Vril series. The larger Haunibu series began with the 25 meter Haunibu 1 & 2. These craft had canons mounted underneath and were designed as "tank killers."

The 74 meter Haunibu-3, designed as an anti-shipping craft for use over long ocean distances, was actually built and tested. It had inflatable rubber cushions on the underside for landing. The 300 meter diameter Haunibu-4 was on the design board for interplanetary travel. It was disc shaped and could also carry several of the smaller Vril craft. Also reportedly in the design stage was an immense 330 meter cigar-shaped battleship.

Towards the end of the war, the Germans had developed interplanetary craft with no moving parts which were capable of going to the Moon or even Mars. Some researchers, in videos and articles, have claimed the Germans actually did this either at the end of the war or shortly afterward from their Antarctic Bases—a fantastic claim!

Some sources claim that a "Last Battalion" of German solders escaped to Antarctica and South America via submarine in the last days of WW II. It is possible that the Germans may have high-tech super cities in the remote jungles of South America as well.

A number of military historians, such as Col. Howard Buechner, author of Secrets of the Holy Lance and Hitler's Ashes, maintain that the Germans had already created bases in Queen Maud Land, opposite South Africa during the war.

Afterward, German U-Boats, in some reports as many as 100, took important scientists, aviators, and politicians to the final fortress of Nazi Germany. Two of these U-boats surrendered in Argentina three months after the war. In 1947, the U.S. Navy invaded Antarctica, with Admiral Byrd in command. Byrd flew all over Antarctica, except for the German area known as New Schwabenland. On one flight Byrd's instruments went haywire and his entire squadron returned to their base via land navigation. It is often claimed that several jets from the four aircraft carriers which participated in Byrd's invasion were shot down by discoid craft. The Navy retreated and did not return until 1957. This time with the support of France, Britain, and Russia.

Other Nazi bases are presumed to have existed in isolated areas of South America, probably in mountain jungle locations, and possibly in the fjord area of southern Chile.

According to the book, Chronicle of Akakor, first published in German by the journalist Karl Brugger, a German battalion had taken refuge in an underground city on the borders of Brazil and Peru. Brugger, a German journalist who lived in Manaus, was assassinated in the Rio de Janeiro suburb of Ipanema in 1981. His guide, Tatunca Nara, went on to become Jacques Cousteau's guide on the upper Amazon. In fact, photographs of Tatunca Nara appear in Cousteau's large coffee-table book of color photographs called Cousteau's Amazon Journey. (For more information on Tatunca Nara, Karl Brugger, underground cities and Germans in South America, see Lost Cities & Ancient Mysteries of South America.)

Since World War II South America has had a literal UFO epidemic. Unlike North America or Europe, where the reality of UFOs is questioned by most of the populace and academia, UFOs in South America are a virtually accepted fact of reality. Are we believe the so-called UFO experts who tell us that all of the craft are "extraterrestrial" in nature?

Are we to believe that extraterrestrial craft come light-years through space to our planet but are unable to fly successfully across New Mexico because ordinary radar causes them to crash?

Are we to believe that extraterrestrials are continually modifying their craft as the advances in technology on their planet(s) over the past fifty years? Stan Deyo, the author of The Cosmic Conspiracy, points out that flying saucers from the 50s look exactly like a 50s-type of craft, while flying saucers of the 80s look like 80s type craft! Just as an automobile built in the last ten years looks more sleek, stylish and modern to an automobile from the early 50s, so have flying saucers become more stylish, sleek and "modern." Are we expected to believe that extraterrestrials are still defining the models, styles and technology of their "spacecraft"?

Why should free-energy, anti-gravity and fantastic technology be kept from the mass population? Why would the CIA and government cover-up the fact that many Nazi officers and scientists illegally came to the USA to create our modern intelligence agencies, rocket and space industries. The military industrial complex, heavily dependent on oil company support, promotes expensive oil-based transportation and weapons systems.

If our government had electro-gravitic flying discs, would they still launch the rocket-powered space-shuttle into space and announce it as our only "space-alternative"? The answer, apparently, is yes.

In 1960 Beat writer Jack Kerouac appeared on Jack Parr's Tonight Show and said the Cold War between the Soviet Union and the United States was a hoax. Thirty years later journalists were still laughing at Jack Kerouac and his foolish statement. But was it foolish? With the sudden collapse of the Soviet Union, the "Evil Empire" that had to be stopped at all cost, no matter how much money we poured into the Military, was now our "ally."

The evil Soviet Superpower was no more and we would spend even more money bailing our European friend out and keeping "democracy alive" in Russia. Maybe the Cold War and the Superpower Arms Race was a hoax. One can not have a trillion-dollar arms race by one's self. Russia, though a backward country, was still a major military power, and the "Communist" ideology fear could be easily exploited to manipulate public opinion, just as the Nazis had in Germany.

Christopher Simpson in his excellent book, Blowback, reveals convincingly how the brilliant S.S. General Reinhard Gehlen masterminded the absorption of the S.S. into the American O.S.S., thus creating the C.I.A. Gehlen further promoted the false belief that the Red Army was preparing to take over all of Western Europe by overestimating troop strength and moral Albert Einstein's biographers have mused over the 1944 letter which Einstein sent to President Harry Truman suggesting the creation of an American-Russian state that would control the world. While Einstein's biographers have dismissed this letter as one of the eccentricities that Einstein was famous for, the creation of a false Cold War and a real Arms Race between America and Russia did effectively control the world.

The concept that the Russian and Americans have been working together ever since WW II is also proposed in the well-known "Alternative 3 scenario." This was a fictionalized television documentary called Alternative 3 shown on British television in 1978 and followed by a mass-market paperback. Both the video and the book have achieved a literal cult following in the UFO and conspiracy field.

The Alternative 3 scenario can be quickly summed up to be that the Cold War is a hoax, and the Americans and Russians are secretly working together. Both the Americans and Russians, (as well as other governments such as the British and French) are in possession of flying saucer devices that was part of the technology inherited from captured German scientists. Underground factories and storage facilities for these craft were then built all over the world. Discoid anti-gravity craft then traveled all over the world and allegedly to the Moon and Mars.

Alternative 3 also claimed that scientists were disappearing and being sent to secret bases on the Moon and then eventually to Mars. Jim Keith in his excellent investigation of the Alternative 3 thesis, Casebook on Alternative 3, shows how, after the documentary and book appeared, there was the strange case of a number of murdered scientists in Britain. Keith documents that, beginning in 1985 and continuing through 1989, many British scientists who worked on the Strategic Defense Initiative (also known as SDI or Star Wars) and related projects, were murdered or committed sudden, questionable "suicides." Of the 30 or so mysterious murders listed in Keith's book, nearly half worked for or were associated with Marconi Defense Systems. In light of Marconi's alleged secret city, the murders of Marconi employees take on a more important aspect. Perhaps the publicly held Marconi company still had some ties with Marconi's renegade base in South America, and the "ruling conspiracy" decided to eliminate a certain segment of the British scientific community.

What becomes clear to researchers into man-made UFOs and early German discoid craft is that this technology is real, "Above Top Secret," and is possessed by various groups on this planet today. Not only are the Americans and British said to have this technology but so do such countries as Russia, China, France, Italy, Israel, and Chile. Private corporations, individuals, and agencies are also claimed to possess "craft."

Now add to this select group of official "controllers" on this planet the possible existence of renegade Nazi groups who once occupied underground Antarctic Bases and Marconi's secret city of ethical scientist-philosophers and we have a grab-bag of unusual aircraft in our skies. If actual extraterrestrials are visiting the earth for soil samples or abductees, then we have an almost holistic approach to the UFO problem.

One thing is clear in the Man-Made UFO hypothesis: our government, and apparently the other governments of the world, are lying to us. They have lied to us about certain events concerning WWII and they have lied to us about their secret activities since the war.

Our government, Hollywood, and the media have conditioned us to the prejudice that amazing technology can only be from extraterrestrials visiting our planet, but clearly this is only a partial explanation at best. The chilling reality of a past Nazi-UFO connection cannot be denied. To the scientist-philosopher who seeks knowledge . . . sometimes truth is stranger than fiction.

THE THESIS OF THIS BOOK:

1. That many reported UFOs are actual "nuts & bolts" craft made secretly on earth by humans.

2. Although what would be termed "UFOs" by modern researchers has most definitely occurred prior to World War II, we consider this period the starting period of the modern age of UFO phenomena.

3. Various alternative forms of energy generators were invented and researched before the war. including Gyroscopic, Vortex and other "Anti-Gravity" devices.

4. Actual discoid and tubular craft were built and tested towards the end of WW II.

5. As the Allied Powers closed in on Germany, the Third Reich used unorthodox anti-aircraft measures such as "Foo-Fighters" and other experimental craft.

6. A secret deal was made with elements of the Third Reich scientific and intelligence establishment to absorb their technology, officers, and principle scientists. This was largely done through Operation Paperclip and Rheinhard Gehlen.

7. Some German divisions removed themselves to South America and Antarctica in the few months and weeks before the end of the war.

8. The Americans, British, and Russians gained captured scientists and Space Technology, including rocket technology and discoid craft.

9. The Americans, British and Russians began to build test discoid aircraft in the late 40s and 50s. Isolated German pockets in South America have intense UFO activity. Antarctic bases are probably vacated or captured by Americans and Russians. Today, a seven-story or more underground base run jointly by America and Russia exists at the South Pole.

10. UFOs are a Top Secret topic to all governments because they herald in the forbidden topics of Suppressed Technology, Oil Company Conspiracies and Energy Control, Extraterrestrials, Mind Control, and behind-the-scenes workings of the "Secret Government."

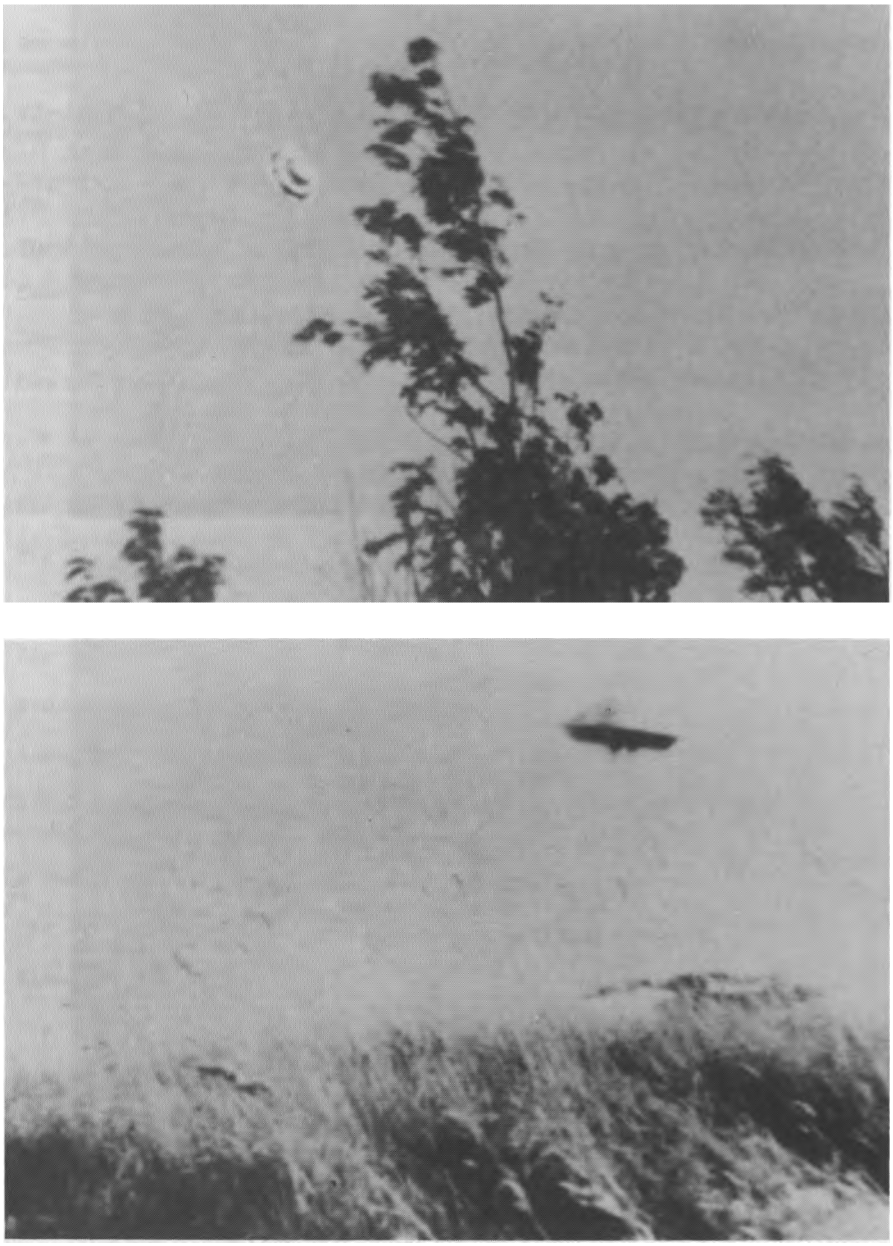
Two photos taken by a barber named Ralph Ditter, in Zanesville, Ohio on November 13, 1966. Ditter was leaving home with his camera when he chanced to look back and saw the UFO over his house. He took two exposures within a short period of time of the helmet-like craft, with an apparent "canon" on the underside of the craft. Ditter did not seek publicity but put them in his shop window to stimulate business. Eventually a news service bought them and they were widely published. The object is similar to the "Heflin UFO" and is said to be an original German design with a Panzer Tank canon mounted beneath it. Such a craft at such a late date would tend to indicate that this was not a captured test craft but rather a "renegade craft" possibly operating from South America as late as 1966.



In June of 1968 at Georgetown harbor, New Brunswick, Canada these two photographs were snapped by Leo McCabe as it flew over a deserted scrub area.

The Top Secret UFO Base Called Area 51

Area 51 is a part of the "Dreamland" complex where America's most advanced weaponry systems are believed to be under development. The Area 51 portion of that vast desert facility is where it is claimed that the U.S. Government is now examining all UFOs that have either crash-landed or have been captured by a supposed elite unit of the military. These spacecrafts, and their occupants, are now said to be undergoing examination by top specialists in the medical, metallurgical, and propulsion fields.

The entire Dreamland complex is mainly underground to prevent any unauthorized observation from satellites, overflights, or individuals hiking in the surrounding mountains. It should be mentioned that this facility is guarded by a small army of current military and intelligence services personnel, as well as a reputed hand-picked force of ex-servicemen who served in the Navy's Seals, Army's Airborne or Special Forces, and the Air Force's Air Commandos. It is known that these guards have at their disposal armored vehicles, helicopters, mobile radar units, highly sensitive detectors on the ground, and more. There is also a strong working relationship with the Lincoln County Sheriff's department, for any kind of assistance when called.

"Dreamland" includes Site 51 and Site S-4 where there are said to be research and operational facilities in above and below ground installations for flying discs. There are allegedly also environmental habitats for extraterrestrial intelligent beings. (Information obtained from various UFO researchers).

All U.S. Government vehicles that are authorized to enter this restricted area have on their front license plate a "CSC" tag. It has been speculated that "CSC" stands for "Central Space Center", but nobody who knows is talking about what that logo means.

Area 51 was first coded "Operation Snowbird" and it is believed that its main mission was to test fly captured UFOs. Hangar 18 was a movie about a captured UFO that the U.S. Government was holding in "hangar 18". When the film was first shown to the public it caused a lot of concern at the alleged home of hangar 18, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio. Supposedly a decision was made to find a new location for the recovered saucers at "Wright-Pat". In 1972 the most favorable site for selection was found in Nevada due to its remoteness from the general public, and was named Area 51. This was an ideal location because of two concealing mountain ranges in the dry lake bed area, Groom Lake, and the only road into the area was soon up-graded to a two-lane one suitable for heavy-duty trucks.

Directions to Area 51

From Las Vegas, Nevada, travel in a north-easterly direction on Interstate I-15 (heading for Salt Lake City, Utah) for a distance of about 22 miles, then turn left onto U.S. Hwy 93 for about 85 miles, then turn left again onto Nevada State Hwy 375 for about 14 miles, then left once more at the bottom of Hancock Summit onto a two-land gravel road that is well-maintained for about 13 miles, follow this until you reach the first guard post that is located on top of the Groom Mountain area. See map below.

Remember, the U.S. Government, and possibly extraterrestrial intelligences, do not want you there. Approach with caution, do not break the law. Dead UFO researchers are not terrifically useful!

During the 1960s, flying saucers captured the popular imagination as never before and inspired various stunts, including this university rag week hoax. The students left a line of bleeping saucers in fields along a straight line stretching from Somerset to Kent. This one was found in a field near Chippenham, Wiltshire (a well-known Ufocal). These four photos are from the U.S. Airforce Blue Book files and show a “French Flying Saucer Device” that is alleged to be one of the craft used by Marconi and built at the secret city in South America. The photos clearly show a man-made discoid craft hovering, tilting and landing. Although the margin notes state “Date Unk.—” the photos are known to have been taken in 1953. At first they were classified SECRET, but were later “downgraded” and finally marked “unclassified.” The Initials ATIC (upside down at bottom left) stand for Air Technical Intelligence Center, the parent military agency in the Air Force hierarchy sponsoring Project Blue Book.

A Polaroid photo taken in Peru on October 19, 1973 by architect Hugo Vega. Vega, who happened to have a camera with him, was looking for a house of client about 34 miles east of Lima, the coastal capital of Peru. He was looking out over the Rimac River valley when a discoid craft with portholes between the domed top and main section, came into view. The craft flew along the valley and hovered for a few seconds against the jungle background, which is when Vega got his Polaroid shot. The old-fashioned design of the craft is noteworthy, with this 1973 saucer looking more like a 1950-type craft. Some UFO experts believe that this craft is one of Marconi's manufacture at the underground city.

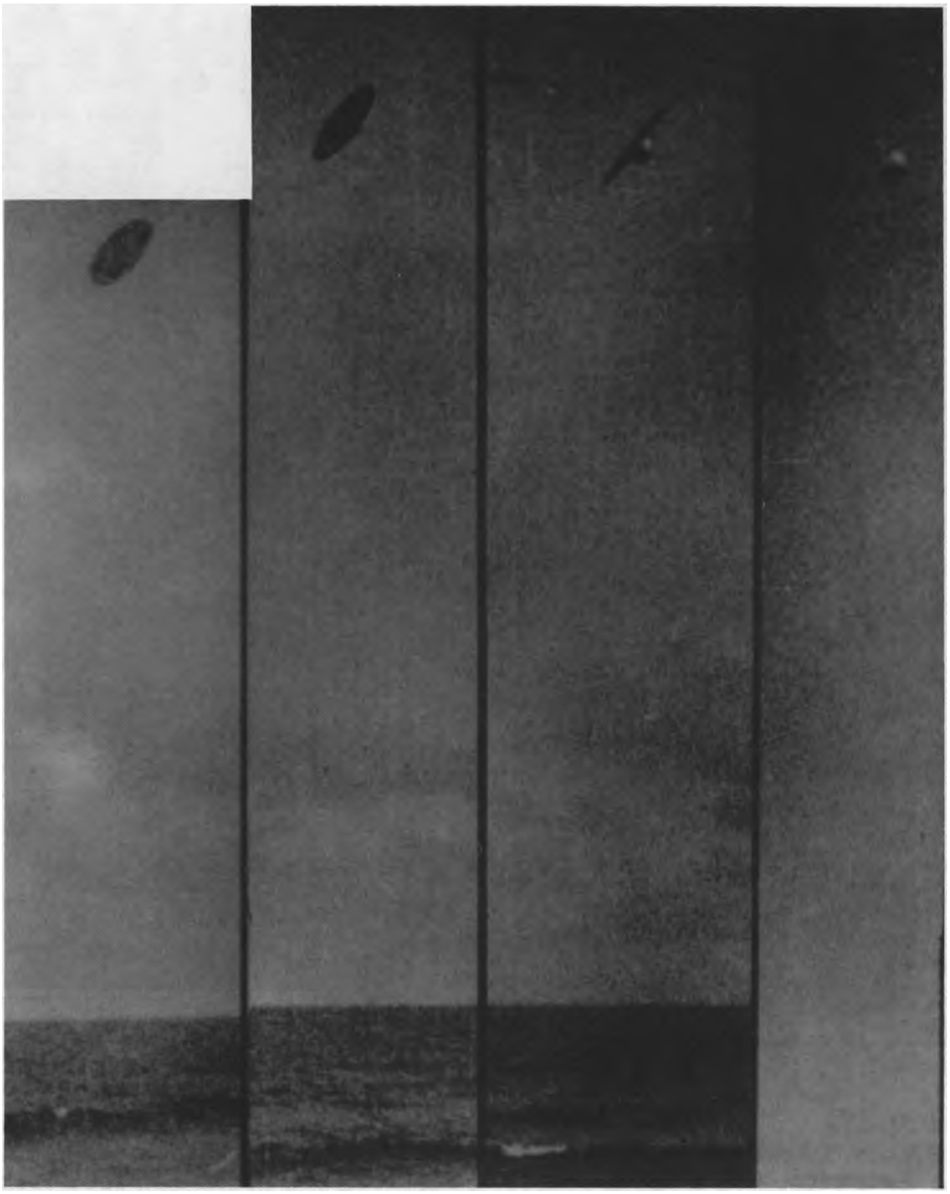
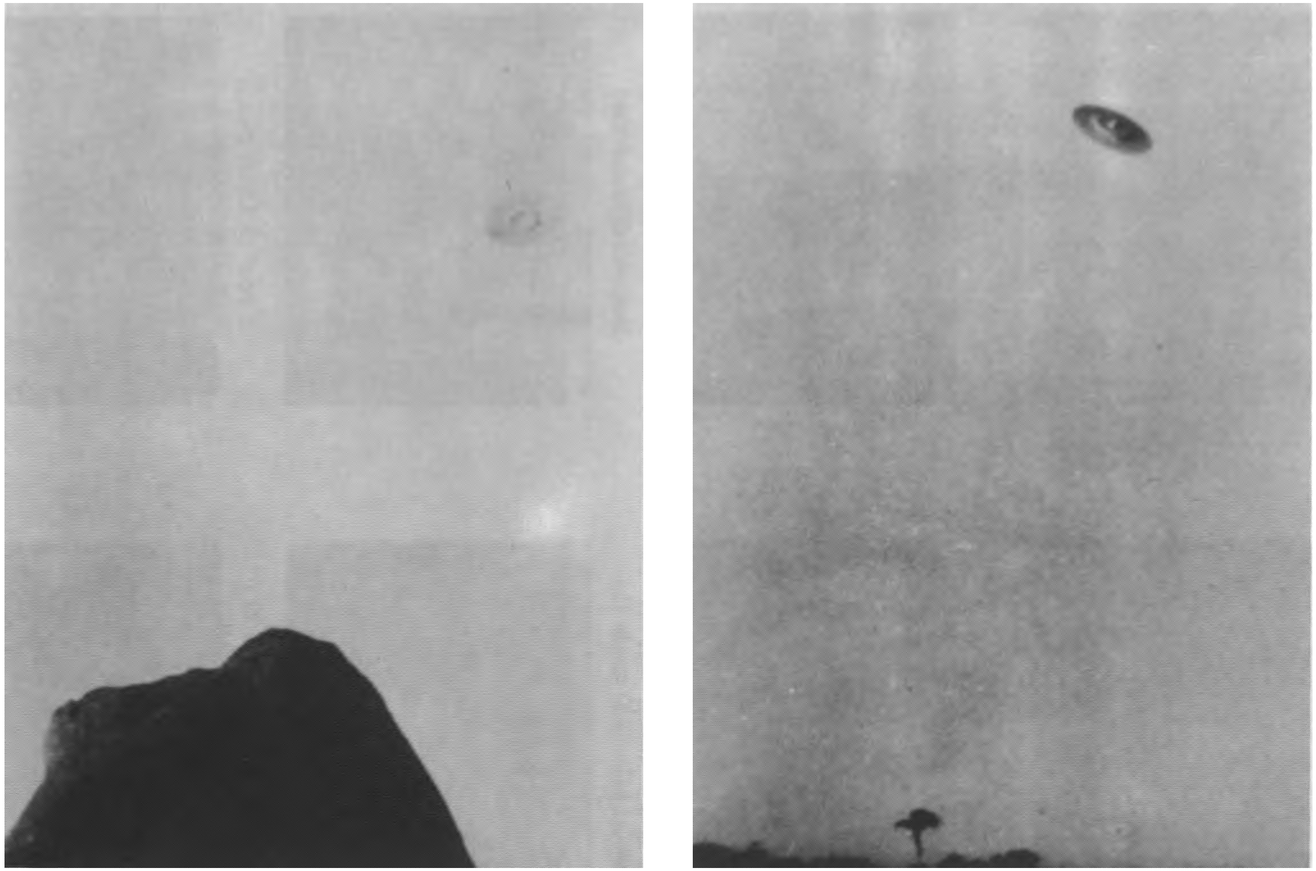
On April 24, 1959, Helio Augiar was driving along the Plata beach in Salvador, a beach in northern Brazil, when his engine suddenly stopped. He then witnessed a flying saucer flying along the beach and took four photos of it. It is interesting to note the symbols on the underside of the craft in this drawing. The craft had four hemispherical protrusions in the center of the craft on the bottom and three ribs or tubes on the top of the craft. This discoid vehicle is similar to the type of craft allegedly made at Marconi's secret city, and is also similar to the Schriever-Habermohl flying disc made by Germany at the BMW factory near Prague in 1944, and first flown on February 4, 1945 (German Jet Genesis by David Masters, 1982, Jane's Books, London. Page 135).



After taking these photos on Piata Beach, Salvador, Brazil, (April 24, 1959) Helio Aguiar lost consciousness. When he came to, he was clutching this message, written in his own hand: "ATOMIC EXPERIMENTS FOR WARLIKE PURPOSES SHALL BE DEFINITELY STOPPED . . . THE EQUILIBRIUM OF THE UNIVERSE IS THREATENED. WE WILL REMAIN VIGILANT AND READY TO INTERFERE."



Two of the May 7, 1952 photos taken at 4:30 in the afternoon at Barra da Tijuca, Brazil by an anonymous news photographer. Note the detail above and below the craft.

►A.M. INTERVIEW

There are no UFOs, just U.S. secrets

►Lamy resident says stories about "space aliens" are propaganda to cover up a giant government conspiracy.

BY TOM SHARPE
JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

Bill Lyne says stories about space aliens and UFOs are part of an elaborate government conspiracy to keep secret the existence of man-made electrical flying machines.

"I can spot them in the sky almost any night, usually over toward Albuquerque or Los Alamos," the Lamy resident said in a recent interview. "I've seen them land in Eldorado."

Lyne said many people mistake these machines for stars, but that he has learned how to distinguish between the two.

Electric flying machines "blink and wobble too much." he said.

"Sometimes they blink quite brightly, so much that they give you a headache."

You may have noticed Lyne's self-published book in some local stores.

"Space Aliens from the Pentagon," with Lyne's hand-painted cover which sports an iridescent silver saucer in a bright blue triangle, strange symbols and equations, is hard to miss.

The 244-page book aims to set the record straight, at least from Lyne's point of view, about how Texans are "the Jews of Nazi New Mexico," why the northern part of the state has become a "one of the primary deal-making and distribution points for CIA-connected cocaine traffic" and how the government often uses "closet homosexuals" for spies.

But Lyne's most compelling theory is that the public has been deceived by a misinformation campaign to blame UFOs, cattle mutilations and other odd occurrences on extraterrestrials.

The real story, he says, goes back to a Yugoslavian scientist named Nicola Tesla who discovered the rotating magnetic field. Lyne said that in the late 1800s Tesla first proposed the technology behind the electrical flying machine — involving a tuned coil that emits a negative electrical charge in the direction the craft moves.

Lyne said Tesla's idea was stolen by an Austrian group who built a few workable machines for Axis use in World War II, but who never figured out how to arm the machines because their high electrical charges were apt to set off conventional explosives.

The U.S. military, working with others, later developed the machines for surveillance purposes, he said.

Lyne said he began hearing about flying saucers when he was a child in his hometown of Kermit, Texas, just across the state line from Jal, N.M. He recalls the "Roswell Incident", of 1947 in which a saucer was reported to have crashed in southeastern New Mexico, killing its Crew of reputed space aliens.

"They were just a bunch of monkeys that were being used in rocket-sled experiments" to test the effects of acceleration, Lyne said.

He said he knew a brother of the pathologist who performed tests on the dead creatures and had photographs of the wrecked vehicle and the dead monkeys in space suits which were obviously sewn.

"It was sure not alien technology," he said.

Lyne said that when he was 15, he got his first good look at a saucer hovering near the Kermit water tower, before it sped back toward New Mexico. He said a neighbor also saw the vessel, but seemed more interested in his reaction, so he figured she was a government agent.

He blames rumors about space aliens on today's New Age movement and UFO groups which, he said, are largely made up of government agents seeking to confuse the public. Lyne said he has purchased discarded parts of flying machines in an Albuquerque junk store. His book includes instructions on how to build one.

Because of his expertise and his efforts to debunk the UFO myth, he said, government agencies like the CIA have tried to discredit and even kill him.

He said the government has left him alone for more than a year — perhaps signaling a change of policy — but that he doesn't expect the veil of secrecy to be lifted any time soon.

"The fact that they've concealed this so thoroughly indicates to me that they don't have any intentions of ever revealing it," he said.

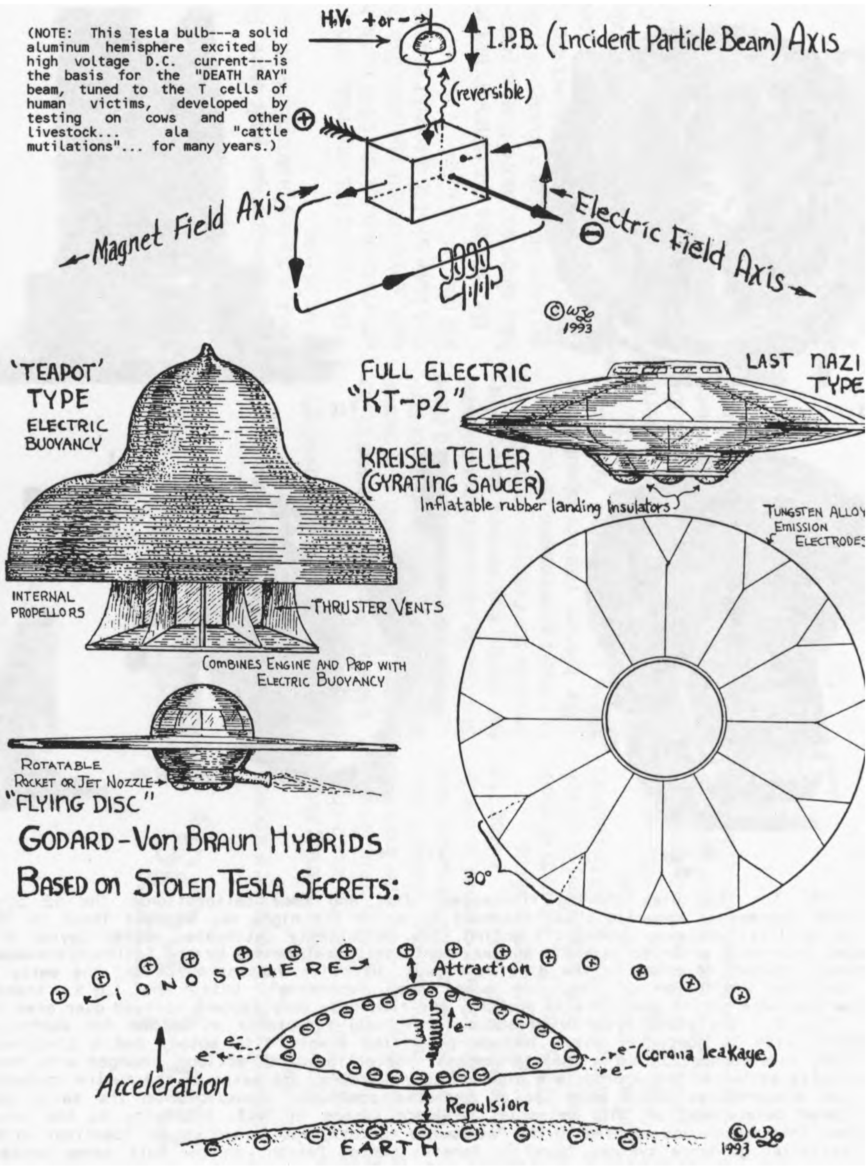
FIG. 1: Top view showing fluorescent dial and face calibrations. The 12 30-degree directional increments comprise those observed by me in the night sky of West Texas in 1950–53, prior to my first close-up daylight sighting. The celestially calibrated master (gyro) compass, indicated true north prior to takeoff, and was continually referenced by the Peiltochterkompass, as directional changes selected on the dial were made. With its fantastic speeds, the early saucer still had the limitation of requiring some “dead reckoning”, until the I.G.S. transponder implantations were put to use. This is probably the reason so many saucers strayed over area towns.

FIG. 2: Horizontal rear view shows label, and receptacle at bottom or control cable attachment, with 14 contacts, which include power for 6-volt D.C. motor, and 6 bi-directional polarities, interconnected to the “Meisterkompass”. Selection of directional changes with the dial, automatically activated the appropriate high-voltage switches, via pairs of the twelve contacts. The electrical disturbances which made use of magnetic compasses impossible on the early saucers, necessitated development of this celestial guidance system in 1943. Necessity is the mother of invention! This system was adapted to the Peenemünde rockets, and is similar or identical to the 200 or so celestial guidance systems found by General George Patton, in the salt caves beneath the Peenemünde complex in 1945. Patton was infuriated when he was required to destroy them. This also proves possession of German-made celestial guidance systems—other than those destroyed by Patton—-by our military, long before generally believed.

FIG. 3: Perspective view of the Peiltochterkompass.

FIG. 4: Photo of two antiquated wooden, high-voltage Tesla tuning coil forms (coils missing), purchased by me from the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory (“LASL”) salvage, around 1978. Twelve 30-degree increments on the notched form are primitively secured by an old window latch. They were part of some stuff cleared out of an “old barn” in the oldest area of the lab. Examination of the patina, materials, screws, nuts, bolts, and other hardware, indicates a ca. 1900 construction date, long before the 1942 Manhattan Project. The forms were apparently reworked in the 1950s to add modern automotive thrust bearings. Handwriting on them comports with that of Nikola Tesla. They were probably among electrical apparati acquired by the Illuminati from Tesla’s Colorado Springs workshops, via sheriff’s sales, taken eventually south to Los Alamos for use in Von Braun’s Illuminati “p2” project. Lab security personnel were probably unaware of their origin or use by the time they were released for sale in 1978.



(NOTE: This Tesla bulb---a solid aluminum hemisphere excited by high voltage D.C. current---is the basis for the "DEATH RAY" beam, tuned to the T cells of human victims, developed by testing on cows and other livestock... ala "cattle mutilations"... for many years.)

Two photos of an alleged anti-gravity craft photographed in the Caucasus Mountains in Azerbaijan sometime around 1983. Speculation about the craft includes that it was part of a long-secret Soviet space program, a prop for a science-fiction movie, or an early anti-gravity craft, possibly from World War II or before. Note the similar look of this craft to the Lunar Module used in the Apollo missions to the moon. If this were a prop for a science-fiction film, then why mask the man's face? The photographer or origin of the photo remain unknown.

UFOs/Suppressed Technology/New Age

Man-Made UFOs, 1944-1994

50 Years of Suppression

A comprehensive and in-depth look at the early "flying saucer technology" of Nazi Germany and the genesis of early man-made UFOs from the captured German scientists to escaped battalions of Germans to secret communities in South America and Antarctica to today's state-of-the-art "Dreamland" flying machines. Heavily illustrated, this astonishing book blows the lid off the "Government UFO conspiracy" and explains with technical diagrams the technology involved. Examined in detail are secret underground airfields and factories; German secret weapons; "suction" aircraft; the origin of NASA; gyroscopic stabilizers and engines; and the secret Marconi aircraft factory in South America. The secret Marconi base in South America, and other secret societies, both ancient and modern, that have kept this craft a secret are also discussed. Man-Made UFOs is required reading for students of technology suppression, UFOs, anti-gravity, free energy conspiracy and World War II. This astounding book is packed with photos and diagrams.

Preface

It has been a little over a year since I first read about the Central Intelligence Agency program known as MK-ULTRA, which was dedicated to exploring the vast possibilities of 'biological behavioral engineering', also known as mind control. I was stunned by the depth of the horror unleashed on the unwitting victims of the program, less than a decade removed from the Nuremberg Trials which concluded that never again should scientists experiment on subjects without their willing consent. I was impressed that the Agency deftly avoided any significant reform, even after multiple congressional inquiries into their illegal, unconstitutional activities which the disclosure of MK-ULTRA prompted, and was disturbed by the complete lack of information regarding the program in the general public. Most shocking, despite Agency insistence to the contrary, was the documented evidence that their mission of controlling the human mind bore significant fruit.

As an aspiring Historian, I set off to work on turning over every stone related to covert intelligence activities and other suppressed history, created the pen name Morgan Martell and began publishing my research on a blog titled 'The Peoples History'. Since then, I have read dozens of books and thousands of mainstream media articles, interviews, scientific studies and primary documents in my quest for knowledge. Before long I came to the understanding that I was not just learning about a series of unrelated clandestine agency abuses and financial crimes, but rather was researching various disclosures of an organized subversive network working behind the scenes. A bold statement like this requires bold evidence, of course, and I invite you to investigate the nearly 500 citations of publicly available, mainstream sources yourself and come to your own conclusions.

I used the name Morgan Martell for a brief period because I was worried that my work would attract the wrong kind of attention. In fact, when I first wrote about the MK-

ULTRA project, I deliberately omitted some information, not because I thought it was unimportant or that it lacked sufficient documentation, but because some of the documented history is so shocking that I was afraid to write about it. The revelations of Edward Snowden, beginning on June 6, 2013, changed my mind about the secrecy. The NSA knows exactly who I am and what I am researching, so you might as well too. I promise that nothing I have learned which can be corroborated has been left out of this book, even when facing the depths of depravity unleashed by certain psychopaths in position of power.

Whether you are approaching this work from a vantage point of exploring new ideas, learning more about topics that already interest you, or if you are antagonistic to the idea that something is 'not quite right' with the United States today, I urge you to have an open mind and to be prepared to synthesize new information into your worldview. In return, I am willing to do the same from you. Every day I strive to learn new things and explore new ideas, a fact which has delayed the release of this book for some months as I continuously refined and expanded the thesis. If you have alternative ideas you would like to share, criticism to offer, or have additional research that would augment this work, please do not hesitate to contact me. I thoroughly enjoy the correspondence.

'Lifting the Veil' is structured in a way that discusses two startling problems with the current political system in the United States today, and then jumps to 1946 and works forward in time to shed light on how these problems came about. Woven in is information on psychopathy and its relationship to politics and power, my own conclusions drawn from the information, and 'food for thought' questions. The final portion of the book ties together the pieces of the puzzle and presents potential, non-partisan solutions we can take to affect change.

I ask one thing from you, the reader, before embarking on this journey. Once you finish, if you believe that this work is important, please resolve yourself to share it with at least two people, whether they are someone you know in real life, online acquaintances or anonymous recipients. I have released this book free for a reason. It is the only way this information will spread to a point where it will reach a 'critical mass'. Once it does, change will be inevitable. Lets endeavor to make this happen as soon as possible.

Thanks for reading,

Timothy M. Silver

The War on Terror is a Fraud

"In the mid-'80s, if you remember... Saudi Arabia and the United States were supporting the Mujahideen to liberate Afghanistan from the Soviets. He [Osama bin Laden] came to thank me for my efforts to bring the Americans, our friends, to help us against the atheists, he said the communists. Isn't it ironic?" - Prince Bandar bin Sultan of Saudi Arabia, on Larry King Live[2]

President Reagan meets with members of the Mujahideen in the Oval Office, 1985

In 2009, a series of events occurred that ought to have raised questions in the press. First, the United States began a troop surge in Afghanistan designed to deliver the final blow to the Taliban insurgency.[3] Then the United States provided a $7.5 billion aid package to Pakistan.[4] Around the same time, the Carnegie Foundation published a study which revealed a majority of Pakistan aid goes to the intelligence agency ISI and the military.[5] The problem with these three events is that earlier in the year, U.S. officials revealed to the New York Times that the ISI was funding the Taliban, and was responsible for providing direct assistance and helping with some of their strategic strikes.[6]

[2] CNN, "America's New War: Responding to Terrorism," October 1, 2001

The press did cover these stories, but independent of one another. Not one media institution connected the dots that the United States was actively funding the harm that its armed forces were simultaneously fighting. Following the official narrative of the war, it certainly doesn't make any sense that the United States was indirectly prolonging the quagmire. Perhaps such mistakes are the inevitability of a bloated war bureaucracy, or that U.S. officials simply didn't realize the connection. Unfortunately, a collection of evidence points to a more sinister explanation: the United States and its allies have been deliberately proliferating radical Islam for decades, only to later spend trillions fighting the enemy they created.

Just days after the July 7, 2005 London terror attack, and less than a month before his untimely death, the Right Honorable Robin Cook, former UK Foreign Secretary, wrote a scathing and emotional review of the War on Terror in The Guardian.

> "Bin Laden was, though, a product of a monumental miscalculation by western security agencies. Throughout the '80s he was armed by the CIA and funded by the Saudis to wage jihad against the Russian occupation of Afghanistan. Al-Qaida, Inexplicably, and with disastrous consequences, it never appears to have occurred to Washington that once Russia was out of the way, Bin Laden's organization would turn its attention to the west."[7]

While Cook's remarks were downplayed and ridiculed by the mainstream media and the United Kingdom establishment at the time, available evidence shows his assertions to be largely correct.

Operation Cyclone

> "They [the CIA] told me these people were fanatical, and the more fierce they were the more fiercely they would fight the Soviets... I warned them that we were creating a monster." - Scholar Selig Harrison[8]

The story begins in 1978 shortly after the Saur Revolution, which resulted in the communist People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan gaining control of the Afghanistan government. The CIA immediately initiated a program known as Operation Cyclone and began funding militant Islamic groups favored by the Pakistani intelligence agency ISI, to the tune of 7.5 billion.[9] The money went to producing, training, and arming militant Islamic radicals who be directed towards fighting the secular communist government. At the time, the Mujahideen was composed of many different, loosely organized groups encompassing a broad spectrum of ideologies, with widely varying perspectives on religion, society and state . Seven major Afghan factions began receiving aid, three of them Islamic moderates and four of them Islamic fundamentalists as defined by the military, and in addition to native Afghans they were composed of many foreigners who traveled to fight the invasion, such as Osama bin Laden himself.[10]

To understand the scope of the funding, the BBC stated that the CIA provided enough arms to equip a 240,000 man army, and Saudi Arabia matched them dollar for dollar.[11] The weapons given to these fighters were not just AK-47s and other simple arms. Many were high tech, such as Stinger Anti-Aircraft missiles[12], provided with the intention of demoralizing Soviet commanders and soldiers.[13]

The majority of the funding was funneled through the ISI, which acted as an arm of CIA interests and began setting up religious schools known as Madrassas in Pakistan cities and frontier areas, churning out tens of thousands of students who would join the Mujahideen.[14] (Note: Madrassas are not inherently negative institutions, however the ones who received funding from the CIA were particularly radical).

All of this began before the Soviets invaded Afghanistan. A full 6 months, according to Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's National Security Advisor, who recalled his involvement to a French news magazine in 1998:

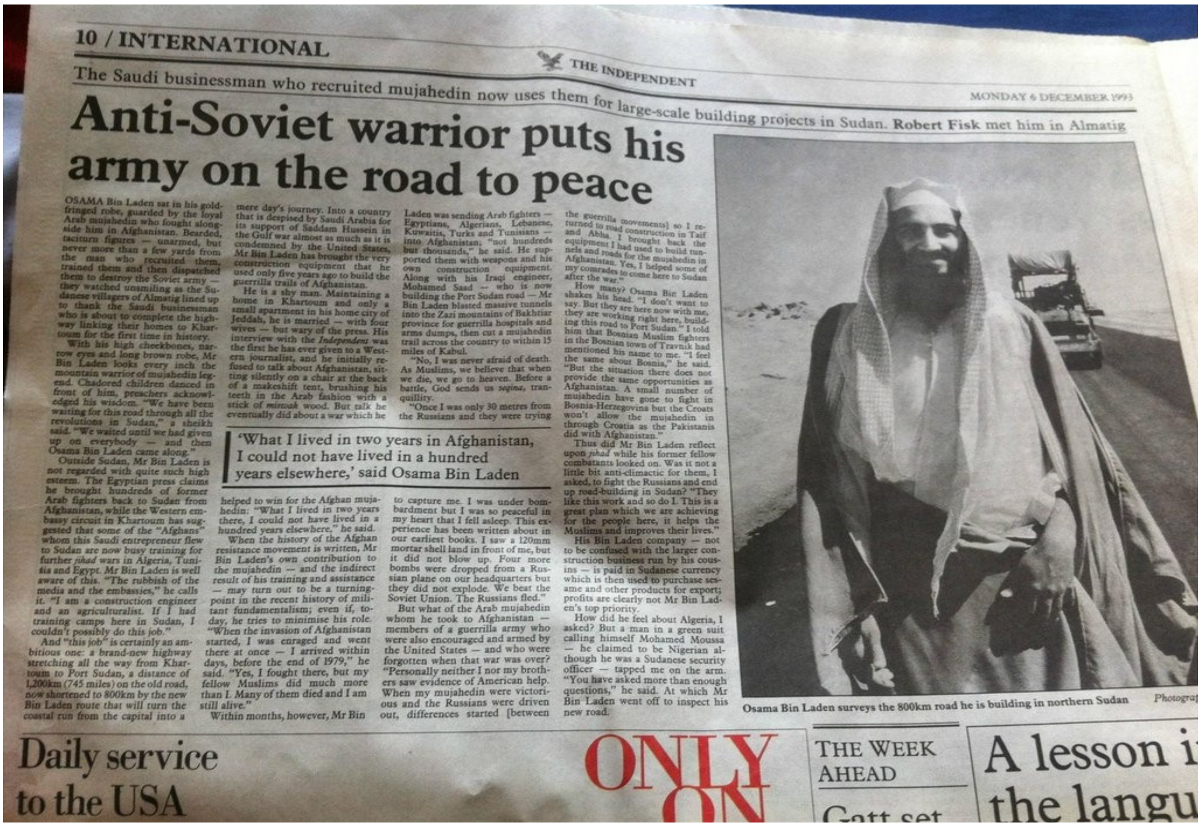
Early Years of Osama Bin Laden



10 / INTERNATIONAL

THE INDEPENDENT

MONDAY 6 DECEMBER 1993

The Saudi businessman who recruited mujahedin now uses them for large-scale building projects in Sudan. Robert Fisk met him in Almatig

Anti-Soviet warrior puts his army on the road to peace

OSAMA Bin Laden sat in his gold-fringed robe, guarded by the loyal Arab mujahedin who fought alongside him in Afghanistan. Bearded, taciturn figures — unarmed, but never more than a few yards from the man who recruited them, trained them and then dispatched them to destroy the Soviet army — they watched unsmiling as the Sudanese villagers of Almatig lined up to thank the Saudi businessman who is about to complete the highway linking their homes to Khartoum for the first time in history.

With his high cheekbones, narrow eyes and long brown robe, Mr Bin Laden looks every inch the mountain warrior of mujahedin legend. Chadored children danced in front of him, preachers acknowledged his wisdom. "We have been waiting for this road through all the revolutions in Sudan," a sheikh said. "We waited until we had given up on everybody — and then Osama Bin Laden came along."

Outside Sudan, Mr Bin Laden is not regarded with quite such high esteem. The Egyptian press claims he brought hundreds of former Arab fighters back to Sudan from Afghanistan, while the Western embassy circuit in Khartoum has suggested that some of the "Afghans" whom this Saudi entrepreneur flew to Sudan are now busy training for further jihad wars in Algeria, Tunisia and Egypt. Mr Bin Laden is well aware of this. "The rubbish of the media and the embassies," he calls it. "I am a construction engineer and an agriculturalist. If I had training camps here in Sudan, I couldn't possibly do this job."

And "this job" is certainly an ambitious one: a brand-new highway stretching all the way from Khartoum to Port Sudan, a distance of 1,200km (745 miles) on the old road, now shortened to 800km by the new Bin Laden route that will turn the coastal run from the capital into a mere day's journey. Into a country that is despised by Saudi Arabia for its support of Saddam Hussein in the Gulf war almost as much as it is condemned by the United States, Mr Bin Laden has brought the very construction equipment that he used only five years ago to build the guerrilla trails of Afghanistan.

He is a shy man. Maintaining a home in Khartoum and only a small apartment in his home city of Jeddah, he is married — with four wives — but wary of the press. His interview with the Independent was the first he has ever given to a Western journalist, and he initially refused to talk about Afghanistan, sitting silently on a chair at the back of a makeshift tent, brushing his teeth in the Arab fashion with a stick of miswak wood. But talk he eventually did about a war which he helped to win for the Afghan mujahedin: "What I lived in two years there, I could not have lived in a hundred years elsewhere," he said.

> 'What I lived in two years in Afghanistan, I could not have lived in a hundred years elsewhere,' said Osama Bin Laden

When the history of the Afghan resistance movement is written, Mr Bin Laden's own contribution to the mujahedin — and the indirect result of his training and assistance — may turn out to be a turning-point in the recent history of militant fundamentalism; even if, today, he tries to minimise his role. "When the invasion of Afghanistan started, I was enraged and went there at once — I arrived within days, before the end of 1979," he said. "Yes, I fought there, but my fellow Muslims did much more than I. Many of them died and I am still alive."

Within months, however, Mr Bin Laden was sending Arab fighters — Egyptians, Algerians, Lebanese, Kuwaitis, Turks and Tunisians — into Afghanistan; "not hundreds but thousands," he said. He supported them with weapons and his own construction equipment. Along with his Iraqi engineer, Mohamed Saad — who is now building the Port Sudan road — Mr Bin Laden blasted massive tunnels into the Zazi mountains of Bakhtiar province for guerrilla hospitals and arms dumps, then cut a mujahedin trail across the country to within 15 miles of Kabul.

"No, I was never afraid of death. As Muslims, we believe that when we die, we go to heaven. Before a battle, God sends us seqina, tranquillity.

"Once I was only 30 metres from the Russians and they were trying to capture me. I was under bombardment but I was so peaceful in my heart that I fell asleep. This experience has been written about in our earliest books. I saw a 120mm mortar shell land in front of me, but it did not blow up. Four more bombs were dropped from a Russian plane on our headquarters but they did not explode. We beat the Soviet Union. The Russians fled."

But what of the Arab mujahedin whom he took to Afghanistan — members of a guerrilla army who were also encouraged and armed by the United States — and who were forgotten when that war was over? "Personally neither I nor my brothers saw evidence of American help. When my mujahedin were victorious and the Russians were driven out, differences started [between the guerrilla movements] so I returned to road construction in Taif and Abha. I brought back the equipment I had used to build tunnels and roads for the mujahedin in Afghanistan. Yes, I helped some of my comrades to come here to Sudan after the war."

How many? Osama Bin Laden shakes his head. "I don't want to say. But they are here now with me, they are working right here, building this road to Port Sudan." I told him that Bosnian Muslim fighters in the Bosnian town of Travnik had mentioned his name to me. "I feel the same about Bosnia," he said. "But the situation there does not provide the same opportunities as Afghanistan. A small number of mujahedin have gone to fight in Bosnia-Herzegovina but the Croats won't allow the mujahedin in through Croatia as the Pakistanis did with Afghanistan."

Thus did Mr Bin Laden reflect upon jihad while his former fellow combatants looked on. Was it not a little bit anti-climactic for them, I asked, to fight the Russians and end up road-building in Sudan? "They like this work and so do I. This is a great plan which we are achieving for the people here, it helps the Muslims and improves their lives."

His Bin Laden company — not to be confused with the larger construction business run by his cousins — is paid in Sudanese currency which is then used to purchase sesame and other products for export; profits are clearly not Mr Bin Laden's top priority.

How did he feel about Algeria, I asked? But a man in a green suit calling himself Mohamed Moussa — he claimed to be Nigerian although he was a Sudanese security officer — tapped me on the arm. "You have asked more than enough questions," he said. At which Mr Bin Laden went off to inspect his new road.

When Osama bin Laden arrived in Afghanistan from Saudi Arabia, he created a group called Maktab al-Khidamat, abbreviated as MAK, a precursor to Al-Qaeda. It is frequently claimed that the CIA directly funded this group, though top CIA officers say that this is not the case. It has been confirmed, at least, that the MAK did receive funding from the ISI,[16] the CIA's primary conduit for conducting their covert war against Russia.

CIA Station Chief in Afghanistan Milt Bearden has stated that he was well aware of Bin Laden in the Mujahideen, and welcomed his efforts in funding, though he never met with him personally.[17] Bin Laden also brought in construction equipment from his fathers company Saudi Binladen Group, considered the largest construction firm in the world, to build training camps, in collaboration with the ISI and CIA.[18]

In 1986, Osama used his construction assets to build a CIA financed tunnel complex to serve as a training facility. It was also a major arms and medical depot for the Mujahideen in the Peshawar mountains near Pakistan which was later used by Al-Qaeda.[19] 15 years later, the Western Media would describe Al-Qaeda as hiding out in caves, but the truth is a little more complex: there were intricate tunnels connecting hundreds of different caves, a majority of them man-made, equipped with irrigation systems, accommodation for trucks and even tanks, hotels, mosques, arms depots, medical and radio centers, and kitchens.[20] In short, it is more accurate to call them mountain fortresses.

Al-Qaeda was formed sometime between 1987-88, with the radical elements of MAK joining after the group split.

It is apparent that the CIA had no plan to deal with the tunnel complex after the conclusion of Operation Cyclone, though surely that must have been aware that the cadre of radicals they were instrumental in producing would not simply disappear or de-radicalize. Perhaps long term destabilization of the country was their plan all along.

The Taliban

Evidence suggests that the Taliban is actively involved with Al-Qaeda. For example, one 1998 State Department cable claimed that: "Taliban Leader Mullah Omar lashed out at the U.S., asserting that the Taliban will continue providing a safe haven for Bin Laden."[21]

There is plenty of evidence that Pakistan's ISI currently actively funds the Taliban and other terrorist cells as well, while barring the U.S. military from operating in the tribal areas. A 2010 BBC article stated that the ISI was giving “funding, training and sanctuary to the Afghan Taliban on a scale much larger than previously thought,” going as far as to say that support for the Taliban was “official ISI policy.” Since 9/11, the United States has given Pakistan over $15 billion, much of which goes to the ISI and military.[22]

Current Vice President Joe Biden said himself in 2003 that the ISI was either turning a blind eye or cooperating with the Taliban. In addition, some members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee "contend that the intelligence service may have provided money, weapons and broadcast equipment to Taliban fighters now in Pakistan to transmit anti-Karzai, anti-American messages into Afghanistan."[23] BBC has reported on a secret NATO document which notes: "Pakistan's manipulation of the Taliban senior leadership continues unabated."[24]

A report published by the London School of Economics gave 9 in depth interviews with Taliban insurgent commanders. They suggest that the ISI has members on the Taliban leadership council, though they expressed fear of assassination if they went into to much depth on this topic.[25]

It's not hard to establish that the United States has allied itself with one of the biggest funders of terrorism in the Middle East, a fact which blatantly clashes with the official narrative of Western involvement in the region. It makes much more sense when understood in the context that the goal of the United States in the Middle East is not the prevention of terrorism, but rather for political, military and economic hegemony.

Osama Runs Wild

> “I do not profess a broad expertise in international affairs, but between January 1996 and June 1999 I was in charge of running operations against Al-Qaeda from Washington. When it comes to this small slice of the large U.S. national security pie, I speak with firsthand experience (and for several score of CIA officers) when I state categorically that during this time senior White House officials repeatedly refused to act on sound intelligence that provided multiple chances to eliminate Osama bin Laden -- either by capture or by U.S. military attack. I witnessed and documented, along with dozens of other CIA officers, instances > where life-risking intelligence-gathering work of the agency's men and women in the field was wasted." - Michael Scheuer, 22 year veteran of the CIA[26]

A 2001 Washington Post article states that in 1996 the government of Sudan offered to keep tabs on Osama, or if that did not suffice, arrest him and hand him over to either the United States or Saudi custody.[27]

> "The Sudanese security services, he said, would happily keep close watch on bin Laden for the United States. But if that would not suffice, the government was prepared to place him in custody and hand him over, though to whom was ambiguous. In one formulation, Erwa said Sudan would consider any legitimate proffer of criminal charges against the accused terrorist." Their negotiations concluded as such: ""We said he will go to Afghanistan, and they [U.S. officials] said, 'Let him.'"

The Clinton administration claimed that they lacked criminal charges to pin on Bin Laden, though this explanation is a farce, as within a year ago previous they had named him as a co-conspirator in the World Trade Center bombing, among other terrorist activities.[28] Just a year later, the Clinton administration would commit the egregious war crime of the bombing of the Sudanese Al-Shifa pharmaceutical factory, which provided 50% of the medicine for Sudan.[29] The destruction of the factory was estimated to be responsible for the deaths of "several tens of thousands" of people according to the German ambassador to Sudan, on a much flimsier pretext.[30] Interestingly, the pretext of the Al-Shifa bombing is that the factory had ties to Bin Laden, in the very country that had proposed to extradite him, by the very people who declined to accept his arrest.

A 2002 article in The Guardian reveals that the first INTERPOL arrest warrant for Bin Laden came from Libya's Muammar Gaddafi in 1998.[31] It also uncovered that the MI6 paid large sums of money to an Al-Qaeda cell in Libya in a failed attempt to assassinate Gaddafi. Perhaps this is why U.S. and U.K. intelligence agencies apparently buried the fact that Libya had issued the warrant for Bin Laden's arrest and downplayed the threat he posed. 5 months after the arrest warrant was issued, Al-Qaeda killed over 200 people in bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.[32] These actions are consistent with the trend of working with Al-Qaeda when they shared the same goals, and fighting them when war in the region was a strategic geopolitical move.

US Trained Terrorists

It has been widely reported, thanks to revelations by ABC reporter John Cooley, that some Islamic fundamentalists were trained in the United States in the 1980's, by way of Camp Peary, the CIA spy base in Virginia, being flown in from places such as Jordan, Egypt and even Africa.[33] It raises the question of how many such camps existed beyond the United States. Regardless, there have been some astonishing revelations of terrorists trained within the US borders.

One specifically alarming case is that of Egyptian Ali Muhammed. He was a part of the fundamentalist military unit that assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in 1981. In 1984, he was hired by the CIA, though they claim that the relationship was short-lived.[34] He would soon join the military and become a member of the Green Berets, and serve as a drill sergeant at Fort Bragg while providing clandestine training to jihadists such as Mahmud Abaouhalima, convicted perpetrator of the 1993 World Trade Center bombings.[35]

He would take a short leave from his military duties and travel to Afghanistan in 1988 to assist the Mujahideen, returning just months later.[36] Such an act is completely unheard of, entirely unprecedented and raises all sorts of red flags. Who was allowing Muhammed to circumvent the law and what type of special privileges and protections was he receiving?

In the early 1990's he would return to Afghanistan and began training jihadists with the skills he had learned at Fort Bragg. According to former FBI special agent Jack Cloonan, in an interview with PBS, his first training session included Osama bin Laden, as well as Ayman al-Zawahiri, the current leader of Al-Qaeda.[37]

Former Directors of Counter-terrorism at the National Security Council have alleged that Muhammed took maps and training materials from Fort Bragg and used them to write the Al-Qaeda terrorist training manual.[38]

Muhammed's superior at Fort Bragg, Lt. Col. Robert Anderson, has stated:

> “I think you or I would have a better chance of winning the Powerball lottery, than an Egyptian major in the unit that

Elsewhere he stated: "It was unthinkable that an ordinary American GI would go unpunished after fighting in a foreign war," and that he assumed that Muhammed was sponsored by the CIA.[40]

In the year 2000, Muhammed plead guilty to involvement in the 1998 embassy bombings that killed 224 people including 12 Americans.[41] He admitted during the trial that he was a part of a broader plot to attack any Western target in the Middle East, as well as admitting that he helped transfer Osama bin Laden from Pakistan to Sudan.

United States and Al-Qaeda Have The Same Agenda

In 2011, NATO, led by Barack Obama and the United States, initiated military action against Libya by enforcing a No Fly Zone and carried out numerous air strikes, including one against Libyan state TV which killed 3 journalists.[42] Downplayed in Western media was the fact that the 'rebels' consisted of various factions of radical Islamists, many who had been fighting Gaddafi for decades and had their roots in the Mujahideen in Afghanistan, such as the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group, whose goal is to implement an Islamic state.[43] CNN has reported on widespread abuses against civilians from these groups after Gaddafi was ousted from power, including the use of landmines and other deadly equipment.[44] Many of the rebels have admitted links to Al-Qaeda[45], whom had declared support for the rebels in Libya.[46]

The Washington Post has reported that a former Al-Qaeda member has estimated there to be 1000 'freelance jihadists' that have traveled to Libya to support the rebels, many affiliated with Al-Qaeda, and also that Libya has one of the highest domestic Al-Qaeda populations in the Middle East, quoting a 2007 West Point study on the subject.[47]

In 1999, the United States decided to support the Kosovo Liberation Army, allies of Al-Qaeda. Bill Clinton framed the intervention in humanitarian terms despite the fact that staggering atrocities were being committed on both sides.[48] French News Agency AFP reported that members of the KLA had been trained by Bin Laden[49], and the Washington Times reported that the KLA bankrolled their operations with funds from the heroin trade in Afghanistan and had accepted money from Bin Laden himself.[50]

The Mujahideen, many specifically members of Al-Qaeda, were also instrumental in Bosnia during the NATO intervention in 1993. Their presence is still a factor of instability today.[51] It is of significance that all of these associations occurred after the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, when Al-Qaeda first became widespread in the American lexicon.

Barack Obama has been arming rebels in Syria, beginning secretly with CIA arms airlifts in 2012[52], citing many of the same reasons for intervention that Clinton did in 1999, despite domestic and foreign ally opposition.[53] [54]Once again, many of the rebels have been

The Source of Radicalism

Earlier I mentioned CIA funded madrassas being a source of Islamic radicalism in the 1980's. They have been an important factor in the radicalization of Islam ever since. As of 2008, there are ~750 madrassas in Pakistan that teach jihad and radicalism, about 10% of all madrassas in the country (and I want to emphasize that this section is referring to specific radical iterations of Madrassas, not simply applying a blanket generalization to the religious style of education).[56] U.S. diplomatic cables released by Wikileaks revealed that the funding for these radical schools now comes from Saudi Arabia, the United States' biggest ally in the region.[57] The radical madrassa network exploits impoverished areas by recruiting children for what essentially amounts to indoctrination camps. In exchange, families receive upwards of $6,500 per son for their 'sacrifice to Islam', and during schooling, contact with families is forbidden. After graduation, many are funneled into terrorist training camps in the Federally Administered Tribal Areas, the cables stated.

PBS Frontline did a story on a 16 year old who was recruited to a Pakistan Wahhabi Islam madrassa from an impoverished area in East Africa.[58] A few years later, he was instrumental in a terror plot, blowing up the US Embassy in Nairobi, Kenya. The PBS website hosts a letter he wrote to his brother, in which he says he spent two years on a military base learning warfare, including the usage of Israeli arms.[59]

Is the CIA still involved? The House of Saud has given at least $1.474 billion dollars to the Bush family[60], and the United States sold Saudi Arabia $60 billion worth of arms in 2010, the biggest arms sale in American history.[61] Before he was president, George H.W. Bush was the Director of the CIA. As recently as June 25th, 2013, Secretary of State John Kerry announced that Saudi Arabia is 'one of our closest partners'.[62] At the very least we can establish complicity.

Regardless, the United States' relationship with Saudi Arabia ought to raise a lot of important questions. On November 4th, 2013, Secretary of State John Kerry hailed Saudi Arabia as a very important ally to the United States.[63] How can we reconcile this stance with the 2010 cable leaks revealing that former Secretary of State Hilary Clinton said that donors in the kingdom “constitute the most significant source of funding to Sunni terrorist groups worldwide,” and that “it has been an ongoing challenge to persuade Saudi officials to treat terrorist financing emanating from Saudi Arabia as a strategic priority”?[64] It is clear that the United States views their geopolitical relationship with Saudi Arabia to be much more important than combating terrorism, despite U.S. Involvement in the Middle East being saturated with rhetoric about the War on Terror. The same statement can be applied to the relationship with Pakistan, who is instrumental in the operations of the Taliban.

The assassination of high-profile Pakistan tribal leader Qari Zainuddin was widely reported in the Western media.[65] Only days before his assassination he had renounced his support of the Taliban, claiming that their actions were un-Islamic. What the Western media neglected to report but was widely reported in Pakistan and other countries was Zainuddin had previously claimed that Baitullah Mehsud, the man who ended up ordering his assassination, was an American agent.[66]

The claim that American agents operate in the Taliban sounds far-fetched but there have been some eye-opening reports that confirm the possibility. For example, a 2004 article in the UK publication Times Online reported that a high ranking Al-Qaeda member had been revealed to be a double agent working for MI5.

> "Abu Qatada boasted to MI5 that he could prevent terrorist attacks and offered to expose dangerous extremists, while all along he was setting up a haven for his terror organisation in Britain."[67]

Abu Qatada has been imprisoned multiple times in Britain but has not been charged with any crimes. During his career he has issued fatwahs justifying the killing of converts from Islam, advocated the killing of Jews, praised attacks on America, and convicted of charges of terrorism in Jordan, all while working in association with MI5.[68]

A 2002 article published by French news organization AFP states that Palestine security forces had arrested a group of Palestinians who had confessed to collaborating with Israel and posing as operatives of Al-Qaeda.[69]

“The Official Story”

The official story is that Bin Laden and Al-Qaeda found new enemies in the U.S. after the Cold War when the United States began occupying military bases in Saudi Arabia. It sounds plausible, but does not stand up to deeper scrutiny.

In 1993, Scott Armstrong, at the time the top investigative reporter for the Washington Post, gave some tremendously revealing interviews with PBS Frontline. In an episode titled "The Arming of Saudi Arabia", he stated that the United States and Saudi Arabia had jointly conspired to covertly build $200 billion worth of military installations between the years 1979 and 1992.[71] Steve Coll, eminent Bin Laden biographer, states that the Binladen group received a multitude of these contracts, with the knowing intent to support and house US military personal during wars that may threaten Saudi territory.[72]

[70] BBC, “Israel 'Faked' Al Qaeda Presence,” December 8, 2002

[71] PBS Frontline transcript of the episode available here.

This occurred during the same time that Osama bin Laden was actively using Binladen Group assets to build extensive infrastructure in Afghanistan. Surely he was aware of the construction of the military bases and who intended to occupy them, yet he did not have a problem then with the prospect then.

Money

During the peak of World War II, military and defense spending reached a rate of over 40% of the United States Gross Domestic Product.[73] Even after a massive demobilization, the military-industrial complex had grown to a behemoth, averaging over 7% of GDP throughout the Cold War. According to the Cato Institute, the United States spent a total of $6 trillion on military and intelligence in just 4 decades during the Cold War, a staggering sum.

After the Soviet Union was defeated, the Military Industrial Complex experienced a steady decline, accounting for just 3.7% of GDP in the year 2000. This changed on 9/11, when the MIC found that they could turn their old friends into new enemies to fight, and their percentage of GDP has more than doubled in the last decade.[74]

Congress has officially authorized more than 1.3 trillion dollars to fight the war on terror, and a Brown University study says this is just the tip of the iceberg: Even if the War on Terror were to begin de-escalating now, it would end up costing a total of 3.9 trillion between domestic spending, veterans costs, and interest.[75] The money comes from the taxpayers of the United States, whether directly or indirectly, and goes to the pockets of defense contractors and banks.

Al-Qaeda Today

In 2003, Donald Rumsfeld wrote a memo to the Joint Chiefs of Staff where he stated that "We need to stop populating Guantanamo Bay with low-level enemy combatants."[76] The memo was uncovered in 2011. Over 750 prisoners have gone through Guantanamo, most being released without charges.[77] Of the ~160 prisoners in Guantanamo Bay today, half have been cleared for release but are still being detained.[78] Former CIA Director Leon Panetta said in 2010 that there were less than 100 Al-Qaeda in Afghanistan.[79]

* * * *

Conclusion

After trillions of dollars spent, hundreds of thousands of deaths, repeated domestic rights infringements, we are left with only a handful of proven Al-Qaeda members, with a majority of prisoners simply being held without charges. The organization purported to be a sprawling monster after the September 11th attacks has been revealed to be a shell of an operation, financed by wealthy US allies. The result is endless war: Politicians, military and media shine the light just right to make the shadow of the mouse look huge and monstrous to justify endless profits. The media is not even connecting the most basic of dots to reveal the tremendous deception.

The evidence is a repeated policy of the destabilization of Central Asia and the development of Islamic radicals that spans decades. The result is a new global enemy without borders or diplomatic representation that can be fought indefinitely. Unless significant changes are made, we are looking at a future with an endless war on 'terrorism' where more terrorists are created daily by the very policies that are meant to be fighting them, and a foreign policy dictated by the whims of war profiteering.

And what kind of influence are we having in the Middle East? The rhetoric of 'bringing Democracy to the peoples of Iraq and Afghanistan' would be laughable were it not such a grandiose and destructive lie. The impact of American intervention in these two countries has been disastrous.

> "The biggest source of corruption in Afghanistan," one American official said, "was the United States." - New York Times[80]

The New York Times article describes how the CIA routinely funneled millions of dollars without oversight in unmarked bags to the offices of President Hamid Karzai, while simultaneously denouncing the Iranian policy of doing the exact same thing. U.S. officials are quoted as saying that instead of buying the loyalty of the Afghan President, the payments instead proliferated into a vast web of corruption while Karzai became increasingly defiant of U.S. interests.

[80] New York Times, "With Bags of Cash, C.I.A. Seeks Influence in Afghanistan," April 28, 2013. One particularly salient quote from the article is worth sharing: "No one mentions the agency's money at cabinet meetings. It is handled by a small clique at the National Security Council, including its administrative chief, Mohammed Zia Salehi, Afghan officials said. Mr. Salehi, though, is better known for being arrested in 2010 in connection with a sprawling, American-led investigation that tied together Afghan cash smuggling, Taliban finances and the opium trade. Mr. Karzai had him released within hours, and the C.I.A. then helped persuade the Obama administration to back off its anticorruption push, American officials said."

In Iraq, the country has devolved into near anarchy with monthly death tolls from terrorism sometimes reaching the 1000's. In 2004, the New York Times reported that there was a massive assassination campaign targeting intellectuals and professionals, with between 500 and 1,000 urban professionals killed in just a 9 month span.[81] From drive by shootings to stealth murders in the victims home, officials in Iraq agree that there is a massive campaign to silence the capable and educated.

> “'They are going after our brains,' said Lt. Col. Jabbar Abu Natiha, head of the organized crime unit of the Baghdad police. 'It is a big operation. Maybe even a movement.' These white-collar killings, American and Iraqi officials say, are separate from -- and in some ways more insidious than -- the settling of scores with former Baath Party officials, or the singling-out of police officers and others thought to be collaborating with the occupation. Hundreds of them have been attacked as well in an effort to sow insecurity and chaos. But by silencing urban professionals, said Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt, a spokesman for the occupation forces, the guerrillas are waging war on Iraq's fledgling institutions and progress itself. The dead include doctors, lawyers and judges.”

[81] New York Times, “THE STRUGGLE FOR IRAQ: KILLINGS; Assassinations Tear Into Iraq's Educated Class,” February 7, 2004.

In other words, Iraq is being left without the very people who could have been future leaders of democracy, and whom could have established a functioning society. Shortly afterwords, a corporate friendly government was established.

Furthermore, it is not empty rhetoric to say that the Iraq invasion was based on lies. In 2012, the Iraqi defector responsible for the 'evidence' of chemical weapon production in Iraq which was presented to the United Nations by Colin Powell, who portrayed it is “facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence”, confessed to BBC that his claims were entirely fabricated.[82] Clearly there is an agenda that does not mesh with the rhetoric!

Will the War on Terror ever end? Who truly has the incentive to scale back the operation? Not clandestine agencies or the military, who are seeing their budgets increase year by year. Certainly not any of the major influences in politics, banks and corporations, who are seeing massive profits from government contracts and resource exploitation. And most certainly not any politician in Washington, who virtually rely on the lobbying of these organizations to keep their jobs.

Journalist Glenn Greenwald put it succinctly:

> “But what one can say for certain is that there is zero reason for US officials to want an end to the war on terror, and numerous and significant reasons why they would want it to continue. It's always been the case that the power of political officials is at its greatest, its most unrestrained, in a state of war. Cicero, two thousand years ago, warned that "In times of war, the law falls silent" (Inter arma enim silent leges). John Jay, in Federalist No. 4, warned that as a result of that truth, "nations in general will make war whenever they have a prospect of getting anything by

If you were a US leader, or an official of the National Security State, or a beneficiary of the private military and surveillance industries, why would you possibly want the war on terror to end? That would be the worst thing that could happen. It's that war that generates limitless power, impenetrable secrecy, an unquestioning citizenry, and massive profit." - Glenn Greenwald, writing for The Guardian[83]

Greenwald also notes the hopelessness of combating terrorism with further violence.

> "Indeed, virtually every person accused of plotting to target the US with terrorist attacks in last several years has expressly cited increasing US violence, aggression and militarism in the Muslim world as the cause. There's no question that this "war" will continue indefinitely. There is no question that US actions are the cause of that, the gasoline that fuels the fire.
> But the notion that the US government is even entertaining putting an end to any of this is a pipe dream, and the belief that they even want to is fantasy. They're preparing for more endless war; their actions are fueling that war; and they continue to reap untold benefits from its continuation. Only outside compulsion,

Food for Thought:

1. How close of a relationship did the CIA maintain with Osama bin Laden after Operation Cyclone?
2. Why does the United States consider Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, the two largest funders of terrorism, our biggest allies in the region?
3. How closely does the CIA work with the intelligence agencies of these countries?
4. How many agents does the United States have operating in Al-Qaeda and the Taliban, and how many atrocities are they responsible for?
5. Why have Al-Qaeda and the United States fought on the same side of multiple wars?
6. Why have so few Al-Qaeda been apprehended after over a decade of fighting the War on Terror and millions of dollars spent?
7. Who has a monetary stake in the proliferation of terrorism, and how much influence do they hold in official U.S. Policy?

The One-Party State

Perhaps the most widely proliferated truism of American patriotism is that the the two-party system is a beacon of democracy. Surely, our system is better than that of Iran, where presidential candidates must be approved by a religious council, or perhaps that of Venezuela, where the majority of the media is state-owned and disseminates propaganda in each election.

Democrats and Republicans are widely different, it seems. At least that is what their hyper-partisan bickering would imply. Bill Clinton and Barack Obama must have be unabashed liberals, otherwise why would the Republicans despise them so much? The divide between party faithfuls of different colors runs deep, with each side blaming the entirety of the countries problems on the other, often resulting in a state of pure hatred and disgust among citizens. One only needs to turn on cable news to see this as a fact.

However, the reality is that Republican and Democrat presidents have closely followed the same agenda for half a century. The idea that American governance alternates as a sort of give-and-take between liberalism and conservatism is nothing more than a fantasy. I do not discount that there may be serious and significant differences between democrat and republican individuals, many of them Congressmen, and certainly in state legislatures. Yet at the top of the pyramid, where the power to set agendas resides, there is only the Agenda, and the primary difference between the two parties is the speed at which 'the Agenda' is advanced.

It is fascinating how Bill Clinton began his presidential campaign with playing a Saxophone on live television, talking about his foray into Marijuana, reminiscing about his protest of the Vietnam war, and ended up with perhaps the most reactionary (e.g. maintaining the status quo) administration of any president in modern history. Later, Obama entered the stage as a candidate of change, only to accelerate and consolidate the hegemony of the political elite faster than any predecessor. But lets go beyond rhetoric and examine the records of the last 5 Presidents, and see exactly how similar their platforms were.

Crime

> “The United States has less than 5 percent of the world's population. But it has almost a quarter of the world's prisoners. Indeed, the United States leads the world in producing prisoners, a reflection of a relatively recent and now entirely distinctive American approach to crime and punishment. Americans are locked up for crimes — from writing bad checks to using drugs — that would rarely produce prison sentences in other countries. And in particular they are kept incarcerated far longer than prisoners in other nations.” - New York Times[84]

At the end of Reagan's administration, the incarceration rate was 247 per 100,000 citizens. The demand for prison space had been steadily increasing since the War on Drugs began. Under George H.W. Bush the incarceration rate had increased to 332 per 100,000. It is a common misconception that it is Republicans have the more punitive crime policies.

[84] New York Times, “U.S. prison population dwarfs that of other nations,” April 23, 2008

Under Clinton, the incarceration rate skyrocketing to 476 per 100,000 over the next 8 years.[85] The Clinton administration gave 30 billion dollars to states to fund and expand their prisons[86], and championed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act added 100,000 new police officers.[87] The bill was written by current Vice President Joe Biden. The act also expanded the death penalty to be applicable 60 more offenses including drug trafficking, and eliminated funding for inmate education.

Private prisons flourished under Bill Clinton. The ACLU in 2011 published a fascinating review of the private prison system and found that since 1990, the private prison population has increased by 1600%.[88] The number of private prison systems actually peaked in the year 2000 with 153 facilities.[89]

The policy that began under Reagan and has been flourishing through both Bushes, Clinton and Obama can only be referred to as 'mass incarceration'. As of 2013, the United States holds more prisoners than any other country in the world, including China, as well as a larger percentage of prisoners per population than any other country. For an even more sobering comparison, consider that the United States has more people imprisoned today, as a whole and per capita, than Stalin had under his archipelago of gulags.[90]

Louisiana is perhaps the best example of how corrupted the prison system can become when privatization runs amok. Louisiana has a largely private prison system, and currently has 1 in 86 adults incarcerated, twice the national average and three times that of Iran. Nearly two-thirds of these prisoners are serving time for non-violent offenses.[91] Lobbying, along with an incentive of job creation, has resulted in some of the toughest penalties in the country, such as a potential 10 years in prison for writing a bad check. Over half of the prison population returns to the system in 5 years, without having received any rehabilitation and being returned to communities devastated largely in part by the continued extraction of the population into prison for non-violent offenses.

Arms Sales

On the campaign trail, Bill Clinton made this promise: “I expect to review our arms sales policy and to take it up with the other major arms sellers of the world as a part of a long-term effort to reduce the proliferation of weapons.”[92] And then, in some astounding turn of events (or predictable, for those who have been watching closely), United States arms sales doubled in Clinton's first year in office alone.[93]

In 2006, the United Nations convened in order to create a 'comprehensive, legally binding instrument establishing common international standards for the import, export and transfer of conventional arms.' The United States was the only country to vote against the measure.[94] In 2008, Obama signaled that he would change the course from the Bush administration and take steps to limit arms sales internationally. And similar to nearly 2 decades earlier, United States arms sales tripled in 2011.[95] By 2012, Obama had ended negotiations on the U.N. treaty.[96] Is it any surprise, considering Obama received more campaign donations from the Defense Industry than McCain?[97]

One particularly shocking revelation was a program known as 'Fast and Furious', where Barack Obama oversaw the initiation and operation of a gun running scheme where arms were sent over the Mexican border and directly into the hands of criminals.[98]

According to ATF whistleblowers, in 2009 the U.S. government began instructing gun store owners to break the law by selling firearms to suspected criminals. ATF agents then, again according to testimony by ATF agents turned whistleblowers, were ordered not to intercept the smugglers but rather to let the guns "walk" across the U.S.-Mexican border and into the hands of Mexican drug-trafficking organizations." - Forbes

Senior ATF Agent John Dodson, who broke the Fast and Furious story, was alarmed when he noted that the crime rates and violence in Mexico and at the border increased significantly after he began allowing, under order, massive amounts of guns to cross the border into the hands of criminals and cartels.[99]

Domestic Spying

A 1999 BBC article titled "Echelon Spy Network Revealed" began with the paragraph: "Imagine a global spying network that can eavesdrop on every single phone call, fax or e-mail, anywhere on the planet. It sounds like science fiction, but it's true." The network, known as Echelon, traces its roots all the way back to the John F. Kennedy presidency, and had been expanding ever since.[101] In 1992, the Director of the NSA described the goal of the program in simple terms: 'Global Access'.[102] The agenda for mass surveillance was institutionalized long before most Americans recognize.

Then there was George Bush's illegal warrantless wiretapping. Began in 2001, the program allowed the NSA to monitor communications between United States citizens and those abroad without appropriate checks and balances.[103] Interestingly, the groundwork for warrantless wiretapping had actually been laid out by Bill Clinton.[104] During his presidency, he slowly expanded the reach of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) and the capability of the NSA to classify and withhold information about their activities. When the revelations about the program were made in 2006 they were controversial, but Congress repeatedly renewed the NSA's license without much of an uproar from the public.

[104] The history of Warrantless Wiretapping is laid out thoroughly at the Daily Kos Wikipedia. Each event on their timeline has a link to a primary document or an accurate source.

By the 2008 election, citizens were growing weary of the spying program and Barack Obama capitalized on this sentiment. He vowed to end warrantless wiretapping and during his primary campaign he went as far as to say he would filibuster the extension of the FISA legislation, responsible for allowing the expanded spying capabilities.[105]

> “When I'm president, one of the first things I'm going to do is call in my attorney general and say to him or her, I want you to review every executive order that was issued by George Bush, whether it relates to warrantless wiretaps or detaining people or reading e- mails, or whatever it is. I want you to go through every single one of them and if they are unconstitutional, if they're encroaching on civil liberties unnecessarily, we are going to overturn them. We're going to change them.” - Barack Obama, 2007[106]

He first broke this promise after winning the primary campaign, in July 2008, when he was one of 68 Senators who voted to renew the NSA capabilities.[107] Less than a year later, Barack Obama would vastly broaden the legal argument the Executive branch used to justify the spying, and exempted the Government from the possibility of being sued thanks to a liberal interpretation of a clause in the Patriot Act.[108]

> "In other words, beyond even the outrageously broad 'state secrets' privilege invented by the Bush administration and now

On June 6th 2013, it was revealed that Barack Obama oversaw the largest infringement of the Fourth Amendment in the history of the United States with the construction of a veritable surveillance state, capable of tracking the movements and communications of every American citizen. We now know that the NSA and United Kingdom counterpart GHCQ:

- Collect the domestic meta-data of both parties in a phone-call.[109]
- Set up fake internet cafes to steal data.[110]
- Has intercepted the phone calls of at least 35 world leaders, including allies such as German Chancellor Angela Merkel.[111]
- Can tap into the underwater fiber-optic cables that carry a majority of the world's internet traffic.[112]
- Tracks communications within media institutions such as Al Jazeera.[113]

Possibly the most shocking revelation was made on February 24, 2014. Internal documents show that the NSA is attempting to manipulate and control online discourse with "extreme tactics of deception and reputation-destruction."[134] The documents revealed a top-secret unit known as the Joint Threat Research Intelligence Unit, or JTRIG. Two of the core self-identified purposes of JTRIG are to inject all sorts of false material onto the internet in an effort to discredit a target, and to use social sciences such as psychology to manipulate online discourse and activism in order to generate a desirable outcome. The unit posts false information on the internet and falsely attributes it to someone else, pretend to be a 'victim' of a target they want to discredit, and posts negative information on various forums. In some instances, to discredit a target, JTRIG sends out 'false flag' emails to family and friends.

One slide describes the methods to discredit a company: Leak confidential information to the press, post negative information on forums, interfere with business deals and ruin business relationships.

The use of psychological techniques to fracture activist groups and to 'game' online discourse is very interesting. One document describes creating tension in a group by exploiting personal power, pre-existing cleavages and minor ideological differences. In online discourse, another document describes how to use 'mirroring' of language cues, expressions and emotions, and the adjustment of speech, patterns and language to manipulate opinion.

Consider the words of former NSA employee turned whistleblower Russ Tice:

> “Okay. They went after–and I know this because I had my hands literally on the paperwork for these sort of things–they went after high-ranking military officers; they went after members of Congress, both Senate and the House, especially on the intelligence committees and on the armed services committees and some of the–and judicial.
> But they went after other ones, too. They went after lawyers and law firms. All kinds of–heaps of lawyers and law firms. They went after judges. One of the judges is now sitting on the Supreme Court that I had his wiretap information in my hand. Two are former FISA court judges. They went after State Department officials.

They went after people in the executive service that were part of the White House–their own people. They went after antiwar groups. They went after U.S. international–U.S. companies that that do international business, you know, business around the world. They went after U.S. banking firms and financial firms that do international business. They went after NGOs that–like the Red Cross, people like that that go overseas and do humanitarian work. They went after a few antiwar civil rights groups.

So, you know, don't tell me that there's no abuse, because I've had this stuff in my hand and looked at it. And in some cases, I literally was involved in the technology that was going after this stuff. And you know, when I said to [former MSNBC show host Keith] Olbermann, I said, my particular thing is high tech and you know, what's going on is the other thing, which is the dragnet. The dragnet is what Mark Klein is talking about, the terrestrial dragnet. Well my specialty is outer space. I deal with satellites, and everything that goes in and out of space. I did my spying via space. So that's how I found out about this... And remember we talked about that before, that I was worried that the intelligence community now has sway over what is going on.

Now here's the big one. I haven't given you any names. This was is summer of 2004. One of the papers that I held in my hand was to wiretap a bunch of numbers associated with, with a 40-> something-year-old wannabe senator from Illinois. You wouldn't happen to know where that guy lives right now, would you? It's a big white house in Washington, DC. That's who they went after. And that's the president of the United States now." Russ Tice, NSA Whistleblower[135] (Emphasis added)

On March 5, 2014, it was revealed that the CIA, with the knowledge of Barack Obama, spied on members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, the group tasked with overseeing clandestine agency activities and preventing abuses.[136] The implications are complete subversion of oversight on domestic spying. Collectively, the evidence of the burgeoning security state under Barack Obama reveals a global information grid with real time access that targets both domestic citizens and lawmakers in addition to foreign people and governments.

War

It is another common misconception that during Republican presidencies we have periods of war, and during Democratic presidencies we have periods of peace. Of 'official' wars it is certainly the case that the Gulf War, Afghanistan and Iraq war were begun by H.W. and W. Bush. Though it is important to quantify 'official' because there has not been a true declaration of war since World War II. After all, Bill Clinton dropped bombs on no less than four sovereign countries: Iraq, Serbia, Afghanistan, and Sudan.

And Clinton was able to get away with maintaining one of the darkest stains on America's soiled history, the full-force economic sanctions against Iraq that began with the first Gulf war and ended after Saddam's fall in 2003. The sanctions killed 567,000 children according to the British Medical Societies Lancet.[137] (Later studies have argued the number 350,000 children to be more accurate). The total number of deaths including adults is thought to be much higher. United Nations ambassador Madeline Albright, when asked about these numbers, coldly stated "The price is worth it." This statement truly illuminates the attitude of those who set the agenda: Cold indifference to life on the grand chessboard of geopolitics.

Obama's first major act of war was a no-fly zone over Libya which resulted in the removal of Muammar Gaddafi. The media had a well orchestrated propaganda campaign that garnered significant public support.

His second major act of war was the arming of Syrian rebels, undoubtedly prolonging the horrific civil war. Some of the groups that form the opposition are terrorist organizations, which mirrors the policies of Carter and Reagan arming terrorist groups in Afghanistan under Operation Cyclone.[138]

But the true depths of Obama's war mongering resides in his constant and silent drone war. A policy that started under W. Bush, Obama has expanded the use of drones extensively. He has allowed the usage of Signature Strikes, whereby drone operators bomb people they do not know, based on movements they find suspicious.[139] Worst of all is the policy of double tapping, bombing the same scene twice after rescuers have come to try and help their fellow citizens.[140] Obama's drones have even bombed funerals.[141] While the death toll of the Drone war may not be as high as the conventional wars of the Bush family, the moral depravity certainly gives them a run for their money. The argument that drones are an alternative method to direct personnel involvement leaves out these cold facts.

It is important to note the presence of 'blowback': the concept that bombing funerals and responders to attacks will create a whole new generation of terrorists. It is almost a forbidden word in the mainstream media. For example, Ron Paul was ridiculed by pundits across the political spectrum on cable television when he insisted that blowback was a reality. While they deny it in public, many groups secretly relish the idea that their intangible enemy will only grow stronger while their profits grow larger. Drones are helping usher in the era of endless war.

Another aspect of Barack Obama's capacity to wage war lies in his secretive 'kill list', which is a collection of singled out individuals deemed to pose a threat to the United States and have been selected for targeted killing.[142] The list is known to include American citizens such as Anwar Al Alwaki, raising serious questions regarding human rights and legality.[143]

Private Military and Intelligence Contractors

It has always been hard to tell exactly how many private contractors are employed by the Federal government, and how many of those are under the umbrella of the Defense Industry. It was under Reagan that the Pentagon's privatization agenda began, and it has continued ever since. An NYU study on the size of government shows that the use of private contractors increased under the Clinton administration by about 25%.[144] It is known that Clinton hired KBR, at the time owned by Halliburton, to build military bases and support troops in Kosovo.[145]

It was under the administration of George W. Bush, with the Iraq war, when the use of private contractors skyrocketed. By 2008, the number of private contractors in use in Iraq was 155,000, more than the number of troops, a degree of privatization unprecedented in modern warfare.[146] The public became acquainted with the likes of Blackwater under the Bush administration, with events such as the unprovoked massacres in Baghdad and Fallujah.[147]

During his campaign, Obama promised to cut federal spending on private contractors.[148] It soon became clear, however, that much of the stimulus money would go straight to their pockets. His Afghanistan surge was primarily accomplished through contractors, which made up half of the military forces in the country by 2009.[149] The total number of contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan quickly reached 250,000.[150] Security contractors (e.g. private military forces) increased by over 400% under Obama and represent a quarter of all contractors employed by the Pentagon.[151]

The most shocking use of contractors has only recently been revealed. It turns out that they represent a significant amount of the NSA workforce. 483,000 people are employed by private contractors that work with the NSA and have 'Top Secret' access.[152] The potential for illicit spying and extortion represented by these numbers is so high as to reach certainty.

Renditions

The CIA has an official policy of 'rendition', where they send suspected terrorists to be interrogated in foreign countries, bypassing United States torture laws. The process was used extensively during George W. Bush's administration.

But did you know that the process began under Clinton? This PBS Frontline report confirms that the rendition process began in 1995.[153]

In 2007, Obama wrote an article in the Foreign Affairs journal stating:

> "To build a better, freer world, we must first behave in ways that reflect the decency and aspirations of the American people... This means ending the practices of shipping away prisoners in the dead of night to be tortured in far-off countries, of detaining thousands without charge or trial, of maintaining a network of secret prisons to jail people beyond the reach of the law."[154]

Yet by 2013 it has become clear that the process of rendition has continued. The Washington Post has reported that the Obama administration has "embraced rendition" and has consistently resisted lawmakers efforts to reform the policy.[155]

Police Militarization

Under President Bill Clinton, a provision was added to the Defense Appropriations Bill that allowed the Pentagon to transfer unused military assets to local police departments around the country.[156] The program continued through President Bush and has been expanding throughout the Obama presidency.

> "[Fiscal Year] 11 has been a historic year for the program. We reutilized more than $500M, that is million with an M, worth of property in FY 11. This passes the previous mark by several hundred million dollars." - Disposition Services[157]

The equipment gifted to police departments range from assault rifles and bayonets to massive vehicles such as the MRAP, which stands for Mine-Resistant Ambush Protected, of which 500 municipalities received for free from the Department of Defense in 2013.[158]

There is also the troubling trend of the growth of asset forfeiture, the process by which, having granted itself the power to do so, the Government seizes any cash, cars, property and more it can reasonably connect to a crime. This ability incentives sending out specialized, militarized police such as SWAT teams to serve drug warrants, as the teams themselves are expensive to maintain. This program started long before the Obama presidency, but recently it has swelled, with the Justice Department Forfeiture fund reaching $1.8 billion in 2011, with nearly half of a billion being returned to the local police departments that led the raid.[159]

Globalization

A key process in globalization involves removing national sovereignty in favor of trade agreements that favor the rights of corporations. Bill Clinton championed the NAFTA agreement, which among other issues superseded articles in the Mexican constitution, water rights in Canada, and allows corporations to sue nations when they are in violation of the trade act.[160]

Regardless of your opinion on NAFTA and other trade agreements, Obama has taken the concept of corporate power over national sovereignty to a whole new mind-blowing level with the Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement, a trade proposal that only recently became public knowledge when the documents were leaked (Check the footnote to read the whole document).[161] Why the secrecy? The TPP agreement would bestow radical new powers on corporations, including establishing an international tribunal that would override domestic law and would have the power to issue sanctions against governments for failing to abide by their ruling.

The TPP runs contrary to Obama's statement during his 2008 presidential campaign:

> "We will not negotiate bilateral trade agreements that stop the government from protecting the environment, food safety, or the health of its citizens; give greater rights to foreign investors than to U.S. investors; require the privatization of our vital public > services; or prevent developing country governments from adopting humanitarian licensing policies to improve access to life-saving medications."[162]

Congressman Alan Grayson summed it up nicely: "It's all about tying the hands of democratically elected governments, and shunting authority over to the non-elected for the benefit of multinational corporations. It's an assault on democratic government."[163]

The TPP has what is called an 'investor-state dispute settlement mechanism' which allow companies and investors to sue governments for losses of profits due to the government's policies.[164] The deliberations would be undertaken by an international group of corporate lawyers and threatens to overrule democracies and threaten our legal rights. It is not an exaggeration to say that in many instances this agreement gives more power to corporations than governments.

Conclusion

The One-Party State is the result of special interests, economic and military-intelligence having gained a strong enough foothold in Washington to subvert the political process. The saying that power is in guns and money has never been truer. The corruption has been heavily and cleverly obfuscated behind a wall of relentless partisan rhetoric that magnify the small differences between Presidential candidates.

Consider the major initiatives of the Obama presidency. His Affordable Care Act has been championed as a bastion of liberal reform, but in reality it is simply forcing Americans to purchase health plans from private corporations. His raising of the top tax bracket is proffered as proof of a liberal agenda, however the tax burden is still squarely on the middle class. In addition, the wealthiest Americans are virtually unaffected, as their wealth resides in assets and investments, not income. We are left with a platform that is nearly indistinguishable from his predecessors, from which Obama promised significant change.

When George Bush bombs a foreign country, liberals cry foul and protest in droves. When Obama does the same thing, the previous protestors become supporters of the policy. The same phenomenon can be seen on the other side of the aisle. Conservatives are quick to criticize the expansion of programs under Democratic presidents, but stand silent while Reagan and the Bush family oversaw many of the largest expansions of the Federal government and budget in the history of the United States.

It should be clear after even a cursory inspection of the legacies of Presidencies from the last 30 years that there is very little tangible differences between the two parties. The shockingly establishment-oriented agenda of Barack Obama ought to be waking up millions of people to this truth.

Can we work within the system to change the One Party State? How do we approach the 2016 elections knowing that there are no real alternatives to be found within the two parties? Even candidates with exceptionally favorable rhetoric cannot be trusted to translate their platform into actual policies.

It is possible to dismiss the previous two chapters as a result of 'market forces', that endless war and the One-Party state are the result of uncoordinated actors in a free market. Even if this was the case, the implications and subsequent need for reform would be tremendous. The result can accurately be described as the dirty 'F' word: Fascism. I understand that there will be a lot who disagree with this designation; I argue that the term has many different meanings and many prominent people have used it in different ways. If you feel that another term best describes the phenomenon, that is OK, ultimately it is not important what semantics we apply.

Fascism (Or whichever term you prefer) is appropriate because the system has evolved into collusion between the military and economic entities to mutually ensure each others entrenchment. It has grown out of control, and perhaps no evidence is stronger than the fact that the media absolutely refuses to indicate something might be wrong, as they have been enveloped by the system.

Food for Thought:

1. What is responsible for the massive disconnect between lack of differences between Presidential candidates and the vitriolic rhetoric in the media and on Capitol Hill?

2. Why has Barack Obama reversed his position on so much of his campaign platform?

3. What forces are the driving factors in the constant overseas military and economic hegemony?

4. Who is driving the creation of agreements such as the Trans-Pacific Partnership and where does the order of secrecy come from?

5. Which covert institutions could be influencing the policy of elected officials?

Psychopathy, Power and Politics

> “There is no such thing, in the psychopathic universe, as the 'merely weak'. Whoever is weak is also a sucker; that is, someone who demands to be exploited”- Psychologist Robert Rieber[165]

Psychopathy

What exactly does the word mean? Entertainment media bombards us with a particular version of the psychopath, one that is irrational, dangerous and violent. Someone who doesn't fit in, who 'just doesn't seem right'. Is this an accurate description?

Dr. Robert D. Hare, an eminent Psychologist on the subject of psychopathy, portrays the disorder in a drastically different light. In his book Without Conscience, he describes psychopaths as being conscienceless yet rational, not suffering from any insanity or debilitation; instead they are logical, manipulative, predisposed to crime, selfish and without guilt, shame, remorse or empathy.[166] In other words, these men and women are not mentally ill in the sense that we traditionally imagine. Psychopathy is surely an illness, but it is not a neurosis that will manifest symptoms others can easily perceive. Often, the psychopath will be aware of his condition and completely conceal his aberrant traits.

In Without Conscience, Dr. Hare presents numerous case studies and statistics to illuminate the world of the psychopath; the evidence points towards a world full of people programmed for evil. Dr. Hare stresses multiple times that the psychopath is someone who has a strong desire for power and the need to manipulate others, not for personal gain but simply for the sake of manipulation. While some psychopaths are erratic, others have the ability to completely conceal their condition behind a carefully constructed social persona.

[166] When discussing books, I will try my best to find a publicly available PDF; For Without Conscience, I was unable to. You can view the details of the book on Amazon.com here.

Dr. Hare's list of psychopathic personality traits include:

- Displaying glibness and superficial charm
- Being in constant need of stimulation and prone to excessive boredom
- Acting in a conning or manipulative way
- Showing shallow emotional responses
- Acting out promiscuous sexual behavior
- Behaving irresponsibly
- Avoiding long term relationships
- Feeling a grandiose sense of self worth
- Lying repeatedly without remorse
- Lacking any remorse or guilt

- Lacking empathy for others
- Having poor behavioral controls
- Displaying behavioral problems early on in life
- Behaving impulsively
- Failing to accept responsibility for actions
- Displaying signs criminal diversity

Dr. Hare's predecessor Harvey Cleckly, perhaps the first psychologist to study the psychopathic phenomenon decades earlier, compiled a similar list:

- Superficial charm and average intelligence.
- Absence of delusions and other signs of irrational thinking.
- Absence of nervousness or neurotic manifestations.
- Unreliability.
- Untruthfulness and insincerity.
- Lack of remorse or shame.
- Antisocial behavior without apparent compunction.

- Poor judgment and failure to learn from experience.
- Pathological egocentricity and incapacity to love.
- General poverty in major affective reactions.
- Specific loss of insight.
- Unresponsiveness in general interpersonal relations.
- Fantastic and uninviting behavior with drink, and sometimes without.
- Sex life impersonal, trivial, and poorly integrated.

Most of the case studies Dr. Hare presents in his book are from the prison population and anecdotal accounts from those who have been abused. This is a natural, structural problem in the study of psychopathy: the study is limited for the most part to the 'Unsuccessful Psychopath', those who could not conceal their traits or whose social circumstances led to blue-collar crime.

Yet Dr. Hare also spends some significant time devoted to the 'Subdeviant Criminal', the psychopath who has control over his deviance and the ability to hide it from the populace. Instead of the petty criminal, these men and women occupy positions in business, government, industry, and law. Their condition goes entirely unnoticed by the populace; their employers, peers, even their family and those who love them are fooled.

How can such deception be possible? Consider that psychopathy is not an 'acquired' illness. Instead, it has strong genetic components and manifests itself in early childhood.[167] [168] [169] [170] From an early age, the psychopath recognizes that to fit into society in any manner they need to develop to ability to lie extensively. Over time, they become exceptionally good at it. Their entire public persona becomes one complex act, a web of lies to hide their deviant personality.

Sadism

A recent series of studies published in Psychological Science highlights the pleasure that persons with psychopathic tendencies derive from abusing others, by revealing that certain people will often take great pleasure in sadistic behavior, suggesting that in these subjects there is an "intrinsic motivation to inflict suffering on innocent others, even at a personal cost."[171] In one experiment, researcher Erin Buckels, from the University of British Columbia, found that there is a certain subset of people who chose to intensify the discomfort of others through directed white noise once they found that there would be no consequences for their actions. They were also willing to expend extra time and energy to be able to amplify the discomfort they were causing their 'opponent'.

> “The researchers hope that these new findings will help to broaden people’s view of sadism as an aspect of personality that manifests in everyday life, helping to dispel the notion that sadism is limited to sexual deviants and criminals,” - Association for Psychological Science

Erin Buckels concludes that her research may offer valuable insights into domestic abuse, animal abuse, and military & police brutality, through the understanding that disposition to sadism and abuse is a personality trait that manifests itself in every day life. The true insights which can be derived from her work and those of other psychopathy researchers go much deeper than police brutality; they shed much needed light on the widespread relationship between evil and power.

Secondary Psychopathy

Understanding the nature of psychopathy does not reveal the full picture. Numerous researchers have differentiated between 'primary psychopathy', that which is genetic, and 'secondary psychopathy', that which is acquired through environment.[172] [173] [174] Unlike the primary psychopath, who is born with their condition and lacks entirely the capacity for empathy and other higher human emotions, the secondary psychopath occasionally manifests these traits.

In other words, non-psychopathic individuals can exhibit psychopathic behaviors through the conditioning of their environment. Two well known studies in psychology underscore this.

The first is the Milgrim Experiment. A volunteer would be placed at a booth with an apparatus that sends an electric shock to a person in another room. The volunteer believes the man in the other room is a fellow volunteer; in reality he is an actor that is not actually receiving electric shocks. The volunteer asks the actor a series of questions, a wrong answer means the use of an increasingly high voltage of shocking. The volunteer would be prompted by a man in a lab coat to continue administering the shocks long after it had become unsafe. The verbal prodding would range between 'Please continue' and 'You have no other choice, you must continue'. After the shock reached 300 volts, the actor would stop answering, but the man in the lab coat would continue insisting on shocks. Dr. Stanley Milgrim repeatedly found that nearly 2/3rds of people would continue to the maximum voltage of 450, long after they had believed their peer to be incapacitated.

Regarding the experiment, Milgrim wrote:

> “Ordinary people, simply doing their jobs, and without any particular hostility on their part, can become agents in a terrible destructive process. Moreover, even when the destructive effects of their work become patently clear, and they are asked to carry out actions incompatible with fundamental standards of morality, relatively few people have the resources needed to resist authority."

The second experiment is the Stanford Prison Experiment. Volunteers were asked to simulate a prison in Stanford's psychology hall; half of the participants simulated prisoners and the other half guards. The guards were told to make the prisoners feel powerless though not resort to violence. Zimbardo, the lead experimenter, found that many of the guards stepped far beyond the boundaries of what had been predicted, leading to dangerous and psychologically damaging situations. A third of the guards had displayed 'genuine sadistic tendencies'. Some prisoners were emotionally traumatized and had to leave the experiment early. Zimbardo argued that his experiment shows that people internalize authority and submission.

Though the nature of the Stanford Prison experiment does not lend itself to empiricism, it does give some credence to the idea that 'power corrupts' and changes people. Furthermore, an experiment published in August 2012 by the Journal of Experimental Psychology showed definite psychological changes associated with power. It found that people who considered themselves in positions of power literally perceived the world around them differently.[175]

[175] Yapp, Andy et. al. (2012). “The powerful size others down: The link between power and estimates of others' size.” The Journal of Experimental Psychology.(PDF Warning)

We would like to think that humanity has evolved since these experiments took place, and since the atrocities that were revealed after World War II. Unfortunately, this is not the case. In 2008, the Stanley Milgram study was reproduced, with only slight alterations to conform to modern ethical standards, and found the exact same results: A vast majority of participants were willing to inflict significant pain on another human if pressured to do so by perceived authority.[176]

We do not need to rely on psychological studies to see the power of perceived authority causing abuses: we have tangible evidence of the relationship emerging frequently from the War on Terror. Most recently, it was revealed that the CIA made doctors and psychologists working at various Department of Defense institutions violate the ethical codes of their profession in order to become involved with the torture and degrading treatment of terror suspects.[177]

> “Medical professionals were in effect told that their ethical mantra "first do no harm" did not apply, because they were not treating people who were ill.” - The Guardian

The report, compiled by the Taskforce on Preserving Medical Professionalism in National Security Detention Centers, supported by the Institute on Medicine as a Profession (IMAP), found that doctors working with the Department of Defense and CIA routinely participated in waterboarding, sleep deprivation and force-feeding, the latter being against the rules of World Medical Association and the American Medical Association, while gathering and sharing intelligence.

> "The American public has a right to know that the covenant with It's clear that in the name of national security the military trumped that covenant, and physicians were transformed into agents of the military and performed acts that were contrary to medical ethics and practice. We have a responsibility to make sure this never happens again."

> - Dr Gerald Thomson, professor of medicine emeritus at Columbia University and member of the taskforce.

While participation in waterboarding and force-feeding may not be shocking to the desensitized public's sensibilities, it is still very revealing that physicians and psychologists who would otherwise balk at the suggestion that they would violate their professions ethical codes, do so without hesitation when it is done in the name of War. And after all, the United States did sentence Japanese war criminals to death for the act of waterboarding during the International Military Tribunal for the Far East following World War II.[178]

Armed with this context, it is easy to understand the ease with which psychopaths can manipulate institutions and societies. A majority of people do not even have the psychological capacity to refuse authority, at least under situations of pressure. Putting the average citizen in positions of minor authority such as a police officer can cause behavioral and physiological changes in that person, disposing them to abuse. Therefore a psychopath in a position of power essentially has a vast pool of tools at their disposal to act out their twisted desires of manipulation and control.

The Pathocracy

Psychopathy is not a rare phenomenon: Dr. Hare estimates that psychopaths consist of 1% of the population, other psychologists have estimates as high as 4%.[179] That represents between 3 and 12 million Americans, millions of which are the 'Subdeviant Criminals' of Dr. Hare's lexicon, residing in positions of power with a psychological need to control and manipulate others. They are drawn to certain occupations that allow them to wield power over others, such as police, military, intelligence, and finance. Over time, they begin to saturate important institutions, being more ruthless and willing to cause more destruction in their rise up the ladder of power than their competition. In the exact same manner that you and I naturally exclude deviants from our social groups, psychopaths naturally exclude those of us who allow conscience and morality to influence our decisions and perceptions. The result is a web of mutual conditioning of 'evil', where goals and actions become increasingly removed from the institutions original intention. This process has been occurring for centuries in banks, clandestine agencies, military, police departments, and governments, in nearly every instance hiding behind rhetoric and ideology that masks their true nature.

The rise of this process over decades results in a phenomenon known as Pathocracy.

> pathocracy (n). A system of government created by a small pathological minority that takes control over a society.[180]

[179] Harvard Psychologist Martha Stout makes the 4% claim in her book The Sociopath Next Door.

[180] Definition taken from Andrew Lobaczewski, a Polish Psychologist who dedicated his life to studying the Pathocratic phenomenon of the Soviet Bloc. His book Political Ponerology is dense but immensely important, you can read it here.

Pathocracies have existed throughout history and many exist in the present. Unfortunately, there is a considerable amount of evidence that the United States has evolved into such a system of government, where clandestine and financial institutions saturated with psychopaths have gained enough influence to subvert the democratic process. Their rise to power coincided with the draping of a veil over their existence, through powerful propaganda and subtlety in action. This book is the history of the modern American psychopath in a position of power, and the goal is to lift the veil.

Operation Paperclip

> "What you were made to feel was that the country was in desperate peril and we had to do whatever it took to save it." - Hugh Cunningham, CIA Official[181]

As the Western Theater of World War II came to a close, there was a mad rush between the Soviet Union and the United States to be the first army to enter and secure Germany. It was not for consideration of land; that would be meted out later during the Yalta and Potsdam conferences. Nor was it to capture the Nazi leadership and bring them to trial for their heinous crimes against humanity.

In fact, the goal was the opposite. The rush to secure Germany was much more about securing Germany's infrastructure: their leadership and the best minds in intelligence, science and industry. NationalArchives.gov hosts a list of over 1,500 Nazis that were transferred into America, many of them rampant war criminals.[182] It has been released to the public only recently thanks to the Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act. The project that oversaw this endeavor is known as Operation Paperclip and was undertaken by the Office Of Strategic Services, the precursor to the CIA.

President Harry Truman formally ordered the Operation in August 1945, but it had covertly began months earlier, in May. Truman's orders expressly forbid the transfer of any person known "to have been a member of the Nazi Party, and more than a nominal

This directive was not followed, for it would have prevented the acquisition of a lot of prominent Nazis such as Arthur Rudolph, who endorsed the usage of slave labor from concentration camps for the building of the V2 rocket[184] and later became a prominent figure in NASA.[185] More people would die building the V2 rocket- a number estimated at 60,000- than were killed by it in combat.[186]

The dossiers of prominent Nazis brought into the United States such as Wernher von Braun cannot be found on the National Archives sheet; we can conclude that either identities were faked and whitewashed during the process, or the 1,500 names is an incomplete tally. Regardless, we can conclude that the order of Truman was not heeded, and many former Nazis became entrenched within the United States science, intelligence and industrial industries, undoubtedly contributing to a web of psychopathic conditioning.

There are many interesting profiles of war criminals who found employment in the United States after the war. Krunoslav Draganovic, for example, was a Franciscan priest who actively served the Nazi satellite regime in Croatia, where they were responsible for over 350,000 deaths. He also facilitated the escape of numerous Croatian war criminals through the assets of the clergy. After the war, he was hired as a U.S. spy.[187]

Kurt Blome was the director of the Nazi Biological Warfare program and former SS officer. He oversaw Nerve Gas experimentation on prisoners at Auschwitz, and established the bioweapons research center for Heinrich Himmler. One of his experiments involved inoculating prisoners with the plague and recording its progression.[188] He was hired by the US Army Chemical Corps in 1951 to work on chemical warfare research.[189]

The most interesting case study is that of Reinhard Gehlen, a Major General in the German Wehrmacht, close confidant of Hitler, and head of the German Army Intelligence on the Eastern Front. The OSS found that Gehlen's knowledge of the Soviets that he had gained during World War II was so important that not only did they let him keep his job, he was able to maintain a vast majority of his infrastructure. What became known as the Gehlen organization functioned as a semi-autonomous intelligence unit for the United States and West Berlin, and employed over 100 former Gestapo and SS officers.[190]

Our allies said, 'You are putting Nazis at the senior levels of your intelligence', and they were right. The Gehlen organization was the primary source of intelligence that claimed that, 'The Soviets were about to attack West Germany' ...that was the biggest bunch of baloney then and it is still a bunch of baloney today. Gehlen had to make his money by creating a threat that we were afraid of, so we would give him more money to tell us about it. The Gehlen organization had been penetrated by Soviet intelligence and many of the US Nazi assets were now double agents, taking CIA wages and turning around and selling information to the enemy." - Victor Marchetti, CIA Veteran and former Chief of Soviet Strategic War Plans[191]

The lack of internal security in the Gehlen Organization was egregious. One former Army Counter-Intelligence Corps officer lamented:

> "Recruiting methods then employed were so loose that former German Officers and noncoms were blindly being approached to work for American Intelligence in espionage activity directed against the USSR."[192]

Not only did this mean that the Gehlen Organization became saturated with radical Nazis and other fascist elements, it also served as an easy entry of infiltration by the Soviet Union. The organization functioned semi-autonomously so strict controls over their operations was impossible.

The Soviet press did not hesitate to use the Gehlen Organization as an effective propaganda tool, pointing out that the West had maintained the very intelligence unit that was responsible for a long series of crimes against humanity along the Eastern Front of the War. Future Director of Central Intelligence Richard Helms stated that:

> "The reports in the Soviet-dominated press in Germany concerning the use of former German staff and intelligence is such that there is no question that the Russians know this operation is going on even though they got some of the details wrong... Certainly the fact that so much publicity has been given to this indicates serious flaws in the Operation."[193]

One official CIA document titled "Forging an Intelligence Partnership: The CIA and the Origins of the BND, 1945-49", noted that the Gehlen Organization would take CIA assets that they received and then sell them on the black market for more funds.[194] The reference is vague but likely refers to selling arms and ammunition to various underground right wing elements.

Consider this: At the end of the War, the Office of Strategic Services was a small organization of 13,000 members[195], and the Gehlen organization consisted of at least 4,000 members by the year 1949.[196] Can we accurately say that United States intelligence absorbed the Nazi infrastructure without considering how much of an influence it had on the beginnings of these clandestine institutions?

Further Complicity

Although the Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act has been a wealth of information regarding the early relationships between the CIA and former Nazi's, there is still a lot that we do not know.

> “The Central Intelligence Agency is refusing to provide hundreds of thousands of pages of documents sought by a government working group under a 1998 law that requires full disclosure of classified records related to Nazi war criminals, say Congressional officials from both parties.” - New York Times[197]

The New York Times article goes on to describe how the CIA has interpreted the Nazi War Crimes Act in an exceptionally narrow fashion, refusing to release many more documents.

> “Historians who have studied the documents made public so far have said that at least five associates of the Nazi leader Adolf Eichmann, the architect of Hitler's campaign to exterminate Jews, had worked for the CIA.”

[197] New York Times, “C.I.A. Said to Rebuff Congress on Nazi Files,” January 30, 2005

Though we can only speculate, it is possible that some of these suppressed files contain collaboration with other elements who assisted in protecting Nazis during and after the fall of the Third Reich. For example, the Red Cross and the Vatican collaborated to smuggle thousands of war criminals to safety immediately after the fall of Nazi Germany.[198] They used underground passages known as 'ratlines' to keep the men out of sight. The Red Cross issued legitimate travel documents to many Nazi members: it is estimated that over 8,000 SS members ended up in Britain and Canada alone. These revelations shed light on how prominent Nazis such as Adolf Eichmann and Dr. Josef Mengele were able to escape from Germany and hide from Allied authorities and hide out for decades.

Food for Thought:

1. What effect did the influx of Nazis have on the agenda of the CIA and other institutions that they inhabited?

2. Why was OSS leadership so interested in providing safety for high profile Nazi's, despite the wishes of the President?

3. Is it possible that the friendly post-war relationship between the Gehlen Organization and the CIA indicates a form of relationship during and before the war as well?

MK-ULTRA

> “In the 1950's and early 1960's, the agency gave mind-altering drugs to hundreds of unsuspecting Americans in an effort to explore the possibilities of controlling human consciousness. Many of the human guinea pigs were mental patients, prisoners, drug addicts and prostitutes -- "people who could not fight back," as one agency officer put it. In one case, a mental patient in Kentucky was dosed with LSD continuously for 174 days.” - New York Times[199]

MK-ULTRA is the codename given to a CIA research operation into biological behavioral engineering, also known as mind control. Many people are familiar with the operation but incorrectly assume that it was limited to LSD research. While there were plenty of resources devoted to LSD research, it was only one area of a vast field of mind control operations. MK-ULTRA researcher Ike Feldman said himself that:

> “The LSD... that was just the tip of the iceberg... Espionage. Assassinations. Dirty tricks. Drug experiments. Sexual encounters and the study of prostitutes for clandestine use. That is what I was doing when I worked for George White and the CIA.”[200]

MK-ULTRA had several precursors. There was Project Chatter in 1947, which tested drugs such as the infamous Scopalmine during interrogations.[201] There was Project Bluebird in 1949, which began studies into hypnosis.[202] The document describing the initiation of Project Bluebird outlines these special problems, among many others, that they were hoping to address:

- Can we in a matter of an hour, two hours, one day, etc., induce an hypnotic condition in an unwilling subject to such an extent that he will perform an act for our benefit?
- Can we create by post-hypnotic control an action contrary to an individual's basic moral principles?
- Can we guarantee total amnesia under any and all conditions?
- Can we "alter" a person's personality? How long will it hold?
- Can we devise a system for making unwilling subjects into willing agents and then transfer that control to untrained agency agents in the field by use of codes or identifying signs or credentials?[203]

Project Artichoke began in 1951, with a scope of ... "Can we get control of an individual to the point where he will do our bidding against his will and even against fundamental laws of nature, such as self-preservation?"[204] All of the above projects were shuttled into MK-ULTRA in 1953, under the Technical Services Division, combining over 150 sub-projects[205], undertaken at over 80 institutions[206] such as universities, hospitals, prisons and pharmaceutical companies. Many of the projects were covertly ran through front organizations without the knowledge of the institution that hosted them.

The experiments and operations under MK-ULTRA have been shrouded in extreme secrecy. When it was enacted, then-CIA Director Allen Dulles exempted the program from normal financial controls, allowed the Technical Services Staff to begin experiments without contracts or written agreements with leadership, and ordered the financial office to pay any cost blindly on the signature of Sidney Gottlieb.[207] CIA Document 17748 states that:

> "There are just two individuals in TSD who have full substantial knowledge of the program and most of that knowledge is unrecorded. Both are highly skilled, highly motivated, professionally competent individuals. Part of their competence lies in their command of intelligence tradecraft. In protecting the sensitive nature of the American intelligence capability to manipulate human behavior, they apply "need to know" doctrine

> TSD has pursued a policy of minimum documentation in keeping with the high sensitivity of some of the projects... The lack of consistent records precludes use of routine inspection procedures and raised a variety of questions regarding management and fiscal controls."[208]

The two individuals the document refers to are likely Sidney Gottleib, the director of MK-ULTRA, and Richard Helms, the Deputy Director of the CIA. In 1973, when Richard Helms became the Director of the CIA, he ordered all of the available MK-ULTRA files to be destroyed.[209] Thanks to a clerical error, about 20,000 files survived the destruction order. However, not only were most of the files destroyed, but many experiments were so sensitive that they were never recorded in the first place, so we must understand that as brutal and astonishing as the recorded experimentation is, we are only seeing the tip of the iceberg.

Another file, MK-ULTRA document 87624, states:

> "6% of the projects are of such an ultra-sensitive nature that they cannot and should not be handled by means of contracts which would associate CIA or the Government with the work in

The first 'well-defined field of endeavor' described by the document is developing the capability of biological and chemical weapons for the purpose of mind control. The second field of endeavor is entirely redacted from the document.

Ewan Cameron

Dr. Ewan Cameron was a Scottish-born Psychiatrist who worked in the United States since World War II and subsequently accepted an invitation to contract for the CIA. He would commute to the McGill University system in Canada to conduct experiments on brainwashing, 'psychic driving' and other forms of psychological torture. Cameron had a theory that a person with a psychological illness such as schizophrenia would benefit from having their brain essentially wiped clean, presuming the patient would redevelop their cognitive functions without the disorder. The CIA felt that brainwashing had obvious intelligence applications.[211]

[210] Document available here.

Dr. Cameron had a 'depattering' program he used to erase the minds of his patients that began with 15 – 30 days of 'sleep therapy' (sometimes lasting as long as 65 days), where the patient would sleep all day and night, with the exception of three brief periods where a sleep-inducing drug cocktail and electroshock therapy would be administered. Cameron's electroshock therapy has been documented to be between 20 – 40 times more intense than the professional standard at the time. Instead of 110 volts at a fraction of a second, Cameron used 150 volts for an initial shock lasting 1 full second, and then between 5 and 9 additional shocks during the convulsions of the patient, using a muscle relaxant to prevent permanent damage. The next step was to play taped messages to a patient 16 hours a day for multiple months in an attempt to program the desired behavior.[212]

Over half of his patients have suffered permanent amnesia of their lives before their 'depattering'. They were not told that they would be participating in experiments prior to their admittance. A large group of Cameron's victims brought a lawsuit against the CIA in 1988 which was settled out of court, so the agency would not have to admit any official wrongdoing.

Why the interest in electroshock? CIA Document 190885 reveals that the CIA was interested in the "guaranteed amnesia" that electric shock often resulted in.[213]

'Front' Organizations

> “The C.I.A. used a front organization called the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology to help pay for the work of Dr. Cameron, a psychiatrist who directed the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal. Dr. Cameron died in 1967.
> The money was provided to Dr. Cameron as part of the C.I.A.'s effort in the 1950's and 60's to develop drugs or techniques that could control human behavior.
> Patients of Dr. Cameron were subjected to a regimen that included heavy doses of LSD and barbiturates, the application of powerful electric shocks two or three times a day, and prolonged periods of drug-induced sleep. According to Government records, the patients and their relatives were not told they were taking part in experiments.
> Joseph Rauh, another lawyer for the plaintiffs, said many of Dr. Cameron's patients 'were very greatly damaged by the experiments.'” - New York Times[214]

The use of 'fronts', meaning a private enterprise secretly owned by the CIA to conceal affiliations with the agency, is standard practice and widespread through MK-ULTRA. The Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology was nominally associated with Stanford and considered to be relatively prestigious in the field. It would often award 'cover grants' to conceal that the bulk of its research had military intelligence applications.[215]

Unwitting Testing

The CIA had an official policy of 'terminal experiments', which essentially meant surreptitious administration of drugs to discover how subjects would react when they were not aware they were being experimented on. The justification was that it was the only way to truly discover the reactions of the mind under stress and exposed to various mind control chemicals. The policy was upheld even after it led to deaths. One high profile fatality was that of Dr. Frank Olson, a scientist from the Army Chemical Corps' Special Operations Division. During a joint Army-CIA gathering at Deep Creek Lodge in the woods of Northern Maryland, Sidney Gottlieb added LSD to the drinks of the few men in attendance, and did not inform them until the effects started to begin.

Dr. Frank Olson was one of these men, and unlike his peers, he was not able to handle the effects of the psychedelic. His colleagues described his reaction as 'psychotic'. He survived the trip, but entered a deep depression and ended up jumping out a window of the window of a New York hotel a week later.

[215] Document available here.

The death of Dr. Olsen prompted an internal review by the CIA of surreptitious testing, but the policy was resumed just a few months later. One CIA document, issued nearly a decade after Olsen's death, affirmed the internal consensus of unwitting administration of drugs: "(Officers) argued for the continuation of unwitting testing, using as the principal point that controlled testing cannot be depended upon for accurate results. General Carter, Mr. Kirkpatrick, and I do not disagree with this point."[216]

Another aspect of unwitting testing involves experimentation of children. Although most of MK-ULTRA experiments on minors has been covered up, a New York Times article from 1995 reveals a disturbing glimpse, stating that:

> "About 9000 Americans, including children and newborns,were used in 154 radiation tests sponsored by the Atomic Energy Commission, the Energy Department's Cold War predecessor, Government officials said today... Some participated with little or no knowledge of risks they faced."[217]

One program uncovered during the internal CIA review by centered around George White, a CIA associate who formally worked for the Federal Bureau of Narcotics. The CIA considered White's position ideal, as it gave him unrestricted access to a variety of drugs without suspicion. Under CIA auspices, George White set up 'safehouses' in New York and later San Francisco, fully equipped with covert video and audio surveillance equipment. The goal was to study the use of prostitutes for covert intelligence.[218]

> “TSS officials wanted to find out everything they could about how to apply sex to spying, and the prostitute project became a general learning and then training ground for CIA carnal operations. After all, states one TSS official, "We did quite a study of prostitutes and their behavior.... At first nobody really knew how to use them. How do you train them? How do you work them? How do you take a woman who is willing to use her body to get money out of a guy to get things which are much more important, like state secrets. I don't care how beautiful she is—educating the ordinary prostitute up to that level is not a simple task.” - John Marks

In addition to studying the use of prostitutes for clandestine use, the safehouses were used to administer drugs to the unwitting solicitors, after which the various effects would be recorded. At least a couple CIA veterans were willing to discuss the use of these safehouses for a more sinister operation: entrapment. John Marks' research of the over

[218] 1977 Joint Hearing Before the Select Committee on Intelligence (PDF Warning)

20,000 declassified documents into MK-ULTRA shortly after their release in the mid 70's revealed the following shocking information:

> “Gottlieb did not limit his interest to drugs. He and other TSS officials wanted to try out surveillance equipment. CIA technicians quickly installed see-through mirrors and microphones through which eavesdroppers could film, photograph, and record the action. "Things go wrong with listening devices and two-way mirrors, so you build these things to find out what works and what doesn't," says a TSS source. "If you are going to entrap, you've got to give the guy pictures [flagrante delicto] and voice recordings. Once you learn how to do it so that the whole thing looks comfortable, cozy, and safe, then you can transport the technology overseas and use it." This TSS man notes that the Agency put to work in the bedrooms of Europe some of the techniques developed in the George White safehouse operation.”[219]

James Keehner, a former CIA psychologist, recalled his involvement in one entrapment case, in which he analyzed a nurse who had 'offered her body' for her country:

> "We wanted her to sleep with this Russian... Either the Russian > would fall in love with her and defect, or we'd blackmail him. I had to see if she could sleep with him over a period of time and not get involved emotionally. Boy, was she tough!"[220]

Keehner noted that he became disillusioned with entrapment cases, but that other officers 'got their jollies' from this type of work. Regarding his typical assignment, Keehner stated:

> "I was sent to deal with the most negative aspects of the human condition. It was planned destructiveness. First, you'd check to see if you could destroy a man's marriage. If you could, then that would be enough to put a lot of stress on the individual, to break him down. Then you might start a minor rumor campaign against him. Harass him constantly. Bump his car in traffic. A lot of it is ridiculous, but it may have a cumulative effect."

Knowing that some officers got their 'jollies' from entrapment operations, and that safehouses were installed in the United States, the question “Were entrapment techniques ever used against United States officials or other domestic people of importance?” is logically raised.

Personality Assessment

Although MK-ULTRA was originally devoted to biological mind control, it quickly evolved into a program dedicated to understanding all aspects of the human psyche. George White's experiments tested how people reacted to entrapment, and other experiments tested how different types of people responded to alcohol. It is with this context that the CIA contacted Psychologist John Gittinger to become an instrumental part of MK-ULTRA.

Gittinger had developed the Personality Assessment System, a test which would be administered to give fascinating insights into a person's personality and had distinct variables that separated his work from other known personality tests at the time such as the famous Weschler exam. Like Ewan Cameron, Gittinger received funding through the Human Ecology Society to research what type of personality would be likely to defect from their country, both to target foreign agents and to weed out domestic ones.

At one point, Gittinger traveled to work with George White to use his test on prostitutes and homosexuals to refine his assessment test to figure out what type of sexual orientation someone likely had, and to figure out who had sexually deviant tendencies. One of Gittinger's colleagues stated that he knew of cases where the Personality Assessment System was used to identify targets for entrapment, both heterosexual and homosexual.[221]

[221] John Marks

One particularly useful application of the Personality Assessment System was to identify people who would be easily hypnotized. It has likely been used extensively to hand-pick subjects and employees on sensitive projects within and beyond MK-ULTRA, assessing peoples personalities to discover who would retain secrecy and loyalty.

Interestingly, Gittinger was familiar enough with his test that he was able to observe someones behavior and then retroactively apply the attributes to determine their personality type. By observing how a man held his cigarette, handled his alcohol, or interacted with women, Gittinger could profile that person and determine their weaknesses and propensity for exploitation through entrapment or other means.

One logical application of the Personality Assessment System is the ability to assign certain people to a program that required secrecy, by determining how loyal an agent or asset would be to the Agency.

Hypnotism

In mainstream culture, hypnotism is viewed as a type of 'science fiction', confined to the realm of magic tricks and entertainment. The truth is that hypnotism is very real and used both in mainstream psychology and in military intelligence.

Hypnotism was used by the United States military before the creation of the CIA, during World War II. Psychologist Dr. George H. Estabrooks recalled his involvement in the clandestine program to Science Digest in 1971, in an article titled “Hypnotism Comes of Age”.

> “One of the most fascinating but dangerous applications of hypnosis is its use in military intelligence. This is a field with which I am familiar through formulating guidelines for the techniques used by the United States in two world wars.
> Communication in war is always a headache. Codes can be broken. A professional spy may or may not stay bought. Your own man may have unquestionable loyalty but his judgment is always open to question.
> The “hypnotic courier,” on the other hand, provides a unique solution. I was involved in preparing many subjects for this work during World War II. One successful case involved an Army Service Corps Captain whom we’ll call George Smith. Captain Smith had undergone months of training. He was an excellent subject but did not realize it. I had removed from him, by post hypnotic suggestion, all recollection of ever having been hypnotized.
> First I had the Service Corps call the captain to Washington and tell him they needed a report on the mechanical equipment of Division X headquartered in Tokyo. Smith was ordered to leave by jet next morning, pick up the report and return at once. These orders were given him in the waking state. Consciously, that was all he knew, and it was the story he gave his wife and friends.

Then I put him under deep hypnosis, and gave him—orally—a vital message to be delivered directly on his arrival in Japan to a certain colonel—let's say his name was Brown—of military intelligence. Outside of myself, Colonel Brown was the only person who could hypnotize Captain Smith. This is "locking." I performed it by saying to the hypnotized Captain: "Until further orders from me, only Colonel Brown and I can hypnotize you. We will use the signal phrase 'the moon is clear.' Whenever you hear this phrase from Brown or myself you will pass instantly into deep hypnosis." When Captain Smith re-awakened, he had no conscious memory of what happened in trance. All that he was aware of was that he must head for Tokyo to pick up the division report.

On arrival there, Smith reported to Brown, who hypnotized him with the signal phrase. Under hypnosis, Smith delivered my message and received one to bring back. Awakened, he was given the division report and returned home by jet. There I hypnotized him once more with the signal phrase, and he spieled off Brown's answer that had been dutifully tucked away in his unconscious mind.

The system is virtually foolproof. As exemplified by the case, the information literally was “locked” in Smith’s unconscious for retrieval by the only two people who knew the combination. The subject had no conscious memory of what happened, so couldn’t spill the beans. No one else could hypnotize him even if they might know the signal phrase...”

“The potential for military intelligence has been nightmarish. During World War II, I worked this technique with a vulnerable Marine lieutenant I’ll call Jones. Under the watchful eye of Marine intelligence I split his personality into Jones A and Jones B. Jones A, once a “normal” working Marine, became entirely different. He talked communist doctrine and meant it. He was welcomed enthusiastically by communist cells, and was deliberately given a dishonorable discharge by the Corps (which was in on the plot) and became a card-carrying party member.

The joker was Jones B, the second personality, formerly apparent in the conscious Marine. Under hypnosis, this Jones had been carefully coached by suggestion. Jones B was the deeper personality, knew all the thoughts of Jones A, was a loyal American and was “imprinted” to say nothing during conscious phases.

All I had to do was hypnotize the whole man, get in touch with Jones B, the loyal American, and I had a pipeline straight into the Communist camp. It worked beautifully for months with this subject, but the technique backfired. While there was no way for > an enemy to expose Jones' dual personality, they suspected it and played the same trick on us later." - Science Digest, April 1971[222]

It is pretty shocking to see that Estabrooks was willing to completely destroy the life of a marine by relegating his primary personality to an 'alternate' that would only appear when accessed through hypnosis. It is more shocking that such an application of hypnotism is even possible. He noted that the potential for military intelligence was nightmarish but felt content that his knowledge was being used for the United States instead of the Nazis or the Russians. Unfortunately, corrupt elements in the United States, namely the CIA, would capitalize on this knowledge for illicit means in the near future.

There are a variety of CIA documents released through the Freedom of Information Act that shed light on their hypnotism activities. One particularly disturbing example is MK-ULTRA document 190691. It describes an experiment where an unnamed CIA official hypnotized two subjects, both 19 year old women. In an awakened state, they expressed deep disgust in the idea of holding a gun, yet when hypnotized, one was willing to grab it and fire at her peer (the gun was unloaded and no one was hurt.) It states:[223]

> "[Redacted] was then instructed (having previously expressed a fear of firearms in any fashion) that she would use every method at her disposal to awaken [redacted] (now in a deep hypnotic sleep) and failing in this, she would pick up a pistol nearby and > fire it at [redacted]. She was instructed that her rage would be so great she would not hesitate to “kill” [redacted] for failing to awake. [Redacted] carried out these suggestions to the letter, including firing the (unloaded pneumatic) pistol at [redacted] and then proceeding to fall into a deep sleep. After proper suggestions were made, both were awakened and expressed complete amnesia for the entire sequence.”

Not only was the CIA officer able to coerce otherwise peaceful subjects into violence, he was able to remove any memories of the event after they 'woke up' from the hypnotism.

Subject: Hypnotic Experimentation and Research, 10 February 1954.

On Wednesday, 10 February 1954, hypnotic experimentation and research work was continued in Building 13 by Mr [redacted] using the following subjects: Misses [redacted] and [redacted]

The group of five subjects appeared on schedule. The [redacted] operator expecting only three subjects, namely Miss [redacted] and [redacted] was forced to alter his plans somewhat due to the unexpected arrival of two more subjects.

A

Plans were originally made to conduct experiments in color blindness, blindness and intoxication. These plans were altered to permit first, the subjects to present questions and discussions. (This was to permit the operator to spot any subjects who were critically analyzing their progress.) Several questions were presented and promptly clarified to the satisfaction of the subjects. In this discussion it was obvious that Misses [redacted] and [redacted] were beginning to lose confidence in themselves. From this point on the work proceeded as follows:

1. A posthypnotic of the night before (pointed finger, you will sleep) was enacted. Misses [redacted] and [redacted] immediately progressed to a deep hypnotic state with no further suggestion. This was to test whether the mere carrying out of the posthypnotic would produce the state of hypnosis desired. Needless to say, it did.

2. Miss [redacted] was then instructed (having previously expressed a fear of firearms in any fashion) that she would use every method at her disposal to awaken Mis [redacted] now in a deep hypnotic sleep) and failing in this, she would pick up a pistol nearby and fire it at M [redacted] She was instructed that her rage would be so great that she would not hesitate to "kill" [redacted] for failing to awaken. Mi [redacted] carried out these suggestions to the letter including firing the (unloaded pneumatic pistol) gun at [redacted] and then proceeding to fall into a deep sleep. After proper suggestions were made, both were awakened and expressed complete amnesia for the entire sequence. M [redacted] was again handed the gun, which she refused (in an awakened state) to pick up or accept from the operator. She expressed absolute denial that the foregoing sequence had happened.

[redacted] being in a complete SI state at this time, was then told to open her eyes and was shown an electric timing device. She was informed that this timing device was an incendiary bomb and was then instructed how to attach and set the device. After [redacted] had indicated that she had learned how to set and attach the device, she was told to return to a sleep state and further instructed that upon concluding the aforementioned conversation, she would take the timing device which was in a briefcase and procede to the ladies room. In the ladies room, she would be met by a girl whom she had never seen who would identify herself by the code word "New York". After identifying herself, [redacted]s then to show this individual how to attach and set the timing device and further instructions would be given the individual by [redacted] that the timing device was to be carried in the briefcase to [redacted]room, placed in the nearest empty electric-light plug and concealed in the bottom, left-hand drawer of [redacted] desk, with the device set for 82 seconds and turned on. [redacted] was further instructed to tell this other girl that as soon as the device had been set and turned on, she was to take the briefcase, leave [redacted]room, go to the operations room and go to the sofa and enter a deep sleep state. [redacted] was further instructed that after completion of instructing the other girl and the transferring to the other girl of the incendiary bomb, she was to return at once to the operations room, sit on the sofa, and go into a deep sleep state.

For a matter of record, immediately after the operation was begun it was noted that a member of the charforce was cleaning the floor in the ladies room and subsequently, both [redacted] and [redacted] had to be placed at once again in a trance state and instructions changed from the ladies room to Room 3.

It should be noted that even with the change of locale in the transfer point, the experiment was carried off perfectly without any difficulty or hesitation on the part of either of the girls. Each girl acted out her part perfectly, the device was planted and set as directed and both girls returned to the operations room, sat on the sofa and entered a deep sleep state. Throughout, their meovements were easy and natural and the member of the charforce and the guard were, to all intents and purposes, completely unaware of what was taking place although they could clearly observe the movements of [redacted] and [redacted]

MK-ULTRA Document 190527

MK-ULTRA Document 190527 reveals that through hypnotic suggestion, one subject was coerced into setting up an incendiary bomb and leaving the device in a bathroom.[224] The document states that even with unforeseen problems in location availability during the hypnotic state, the experiment was:

224Document available here.

> “...carried off without any difficulty or hesitation on the part of either of the girls... Throughout, their movements were easy and natural, and (bystanders) were, to all intents and purposes, completely unaware of what was taking place although they could clearly observe the movements of [redacted] and [redacted].”

Dr. Estabrooks once noted that only 1 in 5 people were susceptible to hypnotism in this manner. True to form, the CIA researched ways to improve to hypnotic susceptibility in their subjects, and found some success by combining techniques with administering drugs. A document titled Continuation of Studies on Hypnosis and Suggestibility states:

> “Preliminary clinical research during 1955-56 has yielded promising leads in terms of knowledge of how hypnotizability can be influenced by pharmacological means. Several drugs have been identified that apparently are effective in speeding the induction of a hypnotic state...”[225]

The two cited CIA documents describe the unwitting hypnosis of two young women for the use of experimentation. What is the possibility that psychopaths would use this knowledge to exploit women sexually? Perhaps the most disturbing CIA document I have come across is numbered 140393 and details a CIA interview with a professional hypnotist who was asked to give an instructional course in hypnotism to CIA agents. It states:

[225] Document available here.

> “On July 2 1951 approximately 1:00 pm the instruction began with [redacted] relating to the student some of his sexual experiences. [Redacted] stated that he constantly used hypnotism as a means of inducing young girls to engage in sexual intercourse with him. [Redacted], a performer in [redacted] orchestra was forced to engage in sexual intercourse with [redacted] while under the influence of hypnotism. [Redacted] stated that he first put her into a hypnotic trance and then suggested to her that he was her husband and she desired sexual intercourse with him. [Redacted] further stated that many times while going home he would use hypnotic suggestion to have a girl turn around and talk to him and suggest sexual intercourse to him and that as a result of these suggestions he spent approximately five nights a week away from his home engaging in sexual intercourse.”[226]

It is nothing short of terrifying to read how interested the CIA was in methods of rape. The fact that this was beyond any application to intelligence is an afterthought. The document finishes by describing how the student of the hypnotism instructor was able to successfully use his newly-learned techniques on new subjects, indicating that hypnotism was able to spread throughout the ranks of the CIA relatively effortlessly.

When Operation Bluebird first began, marking the beginnings of research into hypnosis, one early document revealed a surprising goal:

> “Can we "condition" by post-hypnotic suggestion agency employees (or persons of interest to this agency) to prevent them from giving information to any unauthorized source or for committing any act on behalf of a foreign or domestic enemy?”[227]

This raises the distinct and disturbing possibility that the act of hypnotizing agency members for the purpose of altering their behavior became a common practice at the CIA under MK-ULTRA, with the power of what suggestions to induce at the hands of only two psychopathic men.

Conclusion

Upon MK-ULTRA becoming public knowledge in 1971, the CIA was quick to claim that the program was halted due to a lack of production. The available evidence clearly shows that this is a lie. From the documents that survived Director Helm's destruction order, we can already see the potential for a 'Manchurian candidate': a mind controlled assassin.

So what happened to MK-ULTRA? 14 year CIA veteran Victor Marchetti has stated in numerous interviews that the claim MK-ULTRA was halted was merely a cover-story, and that the operation went completely black, in other words, research continued at the highest level of secrecy.[228]

Is it possible that academic research into hypnosis and other organic forms of mind control have been deliberately marginalized from mainstream entertainment, media and academics in order to keep its potential use within a military-industrial complex a secret? After all, MK-ULTRA researcher Dr. Ewan Cameron became the president of the World Psychiatric Association in 1961 and also served as presidents of the Canadian and American Psychiatric Associations.[229]

It is important to reiterate that not only does the available evidence of MK-ULTRA comprise a portion of the documents that were created, but many of the experiments were never recorded in the first place. The operation was presided over by only two individuals who had a complete knowledge of the operations. Not even the Director of the CIA had full access. When John F. Kennedy appointed John McCone as the new director in the wake of the Bay of Pigs fiasco, Richard Helms declined to inform him about the more sensitive MK-ULTRA operations, such as George White's safehouses.[230]

Ultimately, the goal of MK-ULTRA was not to find the 'holy grail' of mind control but to map out a complete knowledge of human nature and the human mind, and then find ways to exploit it. This was done on both individual and group levels. We have no idea how much was accomplished towards this goal, or how much more developed the mind control research has gotten in the 50 years that have passed since the available documents were last issued. After all, if this is what the CIA was able to accomplish in the 1950's, what are they capable of today?

Food for Thought:

1. What kind of experiments were detailed in the documents that were destroyed after Director Helm's orders?

2. What kind of experiments were never recorded and why did they require such a high level of secrecy?

3. Do any recent instances of terrorism or assassinations sound similar to the documented instances of hypnotically induced susceptibility to carry out acts of violence?

4. What kind of power does mind control represent in the hands of a psychopath?

5. How widespread was the entrapment program and is it possible that it ended up targeting U.S. Politicians? Military leaders? Businessmen?

6. What is responsible for the complete lack of knowledge of MK-ULTRA among the public?

7. What was the purpose of associating trauma through electro-shock and other means with mind control?

8. What new means of mind control have emerged with new technology?

Operation Gladio

“In Europe's new order, they are the spies who never quite came in from the cold, foot soldiers in an underground guerrilla network with one stated mission: To fight an enemy that most Europeans believe no longer exists.

Theirs is a tale of secret arms caches and exotic code names, of military stratagems and political intrigues.

At best, their tale is no more than a curious footnote to the cold war. The question is if, at worst, it could be the key to unsolved terrorism dating back two decades...

The focus of the inquiry is a clandestine operation code-named Gladio, created decades ago to arm and train resistance fighters in case the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies invaded.

All this week, there have been disclosures of similar organizations in virtually all Western European countries, including those that do not belong to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.” New York Times[231]

[231] New York Times, “Evolution in Europe: Italy Discloses its Web of Cold War Guerillas.” November 6, 1990

How far would the United States go to prevent the spread of communism in Western Europe? Especially considering the constant false information provided by Reinhard Gehlen and his Organization indicating that a Soviet invasion was imminent? The answer is Operation Gladio: The CIA and NATO campaign to create, arm and fund radical right wing 'stay behind' organizations that would fight communism to the death. When the Soviet invasion never happened, these organizations created networks with politicians and within the black market, and turned their goals towards preventing the rise of leftist political movements, often resorting to terrorism to create domestic tension, causing citizens to turn towards increasingly fascist governments to provide protection. Today, this process is known as the 'Strategy of Tension'.

Italy

It was Judge Felice Casson who first dredged up the evidence for state sponsored terrorism, while browsing the archives of the Italian military secret service.[232] In a BBC documentary on Operation Gladio, Casson described the operations as an effort...

> “To create tension within the country to promote conservative, reactionary social and political tendencies. While this strategy was being implemented, it was necessary to protect those behind > it because evidence implicating them was being discovered. Witnesses withheld information to cover right-wing extremists."[233]

Casson points to a 1972 car bombing in Peteano,that killed three paramilitary police and was blamed on leftists, after which 200 Communists were immediately arrested. He found that there were no police investigations of the scene, and the official report was a forgery[234]. In fact, it was perpetrated by a right-wing terrorist named Vincenzo Vinciguerra[235], operating under Gladio orders, who later confessed to the crime. Vinciguerra's testimony reveals that it was easy to escape and remain hidden because everyone in the Italian security apparatus shared his anti-Communist convictions.[236] His testimony further revealed "a secret organisation, a super-organisation with a network of communications, arms, and explosives, and men trained to use them."[237] Years later, in prison, he would claim "I say that every single outrage that followed from 1969 fitted into a single organised matrix."[238] Nearly 2,000 people would die from political murder or acts of terrorism over this period of time.

When ex-Prime Minister Andreotti finally testified in 1990, he revealed that arms and equipment were provided by the CIA and placed in 139 underground caches across the country. General Giandelio Maletti, a former head of Italian counterintelligence, in March 2001 confirmed the CIA involvement. He stated that after the Piazza Fontana bombing in 1969, pieces of a bomb were planted in a leftist editors villa in order to blame the communists. He stated:

Turkey

Another Gladio hotspot was Turkey. During the Cold War, Turkey shared a third of the total borders with the Soviet bloc and maintained the largest standing army in Europe, and the second in NATO after the United States. In 1952, a stay-behind army was organized under the codename 'Counter-Guerrilla'.

> "On November 3 (1996), a truck crashed into a Mercedes Benz in Susurluk, ninety miles south of Istanbul, and killed three Turkish passengers: a fugitive heroin smuggler and hitman, a former high-ranking police officer, and a former "Miss Cinema." The lone survivor was a right-wing member of parliament. In the car's trunk, police found a forged passport, police identification papers, ammunition, silencers, and machine guns.

Abdullah Catli, the fugitive heroin smuggler, had escaped from a Swiss prison. The dead beauty queen, Gonca Uz, was his girlfriend.

The police officer was Huseyin Kocadag, head of a Turkish police academy and a former Istanbul deputy police chief who reportedly organized hit squads in the southeast that kill Kurdish guerrillas and their supporters.

The survivor, Sedat Bucak, a member of parliament from the conservative True Path Party, is reportedly in charge of 2,000 Kurdish mercenaries paid by the government to fight Kurdish guerrillas.

The car crash has created a sensation in Turkey and has led parliament to hold hearings on the ties linking the True Path Party, the police, and thugs like Abdullah Catli. Newspapers in Turkey are making connections between what they are calling the "state gang" and a secret paramilitary force that for decades has attacked the left...

The United States funded these stay-behind groups for decades. Even though there was no Soviet occupation, some of the groups did take up arms-- against left-wing dissidents in their own countries. Some descendants of these groups are still at it, especially in Turkey.

> Abdullah Catli was one of those.
> "The accident unveiled the dark liaisons within the state," former prime minister Bulent Ecevit told parliament in December. Now leader of a small opposition social-democratic party, Ecevit knows a lot about those liaisons. He first told me about them -- and the American connection -- back in 1990, when I interviewed him in his Ankara office." - The Progressive[240]

Bulent Ecevit, five time Turkish prime minister, who is cited in the above quote, declared that the Taksim Square massacre was a Gladio operation, where half a million citizens had rallied. It was organized by trade unions, and the shooting lasted for 20 minutes while a thousand policemen in attendance did not intervene. About 40 people were killed, and though none of the perpetrators were caught, 500 demonstrators were detained. The massacre occurred during a broader wave of political violence.[241]

The U.S. State Department in its 1995 Human Rights report noted that:

> "Prominent credible human rights organizations, Kurdish leaders, and local Kurds asserted that the government acquiesces in, or even carries out, the murder of civilians... Human rights groups reported the widespread and credible belief that a Counter-Guerrilla group associated with the security forces had > carried out at least some 'mystery killings'".[242]

American journalist Lucy Komisar, when asking U.S. officials about investigating the human rights reports, was told “That's classified.” The Turkish military would likewise block all investigations in their country.[243]

There is evidence of Gladio operatives extensively operating torture campaigns for political purposes. For example, Talhat Turhan, former Turkey General, survived torture at the hands of special forces. He was told “...I was now ‘in the hands of a Counter Guerrilla unit operating under the high command of the Army outside the constitution and the laws.’ They told me that they ‘considered me as their prisoner of war and that I was sentenced to death.”[244]

Much of the violence was directed at the Kurdish minority. In 1984 the Counter-Guerrillas were behind the brutal crackdown that would kill and torture thousands over the next 5 years. Among other operations, Counter-Guerrillas would dress up as PKK members (A Kurdish political party) and attacked villages, raping and executing people randomly.[245]

The political violence in Turkey, with Gladio operatives responsible to at least a moderate extent, paved the way for the series of military coups that have occurred in the country. A 1996 New York Times article notes that:

> “evidence suggests that officially sanctioned criminality may have reached levels that few had imagined…

> One of Turkey's most prominent pro-Kurdish politicians, Guven Ozata, said the car crash and its aftermath had convinced him that state-sponsored death squads were behind many of the estimated 3,500 unsolved killings that have been committed in the southeastern part of the country in the last decade. Most of the victims had been suspected of sympathizing with separatist Kurdish causes.
> "These gangs have a direct link with mystery killings," Mr. Ozata said at a news conference. "This is no longer a hypothesis or a guess. It is a reality acknowledged by Government officials."
> Several politicians and others who are calling for investigations into the Government's relationship with criminal gangs believe that the gangs used their official ties as cover for involvement in Turkey's lucrative heroin-smuggling trade. They suspect that senior officials were engaged in the trade or tolerated it as a way of repaying gangs that killed at their behest.” - New York Times[246]

The evidence of Gladio operations in Turkey reveal another important link: The collusion between paramilitary forces and drug traffickers. At the time (and to this day), Turkey served as a major hub in the smuggling of drugs into Western Europe, from the Southeast Asian 'Golden Triangle' and later the Middle East. It is likely that drugs served as a significant source of funding for these decentralized operations and was the catalyst for a bond between the state and the criminal underworld that ensured massive corruption in the country that exists to this day. After all, we know that the Gehlen Organization was involved in the black market in the area to raise extra funds for their intelligence operations. It seems that this practice spread throughout the web of 'stay-behind' armies financed and armed by the CIA and NATO.

---

Greece

One of the countries that suffered the most from the Cold War terrorism groups was Greece, the country with perhaps the most significant propensity for the rise of a natural leftist coalition. Former CIA agent and Gladio whistleblower Philip Agee claimed that:

> "The Greek-American CIA officer recruited several groups of Greek citizens for what the CIA called 'a nucleus for rallying a citizen army against the threat of a leftist coup' ... Each of the several groups was trained and equipped to act as an autonomous guerrilla unit, capable of mobilizing and carrying on guerrilla warfare with minimal or no outside direction."[247]

---

[247] Len Scott, "Intelligence, Crisis and Security." Excerpt available here.

These groups were equipped with automatic weapons and small mountain mortars stashed in underground caches throughout the country.[248]

The group was involved with the 1967 coup, where leftists were widely reported to have large leads in the polls. As NATO orders were to prevent any type of leftist 'insurgency', the group took over the Greece Defense Ministry, rolled into Athens, took control of communications centers, Parliament, the Royal Palace, and arrested over 10,000 people, many of whom were tortured.[249]

Conclusion

Although the CIA and NATO have steadfastly refused to acknowledge the existence of Gladio, giving them deniability from ever having to disclose documents related to the operation, the existence of these fascist and violent underground networks has been acknowledged by the governments of nearly every NATO country. Furthermore, official documents in German, Dutch, French and Italian confirming the network, its organization and practices have been declassified.[250]

Operation Gladio is not just some ancient history. Italian Prime Minister Giulio Andreotti confirmed that the last coordination meeting he was aware of was held in 1990.[251] It has to be noted that this was a period of time where terrorism was evolving, moving towards the widespread radical Islamic terror that bombards our television screens daily, just 3 years before the first World Trade Center bombing and two years after the creation of Al-Qaeda. At the same time the geopolitical strategies of the United States were moving away from Europe and towards the Middle East. Unfortunately, the available information on Operation Gladio raises more questions than it answers.

Food for Thought:

1. Knowing that the last Gladio meeting was in 1990, can we say with any certainty that the program ever ended?

2. How many people involved with Gladio are still operating in the CIA and other agencies?

3. Seeing that the 'Strategy of Tension' proved to be an effective tool, in what other instances has it been implemented?

4. Is there currently a 'Gladio B' in operation in the Middle East, as former FBI agent Sybel Edmonds asserts?

5. Are the criminal alliances that formed during Gladio in places such as Turkey still in effect today?

6. How did the 'stay-behind' organizations affect domestic politics in ways other than terrorism?

7. Is the ongoing assassination campaign in Iraq, discussed in the chapter 'The War on Terror is a Fraud', a part of an evolved Gladio campaign?

Operation Mockingbird

> "About a third of the whole CIA budget went to media propaganda operations... We're talking about hundreds of millions of dollars a year just for that.....close to a billion dollars are being spent every year by the United States on secret propaganda." Testimony of William Schapp to Congress[252]

In 1948, the United States began the Marshall Plan, an initiative to help the devastated Europe recover from the War. The CIA decided to siphon funds to create the Office of Policy Coordination, which would become the covert action branch of the Agency.[253] It was under this program that Operation Mockingbird, a domestic propaganda campaign aimed at promoting the views of the CIA within the media, began. From the onset, Operation Mockingbird was one of the most sensitive of the CIA's operations, with recruitment of journalists and training of intelligence officers for propaganda purposes usually undertaken by Director Allen Dulles himself or his direct peers.[254]

It is a false belief that the CIA 'infiltrated' unwitting media institutions. The recruitment of journalists was frequently done with complicity from top management and ownership. Former CIA Director William Colby claimed during the Church Committee investigative hearings, "Lets go to the managements. They were witting." Among the organizations that would lend their help to the propaganda efforts was the New York Times, Newsweek, Associated Press, and the Miami Herald. Providing cover to CIA agents was a part of the New York Times policy, set by their late publisher, Arthur Hays Salzberger.[255]

The investigative committee of Frank Church, officially titled “Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities”, uncovered a lot of evidence concerning Operation Mockingbird and came to the conclusion that:

> "The CIA currently maintains a network of several hundred foreign individuals around the world who provide intelligence for the CIA and at times attempt to influence opinion through the use of covert propaganda. These individuals provide the CIA with direct access to a large number of newspapers and periodicals, scores of press services and news agencies, radio and television stations, commercial book publishers, and other foreign media outlets."[256]

Carl Bernstein, the reporter famous for his excellent investigation into the Watergate scandal, wrote that:

> “(Joseph) Alsop is one of more than 400 American journalists who in the past twenty-five years have secretly carried out > assignments for the Central Intelligence Agency, according to documents on file at CIA headquarters. Some of these journalists' relationships with the Agency were tacit; some were explicit. There was cooperation, accommodation and overlap. Journalists provided a full range of clandestine services—from simple intelligence gathering to serving as go betweens with spies in Communist countries. Reporters shared their notebooks with the CIA. Editors shared their staffs. Some of the journalists were Pulitzer Prize winners, distinguished reporters who considered themselves ambassadors without portfolio for their country. Most were less exalted: foreign correspondents who found that their association with the Agency helped their work; stringers and freelancers who were as interested in the derring-do of the spy business as in filing articles; and, the smallest category, full-time CIA employees masquerading as journalists abroad. In many instances, CIA documents show, journalists were engaged to perform tasks for the CIA with the consent of the managements of America's leading news organizations."[257]

While a majority of Mockingbird operations were overseas, the goal was to have important, hard-hitting stories to be circulated in the American press. Relationships with major United States media institutions certainly helped with this goal. Bernstein lists The New York Times, CBS and Time inc. as the most productive relationships the agency cultivated. They also created front organizations overseas who publicly maintained an appearance of free press but privately were operated by the agency. An example of this is the Rome Daily American, which was 40% owned by the CIA for three decades.[258]

[257] Rolling Stone Magazine, "The CIA and the Media," October 20, 1977

Another strategy was developing relationships with major media owners who were known to harbor right-wing views, such as William Paley of CBS, and then passing on information of journalists, actors and screenwriters who harbored left-wing views. Information was also passed on to friendly congressmen such as Joseph McCarthy. These men and women would then be blacklisted from the industry. Lee J. Cobb was one such actor who was blacklisted, and recalled his experience:

> “When the facilities of the government of the United States are drawn on an individual it can be terrifying. The blacklist is just the opening gambit - being deprived of work. Your passport is confiscated. That's minor. But not being able to move without being tailed is something else. After a certain point it grows to implied as well as articulated threats, and people succumb. My wife did, and she was institutionalized. In 1953 the HCUA (House UnAmerican Activities Committee) did a deal with me. I was pretty much worn down. I had no money. I couldn't borrow. I had the expenses of taking care of the children. Why am I subjecting my loved ones to this? If it's worth dying for, and I am just as idealistic as the next fellow. But I decided it wasn't worth dying for, and if this gesture was the way of getting out of the penitentiary I'd do it. I had to be employable again.”[259]

The CIA went as far as to write scripts for Hollywood. One interesting example is the funding of the movie version of Animal Farm in 1954, a book written just less than a decade earlier by George Orwell which enjoyed large commercial success. The problem for the CIA was that Orwell was a socialist, and his book attacked both capitalism and communism. To avoid this conflict, the CIA changed the ending of the Hollywood version to portray capitalism in a more positive light.[260]

Domestic surveillance was also used on journalists who had published classified material. In one example, a physical surveillance post was set up at a Hilton Hotel in view of the office of Washington Post writer Michael Getler.[261] The operation defied the CIA's charter, which specifically prohibits domestic spying. The operation was directed towards numerous members of the Washington press corp, and was signed off by John F. Kennedy himself, in coordination with CIA director John McCone.[262]

One CIA document states: “Get books published or distributed abroad without revealing any U.S. Influence, by covertly subsidizing foreign publicans or booksellers... Get books published for operational reasons, regardless of commercial viability”. The Church Committee concluded that over 1000 books were published under this directive.[263]

Some investigative journalists have claimed that Operation Mockingbird did not end in 1976 as the CIA claims. For example, in 1998, researcher Steve Kangas claimed that conservative billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife, who ran 'Forum World Features', a foreign news organization, was a CIA asset and used the organization to disseminate propaganda for circulation in the United States.[264] Kangas ended up dead with a bullet hole in his head, in the office of Richard Scaife. It was ruled a suicide, although there were discrepancies in the police report and the autopsy.[265]

The Church Committee's conclusion accurately reflects the problems associated with Operation Mockingbird:

> "In examining the CIA's past and present use of the U.S. media, the Committee finds two reasons for concern. The first is the potential, inherent in covert media operations, for manipulating or incidentally misleading the American public. The second is the damage to the credibility and independence of a free press which may be caused by covert relationships with the U.S. journalists and media organizations."[266]

While it is deplorable for citizens of countries to be subjected to a state-owned media, at least they can be aware of the biases and filter information accordingly. We have been taught the lie from birth that the U.S. press is free from government meddling. In a situation where the manipulation is completely covert, the American public has been left unaware of the propaganda they have been ingesting for decades.

Food for Thought:

1. Why were the owners and management of large media institutions so willing to participate in a program that violated their journalistic integrity?

2. Has the increasingly consolidated media industry made it easier for news to be manipulated to fit 'the agenda' discussed in the One Party State?

3. Have MK-ULTRA entrapment or mind control techniques ever been used to target the press?

COINTELPRO

> "Between 1965 and 1975, the FBI opened more than 500,000 intelligence files on more than one million Americans, according to a Congressional report.... Among the Bureau's targets: Martin Luther King and the civil rights movement, anti-Vietnam War Groups, and the underground press." - Center for Investigative Reporting[267]

> "Purpose of counterintelligence action is to disrupt the BPP [Black Panther Party] and it is immaterial whether facts exist to substantiate the charge." - J. Edgar Hoover[268]

J. Edgar Hoover issued directives for COINTELPRO, a codename for Counter Intelligence Program, in 1956. The original intent was to monitor the Communist Party USA but quickly expanded its scope to infiltrate and marginalize a variety of groups such as the American Indian Movement, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and the Black Panthers, as well as targeting high profile individuals such as Martin Luther King, Jr.

The FBI's stated motivation was "protecting national security, preventing violence, and maintaining the existing social and political order."[269] (Emphasis added).

Fred Hampton

On December 4th, 1969, the Chicago Police Department and FBI raided an apartment housing members of the Black Panther Party. At 4:45 am, the heavily armed police stormed the apartment, killing Panther member Mark Clark immediately, who was serving a security duty. Clark fired his shotgun, the only shot fired by the Panthers that day, while the police and FBI would end up shooting over 98 times.[270] Forensics and firearms experts determined that Clark's shot was fired from very near the floor, indicating that Clark had already sustained grave injuries.

The raid team would then assault the room of Fred Hampton, a rising leader in the Panther movement. Police would fire twice at Hampton, who was lying next to his pregnant girlfriend, hitting his shoulder. Court transcripts revealed the following conversation took place:[271]

"That's Fred Hampton."

Two more shots were fired, point blank at Hampton's head.

Over a dozen more Panthers residing in the apartment would be wounded, beaten, and then charged with attempted murder of police officers. The next day, the media largely defended the FBI's actions. The Chicago Tribune published photos showing holes purported to be from bullets fired by the Panthers, but forensics would later reveal these holes to have been made by nails.[272]

Documents released by the Freedom of Information Act include a sketch of Hampton's apartment drawn by an FBI informant, used by police and FBI in the assassination. The informant received $300 from the FBI for providing the information.[273]

The FBI had tried other methods before resorting to assassination, including sending a bogus letter to a rival Chicago gang leader in hopes of provoking a violent retaliation which read:

> “Brother Jeff: I've spent some time with some Panther friends on the west side lately and I know whats been going on. The brothers that run the Panthers blame you for blocking their thing and there's supposed to be a hit out for you. I'm not a Panther, or a Ranger, just black. From what I see these Panthers are out for themselves, not black people. I think you ought to know what their (sic) up to, I know what I'd do if I was you. You might here from me again. Signed, A Black Brother You Don't Know.”[274]

The use of bogus letters for sabotage and attempting to provoke violence was widely used by the FBI throughout COINTELPRO.

Why was Fred Hampton targeted? He was a rising leader in the Black Panther Party and was in the process of uniting various gang, including the Puerto Rican 'Young Lords' and the Caucasian 'Young Patriots' into a political coalition. He had the potential to drastically change the political landscape of Chicago by channeling the youth unrest that had previously been directed against other gangs and instead direct it at the political establishment to fight against police corruption and to generate socially constructive energies.

This type of action was directly antagonistic to one of the primary directives of COINTELPRO put forth by J. Edgar Hoover himself, which read:[275]

[275] Ibid.

“1. Prevent the coalition of militant black nationalist groups.”

The same document also contained another relevant directive:[276]

“Prevent the rise of a 'messiah'”

Fred Hampton had the charisma to unite large groups of young men and the attitude of social welfare and community development that had the potential to gain the support of the broader progressive community. His assassination prevented his career from escalating to these heights.

Subverting the Black Panther Party

The FBI waged a wildly successful campaign against the Black Panther Party throughout the '60s and '70s. By the late '60s, the Black Panther Party was the most prominent African American political force in the United States. They advocated a 10 point socialist program for black self-determination, provided free food and healthcare to communities, fought against hard drugs, and formed legal armed street patrols to deter violence from the KKK and other antagonistic organizations. They also advocated for community control of police, schools and other institutions. Today, these points are largely ignored in favor of the racist caricature promoted by the Bureau. The operations the FBI took to subvert the Panthers is truly astounding.

For example, there is the Black Panther coloring book, created by the FBI and distributed by Bureau informants to black children in an attempt to marginalize the Party within the black community.[277] It is directly related to Hoover's directive:

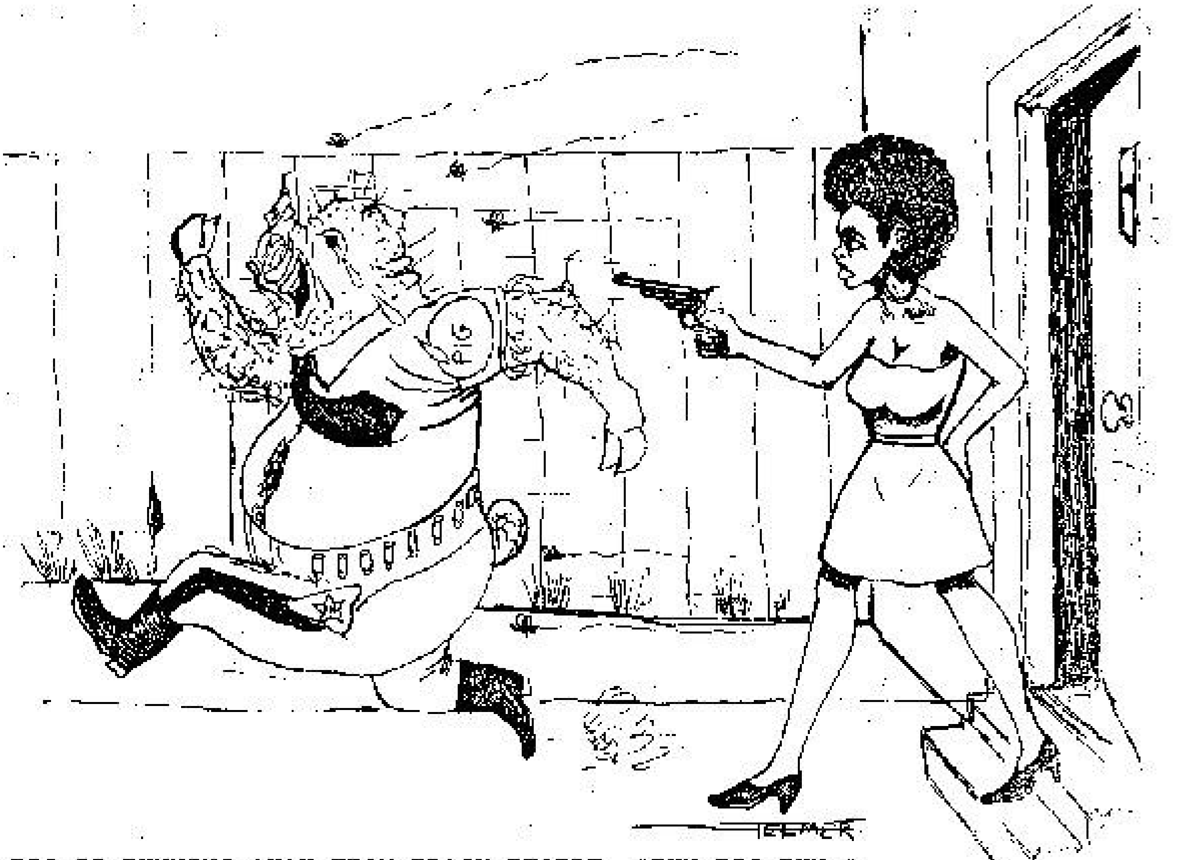
[276] The Guardian, “Preventing the rise of a 'messiah',” April 4, 2008

> "4. Prevent militant black nationalist groups and leaders from gaining respectability"

The goal was not to influence the children of these communities, but to marginalize the Panthers within the white community. The coloring book aimed to do just that, and would certainly be shocking to anyone who saw it. Once marginalized, the public would support increasingly repressive policies against the Panthers and their leadership, such as the Fred Hampton assassination.



THE PIG IS RUNNING AWAY FROM BLACK PEOPLE. "RUN PIG RUN."

To J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI, it did not matter what the activities of the Black Panther Party consisted of. In 1969, an FBI special agent sent Hoover a memo detailing how his investigation of the Panthers has only turned up pacifist activities such as feeding breakfast to children.[278] Hoover shot back a memo saying that the Agent's career ambitions were directly related to supplying Hoover with information supporting his view that the Panthers were "... a violence prone organization seeking to overthrow the government by revolutionary means."[279]

To prevent the unification of the Black Panther Party and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, popularly known as SNCC, the FBI resorted to fostering splits between the leadership of the two organizations. The FBI targeted Stokely Carmichael by using a technique known as 'bad jacket': they forged documents indicating that Carmichael was a CIA informant.[280] It worked.

The FBI also had the policy of arresting Panther members for any reason, even just on suspicion of crime without evidence, for the purpose of exhausting the Party's funds to pay bonds. The Panther's attorney said in 1970:

> “In a period of two years — December, 1967 to December, 1969 — the Black Panther Party has expended in bail-bond premiums alone— just the premiums, that is, money that will never be returned — a sum in excess of $200,000! How many breakfasts or lunches for hungry children, how much medical attention sorely needed in the ghetto communities would that $200,000 > have furnished?...In the same two-year period, twenty-eight Panthers were killed."[281]

In instances where dozens of Panthers were arrested, the bond requirements were too high to pay and members sat in jail for weeks, or even months, a common COUNTELPRO tactic used against other groups as well. By 1974, the Black Panther Party had essentially collapsed under the weight of ruthless harassment.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

In 1957, the FBI targeted the Southern Christian Leadership Conference as a "likely target for communist infiltration".[282] The nature of the group was entirely non-violent and focused on organizing the southern black vote. It was founded by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and several other southern black ministers. By 1964, Dr. King had given his 'I have a dream speech' and had emerged as a preeminent civil rights leader and had also began to address social change that transcended racial issues. At this point, the FBI had marked King as a clear threat to the 'established order'. Agent William C. Sullivan committed to writing:

> "We must mark [King] now, if we have not before, as the most dangerous Negro in the future of this Nation from the standpoint of communism, the Negro, and national security...it maybe unrealistic to limit [our actions against King] to legalistic proofs > that would stand up in court or before Congressional Committees."[283]

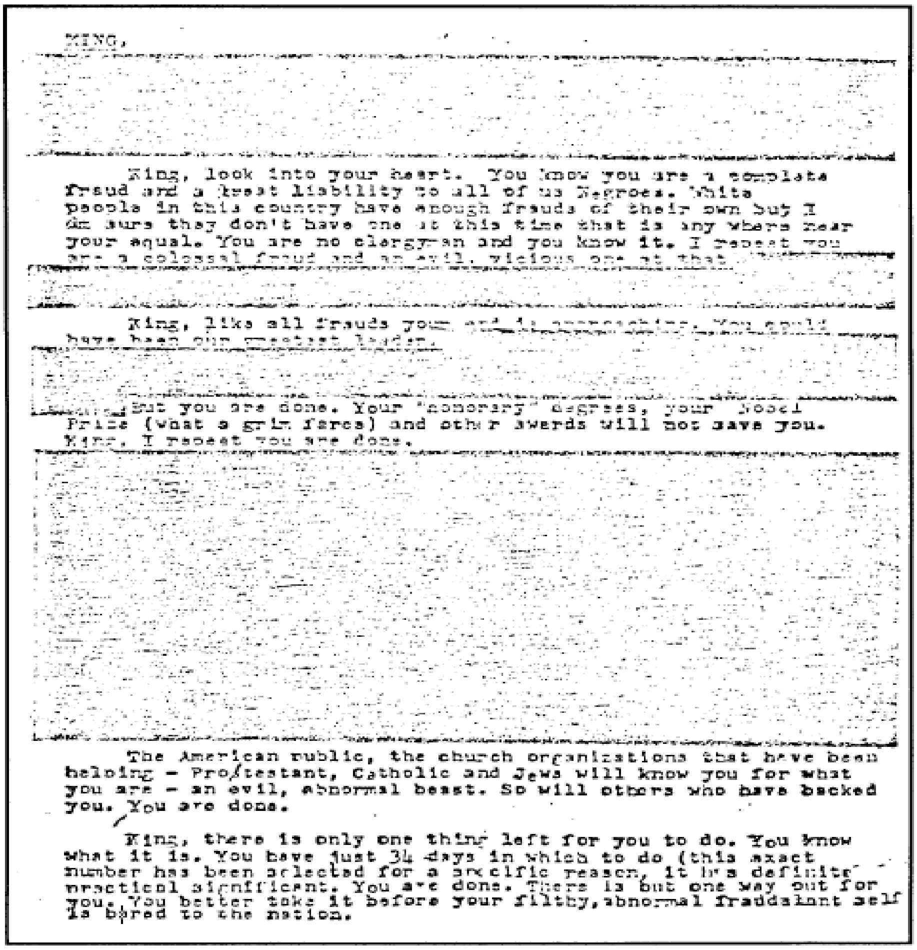
When it was announced that King would win the Nobel Prize, the FBI compiled an audio tape consisting of various fragments of conversations from King's tapped phones, bugged offices and hotel rooms. It was purported to demonstrate that King was a sexual deviant. It was sent to King with an anonymous note stating that it would be released to the press unless he committed suicide prior to receiving the award.[284] When King failed to reply, FBI Associate Director Cartha DeLoach offered the contents of the tape to various news institutions, including Newsweek, but the reporters nearly universally declined to report on the story.



KING,

[redacted]

King, look into your heart. You know you are a complete fraud and a great liability to all of us Negroes. White people in this country have enough frauds of their own but I am sure they don't have one at this time that is any where near your equal. You are no clergyman and you know it. I repeat you are a colossal fraud and an evil, vicious one at that.

[redacted]

King, like all frauds your end is approaching. You could have been our greatest leader.

But you are done. Your "honorary" degrees, your Nobel Prize (what a grim farce) and other awards will not save you. King, I repeat you are done.

[redacted]

The American public, the church organizations that have been helping - Protestant, Catholic and Jews will know you for what you are - an evil, abnormal beast. So will others who have backed you. You are done.

King, there is only one thing left for you to do. You know what it is. You have just 34 days in which to do (this exact number has been selected for a specific reason, it has definite practical significant. You are done. There is but one way out for you. You better take it before your filthy, abnormal fraudulent self is bared to the nation.

On April 24, 1968, Dr. King was assassinated. Although public memory has largely forgotten, King was in the process of organizing the 'Poor Peoples Campaign', aimed at uniting poor people of all races to rally for social change. It is likely that if King had not died, the campaign would have been wildly successful. The campaign also represented everything that COINTELPRO had been dedicated to prevent. Although there is no complete proof that the FBI was involved with the assassination, the jury of a 1999 Memphis civil trial came to the conclusion that James Earl Ray did not kill King, and that the real culprit was 'government agencies'.[285]

American Indian Movement

> “They [the Indians] are a conquered nation, and when you are conquered, the people you are conquered by dictate your future. This is a basic philosophy of mine. If I'm part of a conquered nation, I've got to yield to authority... [The FBI must function as] a colonial police force.” - Assistant Special Agent in Charge Norman Zigrossi[286]

AIM, the American Indian Movement, began in the '60s as activism focused on preventing the further depredation of Indian lands and resources. As the movement rose to prominence, the FBI marked them as an 'extremist organization' to target.[287] One document released under the Freedom of Information Act advocates that: "local police put [AIM] leaders under dose scrutiny, and arrest them on every possible charge until they could no longer make bail."[288]

During a presentation by members of the Congressional Black Caucus to the UN Human Rights Commissioner, it was alleged that virtually every known leader of AIM has been imprisoned in state or federal prisons, some repeatedly. Russell Means, for example, was charged with 37 counts but not one has held up in court.[289] It was later revealed that the FBI had infiltrated Mean's defense team but was still unable to pin their charges against him.

In 1973, thousands of Native Americans from reservations across the West had gathered at Wounded Knee at the Pine Ridge reservation to simultaneously commemorate the 1890 massacre and protest the political corruption of tribal president Dick Wilson, who had received $62,000 from the Bureau of Indian Affairs and was using it to fund a private force that suppressed opposition and often resorted to murder.[290] The force designated themselves "Guardians of the Oglala Nation", abbreviated as GOONS. Attempts to impeach Wilson, who was responsible for years of political violence, had failed. The FBI considered the occupation an act of treason and began a siege of AIM members, in coordination with US Marshalls, agents from the BIA and the GOONS of Dick Wilson. Wilson bluntly declared in a speech that "AIM will die at Wounded Knee".[291]

According to Historian Rex Weyler, who obtained documents subpoenaed from the Pentagon, the U.S. Marshall Service:

Military officers, supply sergeants, maintenance technicians, chemical officers, and medical teams remained on duty throughout the 71 day siege, all working in civilian clothes [to conceal their unconstitutional involvement in this "civil disorder"]"[292]

All of this was on site at Pine Ridge during the 71 day standoff, during which AIM demanded the removal of Wilson from office, the GOONs disbanded, and the military presence removed. By the end, hundreds of thousands of rounds were fired at AIM positions , 2 AIM members were killed, 14 seriously injured, and 8 'disappeared'. In the 36 months that proceeded the end of the Pine Ridge standoff, more than 60 AIM members died violently on or near Pine Ridge.[293]

The Civil Rights Commission revealed that AIM was right to feel aggrieved during the occupation of Pine Ridge: The FBI had been complicit in rigging the 1974 Pine Ridge elections against AIM members.[294]

Conclusion

The Church Committee investigated COINTELPRO and concluded:

---

"Too many people have been spied upon by too many Government agencies and too much information has been collected. The Government has often undertaken the secret surveillance of citizens on the basis of their political beliefs, even when those beliefs posed no threat of violence or illegal acts on behalf of a hostile foreign power. The Government, operating primarily through secret informants, but also using other intrusive techniques such as wiretaps, microphone "bugs", surreptitious mail opening, and break-ins, has swept in vast amounts of information about the personal lives, views, and associations of American citizens. Investigations of groups deemed potentially dangerous -- and even of groups suspected of associating with potentially dangerous organizations -- have continued for decades, despite the fact that those groups did not engage in unlawful activity...

The Constitutional system of checks and balances has not adequately controlled intelligence activities. Until recently the Executive branch has neither delineated the scope of permissible activities nor established procedures for supervising intelligence agencies. Congress has failed to exercise sufficient oversight, seldom questioning the use to which its appropriations were being put."

Simply put, the committee's conclusions are correct but fall short. It is clear that for a period of nearly 3 decades, the FBI waged a literal domestic war on largely peaceful activists who sought to bring about social and political change. During the time of the Vietnam war, MK-ULTRA, the struggles of various civil rights movements, Watergate and other criminal acts in the executive branch, the United States drastically needed effective leaders and organizations to affect change yet the FBI successfully suppressed any serious movements that arose.

Food for thought:

1. How responsible is COINTELPRO for the fall of the American left in the 1970's?

2. How likely is it that other high profile assassinations similar to Fred Hampton, such as Martin Luther King Jr., actions undertake by the FBI under COINTELPRO orders?

3. What movements are currently being subverted by the FBI today?

4. Did J. Edgar Hoover leave a corrupt infrastructure when he retired in 1972, after 37 years of being the FBI Director?

The Phoenix Program

Thanks to the New York Times and 60 Minutes, most people are now aware that former Senator and Presidential candidate Bob Kerrey once led a raid on the peasant village of Thanh Phong during his service in Vietnam, and murdered nearly two dozen villagers in cold blood. His team disemboweled women, children and infants and shot dead whole families.

What most people don't know, is that Kerrey was operating on orders from a CIA program known as Operation Phoenix, the program that oversaw some of the most horrific war crimes ever unleashed on Earth.[295]

It was in 1964, under CIA station chief Peer DeSilva, that the Phoenix Program was initiated. DeSilva was a proponent of the belief of 'counter-terrorism', CIA doublespeak for the idea that terror was a legitimate tactic in unconventional warfare.[296]

Historian Douglas Valentine summarizes the concept of Operation Phoenix as follows:

> "Central to Phoenix is the fact that it targeted civilians, not soldiers... Under Phoenix, due process was totally non-existent. South Vietnamese civilians whose names appeared on blacklists could be kidnapped, tortured, detained for two years without > trial, or even murdered simply on the word of an anonymous informer. At its height, Phoenix managers imposed a quota of eighteen hundred neutralizations per month on the people running the program in the field, opening up the program to abuses by corrupt security officers, policemen, politicians, and racketeers, all of whom extorted innocent civilians as well as VCI [Viet Cong Infrastructure]. Legendary CIA officer Lucien Conein described Phoenix as, "A very good blackmail scheme for the central government: 'If you don't do what I want, you're VC.'"

> "Indeed, Phoenix was, among other things, an instrument of counter-terror - the psychological warfare tactic in which members of the VCI were brutally murdered along with their families or neighbors as a means of terrorizing the entire population into a state of submission. Such horrendous acts were, for propaganda purposes, often made to look as if they had been committed by the enemy."[297]

This is the intellectual context under which Bob Kerrey massacred the hamlet of civilians, for which he was subsequently awarded the Bronze Star.

Peer DeSilva quickly expanded Phoenix to cover all 40 provinces in South Vietnam, each equipped with an Intelligence Coordinating Committee and its own prison. Torture techniques such as electric shock, beatings and rape were commonplace.[298]

The Central Intelligence Agency originally had trouble finding Americans who were willing to murder and mutilate, so the 'counter-terror' squads were composed of ex-convicts, VietCong defectors, and mercenaries.[299] They then employed Special Forces, Navy SEALS and other highly trained Americans such as Bob Kerrey, who had essentially been indoctrinated by the military into killing machines, to oversee the program.

Former Lieutenant Colonel Anthony Herbert, who was involved in Operation Phoenix, described his experience in his autobiography Soldier: “They wanted me to take charge of execution teams that wiped out entire families and tried to make it look as though the VC themselves had done the killing.”[300]

Former CIA agent Ralph McGee, speaking to PBS's Bill Moyers for the fantastic documentary 'The Secret Government', stated that:

> "We were murdering these people, incinerating them... My efforts had resulted in the deaths of many people, and I just – for me it was a period when I guess I was – I considered myself nearly insane – I just couldn't reconcile what I had been and what I was at the time becoming."[301]

McGee was operating under Phoenix helping to set up the South Vietnam secret police, and has since become one of the most outspoken critics on the CIA. He recalls that the program cost billions of dollars, and CIA Director William Colby refused an investigative audit before a Congressional Committee.[302]

The Agency's website describes how the entire South Vietnamese population was mapped out with Census Grievance teams in conjunction with national data.[303] They determined which villages were more likely to be friendly to the VietCong through interviews, and color coded maps based on that information, specifically noting that "These maps would often contain the names of family members who were VCI members or sympathetic to the communists."

> “I think it’s common knowledge what goes on at the interrogation center... It was common knowledge that when someone was picked up their lives were about at an end because the Americans most likely felt that, if they were to turn someone like that back into the countryside it would just be like multiplying NLF followers.” -Jeff Stein, Author and Former Military Intelligence, Vietnam Veteran[304]

The 1971 Congressional Inquiry revealed that the blacklists created by these maps and census data was not thoroughly vetted, as opposed to claims by Agency officials. One member of the Phoenix Program described to Congress that:

> "It was my experience that the majority of people classified as VC were “captured” as a result of sweeping tactical operations. In effect, a huge dragnet was cast out in our area of operation (AR) and whatever looked good in the catch, regardless of evidence, > was classified as VCI."[305]

Lieutenant Vincent Okamoto, Army Combat Officer and recipient of the Distinguished Service Cross, testified on his experiences with using blacklists as a means of 'neutralizing' Viet Cong:

> "The problem was, how do you find the people on the blacklist? It's not like you had their address and telephone number. The normal procedure would be to go into a village and just grab someone and say, 'Where's Nguyen so-and-so?' Half the time the people were so afraid they would say anything. Then a Phoenix team would take the informant, put a sandbag over his head, poke out two holes so he could see, put commo wire around his neck like a long leash, and walk him through the village and say, 'When we go by Nguyen's house scratch your head.' Then that night Phoenix would come back, knock on the door, and say, 'April Fool, motherfucker.' Whoever answered the door would get wasted. As far as they were concerned whoever answered was a Communist, including family members. Sometimes they'd come back to camp with ears to prove that they killed people."

Psychological warfare against civilians was an integral part of Phoenix. Soldiers would leave pamphlets on dead bodies, or on doors indicating that recipients were marked for death.

> “Attention Villagers: 1.Your village was bombed because you harbored Vietcong in your village. 2. Your village was bombed because you gave help to the Vietcong in your area. 3. Your village was bombed because you gave food to the Vietcong.”
> -USMC Leaflet[306]

Phoenix officer Bart Osbourne testified before Congress in 1971:

> "I never knew in the course of all those operations any detainee to live through his interrogation. They all died. There was never any reasonable establishment of the fact that any one of those individuals was, in fact, cooperating with the VC, but they all died and the majority were either tortured to death or things like thrown out of helicopters. It became a sterile depersonalized murder program."[307]

Throwing victims out of a helicopter, for example, served a psychological warfare purpose as well, terrorizing those on the ground.

The intelligence that the CIA received was often flawed. Anyone in the South Vietnam infrastructure could report intelligence, and it was often not verified, which led to abuses such as South Vietnam politicians feeding intelligence to kill their political rivals.[308]

> "We had no way of determining the background of these sources, nor their motivation for providing American units with information.

> Our paid sources could easily have been either provocateurs or opportunists with a score to settle. Every information report (IR) we wrote based on our sources' information was classified as (1) unverifiable and (2) usually reliable source. As to the first, it speaks for itself; the second, in most cases was pure rationale for the existence of the program." - Michael J Uhr, First Lieutenant involved with Phoenix.[309]

Historian Marvin Gettleman described in his book Vietnam and America: A Documented History, how "Intelligence gathered during interrogation was often used to direct 'search and destroy' missions aimed at wiping out whole villages or groups of villages."[310]

All told, documents show that Phoenix led to the 'neutralizing' of over 80,000 people, about a third of them killed, between the years of 1968 and 1972.[311]

---

[308] Ibid.

[309] Testimony to Congress by Michael J. Uhl, available here.

[310] Marvin Gettleman, "Vietnam and America," excerpt available here.

One Pentagon contract-study of Phoenix's operations found that only 3% of those 'neutralized' were full party members above the district level between 1970 and 1971, and that over half "...were not even party members."[312]

A Saigon government document lists the number of assassinated at over 40,000, nearly double that of other documents, highlighting potential disparity between record keeping and reality.[313] The program supposedly ended in 1972, though it has been revealed that at least certain aspects continued until the fall of Saigon in 1975. Understanding that official documents don't cover the full scope of Phoenix, and the history of records destruction by the Agency, it is unlikely that the full extent of Phoenix will ever be known.

So what about the infamous My Lai massacre that resulted in the rape and mutilation of around 400 civilians? Historian Daniel Valentine argues it was most certainly a Phoenix operation. He cites a known 'blacklist' of names to be 'neutralized' in My Lai, multiple accounts of military personnel referring to the entire village as Viet Cong sympathizers, using the logic that only sympathizers could survive in the area, and a Vietnamese Colonel who said himself that My Lai was a Phoenix operation, among other evidence.[314]

Marvin Gettleman concurrs:

> "By late 1967, before the Tet offensive, 70% of the villages in Quang Ngai province had already been destroyed.

> In response to Tet, this slaughter was intensified literally with a vengeance. In mid-March on 1968, Quang Ngai province was the scene of what was to become the most notorious example: the massacre of villagers in My Lai 4. There the killing of hundreds of villagers, almost all unarmed women and children, and old men, so successfully swelled the body count that General Westmoreland sent a personal message of 'Congratulations to officers and men of Charlie Company for outstanding action' that 'dealt the enemy a heavy blow'.
> When the carnage finally came to light, evidence poured in showing that this massacre was not an aberration but just an especially appalling instance of a systematic strategy."
> -Gettleman, page 411[315]

Project Phoenix would first come to the public in 1971 with a congressional inquiry. William Colby, CIA chief and director of the Phoenix program, testified that the agency didn't distinguish between VietCong members and civilians.[316] Colby would later defend the program, citing it as 'the toughest opposition the Viet Cong faced'.[317]

Iran/Contra

“The common ingredients of the Iran and Contra policies were secrecy, deception, and disdain for the law...the United States simultaneously pursued two contradictory foreign policies — a public one and a secret one”- Report of the Congressional Committees Investigating the Iran-Contra Affair[318]

“In spite of the wildly speculative and false stories of arms for hostages and alleged ransom payments, we did not—repeat, did not—trade weapons or anything else for hostages, nor will we.” -Ronald Reagan, November 1986

“A few months ago, I told the American people I did not trade arms for hostages. My heart and my best intentions still tell me that's true, but the facts and evidence tell me it is not." -Ronald Reagan, March 1987

Iran/Contra isn't one singular historical conspiracy, but rather comprised of various illicit activities which revolved around a core group of subversive actors and a covert war in Nicaragua.

The 'core of subversive actors' consisted of members and associates of the National Security Council, created under the National Security Act of July 26, 1947. Since the act was passed, the NSC has steadily grown in power and scope under various presidencies. During Dwight D. Eisenhower's administration in the '50s, the NSC became a 'virtual adjunct of the president', and started reporting directly to the executive branch. John F. Kennedy, skeptical of the CIA and other agencies after the Bay of Pigs fiasco, allowed the NSC to begin functioning operationally, evolving from its traditional role as a planning committee.[319] Under Ronald Reagan, the NSC expanded with increased staff and scope of operations. Under Eisenhower, it had been tasked with creating a:

> "...virtual Cold War machine against Communism," and to "create and exploit troublesome problems for international Communism... reduce international Communist control over any areas of the world," and "develop underground resistance and facilitate covert and guerilla operations."[320]

This directive would be the rational and motivation for the group conducting subversive actions in Nicaragua under the Reagan administration.

[320] Draper, p. 6

United States intervention in Nicaragua is nothing new. The U.S. had landed troops numerous times in the country during the 19th century and as recently as 1912, during a period known as the 'banana wars', used military force to directly quell rebellions against American-supported leadership. In 1936 the American-trained head of the Nicaraguan National Guard, Samoza Garcia, forcefully took power in the country by murdering and disposing the former leader Augusto César Sandino, marking the beginning of a lengthy U.S. Supported dictatorship.[321]

Trouble arose in the 1970's, when a revolutionary communist party called 'The Sandanistas', named after the disposed Sandino, began mounting a series of attacks and sabotage against the right wing Samoza dynasty, including the high-profile kidnapping of Nicaraguan elite at a Christmas party in 1974. The Sandanistas enjoyed wide support from much of the disenfranchised Nicaraguan population, who had become tired of the heavy-handed Samoza rule. One striking example is the 1972 earthquake that struck the Nicaraguan capital Manuga, where Anastasia Debayle, son of Samoza Garcia, exercised emergency powers that allowed him to confiscate most of the international aid that had been directed towards rebuilding the city, instead ending enriching Debayle's personal coffers.[322]

In 1979, the Sandanista uprising culminated in their gaining full power in Nicaragua. They were helped by the policies of Jimmy Carter, who had withdrawn aid to the Samoza regime after a series of revelations of human rights abuses. Carter originally hoped to remain on good terms with the Sandanistas, who had constructed a defacto socialist government in Nicaragua, and responded by sending them $99 million in aid. After they solidified a pact with the Soviet Bloc in 1980, Carter changed his tune and authorized the CIA to begin subversive acts in the country including propaganda efforts but prohibiting direct conflict.[323]

In 1980, right wing elements in Nicaragua created the Nicaraguan Democratic Force, FDN, which would become the largest and most organized member of the group that would become known as the 'Contras'. When Reagan was inaugurated in 1981, he stepped up support of the group and expanded the scope of covert action in the country, allowing the CIA to directly arm, fund and train the Contras. In 1983, he signed the National Security Decision Directive 77, entitled "Management of Public Diplomacy Relative to National Security," institutionalizing public diplomacy. In effect, it was a special planning group within the NSC to coordinate public diplomacy campaigns, the most institutionalized 'public propaganda ministry' in United States history.[324] The group used extensive media propaganda and control efforts, with one 14 page memorandum written by Oliver North detailing over 80 specific 'publicity stunts' designed to influence congressional and public opinion before upcoming Contra aid votes.[325]

When the covert war in Nicaragua became public knowledge in 1982, a group of congressmen led by Massachusetts representative Edward P. Boland tried to end all covert efforts in the country. This was with good reason, as news of the human rights abuses of the Contras became public knowledge. For example, a 1987 Chicago Tribune article noted that the Contras "engaged repeatedly in kidnappings, torture and murder of unarmed civilians."[326] The Guardian would delve deeper into the atrocities of the Contras, describing a particular attack where "Rosa had her breasts cut off. Then they cut into her chest and took out her heart. The men had their arms broken, their testicles cut off. They were killed by slitting their throats and pulling the tongue out through the slit."[327]

Americas Watch, a humans rights group, accused the Contras of[328]:

- targeting health care clinics and health care workers for assassination
- kidnapping civilians
- torturing civilians
- executing civilians, including children, who were captured in combat
- raping women
- indiscriminately attacking civilians and civilian houses
- seizing civilian property
- burning civilian houses in captured towns.

These were the principle means of waging war. Meanwhile, Reagan called the Contras the “moral equivalent of the founding fathers”.[329]

The terrorism of the Contras was not simply 'collateral damage' of supporting subversive groups. Rather, evidence shows that it was a deliberate campaign led by the CIA in the vein of Phoenix. In fact, the CIA wrote the training manual for the Contras titled “Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare” which, among other activities, advocated for assassinating judges and priests, blackmailing citizens, blowing up public buildings, and firing on dissenting citizens.[330]

Congressman Boland submitted legislation on December 21, 1982 which would become known as the Boland Amendment. It specifically barred “the use of funds ‘for the purpose of’ overthrowing the government of Nicaragua or provoking a war between Nicaragua and Honduras.”[331] Open defiance was impossible, but the CIA, NSC and the Reagan Administration were dedicated to supporting the Contras at all costs, so they chose various methods of covert defiance by exploiting loopholes in the amendment. As long as the funds going to the Contras were not tagged as being used for overthrowing the Sandanista government, then they could be delivered under the guise of international aid. The use of soliciting third party funding was also left out of the Boland Amendment. Ultimately, the Boland Amendment had no tangible impact on the covert war in Nicaragua.

During the period proceeding the Boland Amendment, the CIA directly assisted the Contra's subversive efforts. One example is the use of air strikes against an airport near Managua. They also placed mines in Nicaraguan harbors in 1984, damaging several ships. The Wall Street Journal, which exposed these covert actions, also revealed the role of Oliver North, a Marine Colonel working on assignment with the NSC, in coordinating the actions, one of the first mentions of a name which would become notorious to the public just a few years later.[332]

Congress soon realized the ineffectiveness of the Boland Amendment and responded with new legislation that toughened the restrictions on funding the support, known as the Boland Amendment II. It read:

> “During fiscal year 1985, no funds available to the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, or any other > agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities may be obligated or expended for the purpose or which would have the effect of supporting directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any nation, group, organization, movement or individual."[333]

This legislation left two loopholes: first, was the use of third party funds to fund the contras, and the second was that the text explicitly referred to the actions of the CIA, but failed to mention the NSC, using the logic that it was not an intelligence agency, under the Department of Defense, or even covered under the provision of "any... entity of the United States." This was based on the idea that the NSC was: "the President's principal forum for considering national security and foreign policy matters with his senior national security advisers and cabinet officials" and thus exempt.[334]

This transition of techniques led Oliver North to take on a primary role in Contra assistance.

Israel and Iran

Barred from using direct Agency funds for the Contra operations, Oliver North and the NSC began to get creative. One result is the infamous 'Diversion Memo', written by North, detailing a plan to sell arms to Iran, overcharge the country and funnel excess funds to the Contras. This plan was blatantly illegal under Operation Staunch, a U.S. led arms embargo against Iran during the Iran-Iraq war which lasted from '80 to '90. At the outset of the war, the US began arming Iraq, first with 200 million dollars in helicopters, and later escalating to several billion dollars worth of economic aid, the sale of dual-use technology, non-U.S. origin weaponry, military intelligence, Special Operations training, and direct involvement in warfare against Iran.[335]

[334] Brown University

The 'Diversion Memo' detailed a plan to work with a retired Air Force General and an Iranian businessman to sell arms to Iran, through the cover of Israel, in exchange for the release of American hostages held by Lebanese militants. Initially, the plan worked relatively well: Israel provided Iran with hundreds of TOW anti-tank missiles and multiple American hostages were released.[336] The deal was completed just months after Ronald Reagan famously said: "The United States gives terrorists no rewards. We make no concessions, we make no deals."[337] Although North estimated that $12 million would be raised for the Contras in this manner, only $2 million ever made it to the group, likely because the private actors involved in the Operation were acting with a motivation of profit. As is thematic with American covert operations, the funds were funneled through a 'front organization' called Stanford Technology Trading Group International, as well as using 'proprietary' airlines to transfer the missiles: aircraft owned by the CIA and used in normal operations until needed by the Agency for covert operations.[338]

The story unraveled in 1986 when two Lebanon reporters broke the story of the secret arms transfer. The revelations sparked the widely publicized hearings in the United States to find the 'truth' of the operations. In 1987 hearings, Oliver North was given immunization from self-incrimination before Congress. Regarding the destruction of documents, he humorously noted: “I would prefer to say that I shredded documents that day like I did on all other days, but perhaps with increased intensity; that's correct.”[339]

The hearings’ Majority Report concluded that:

> “North’s testimony demonstrates that he also lied to members of the Executive branch, including the Attorney General, and officials of the State Department, CIA and NSC.” And also that... “other officials lied repeatedly to Congress and to the American people about the Contra covert action and Iran arms sales, and that he altered and destroyed official documents.”

Rex 84

The most shocking revelation of the Contra hearings, which the mainstream media nearly universally failed to report on, was the existence of an emergency preparedness plan known as Rex 84. The only public mention of the plan, known officially as 'Readiness Exercise 1984', was as follows:

> Congressman Jack Brooks: Colonel North, in your work at the N.S.C. were you not assigned, at one time, to work on plans for the continuity of government in the event of a major disaster?

339Ibid.

> Brendan Sullivan [North's lawyer, agitatedly]: Mr. Chairman?
> Senator Daniel Inouye: I believe that question touches upon a highly sensitive and classified area so may I request that you not touch upon that?
> Brooks: I was particularly concerned, Mr. Chairman, because I read in Miami papers, and several others, that there had been a plan developed, by that same agency, a contingency plan in the event of emergency, that would suspend the American constitution. And I was deeply concerned about it and wondered if that was an area in which he had worked. I believe that it was and I wanted to get his confirmation.
> Inouye: May I most respectfully request that that matter not be touched upon at this stage. If we wish to get into this, I'm certain arrangements can be made for an executive session.

Luckily, the media was able to get more details on the program which was too sensitive to discuss in a public forum. The Miami Herald, in a July 5, 1987 exposé, published the following:

> "Some of President Reagan's top advisers have operated a virtual parallel government outside the traditional cabinet departments and agencies almost from the day Reagan took > office, congressional investigators and administration officials have concluded.

> Investigators believe that the advisers' activities extended well beyond the secret arms sales to Iran and aid to the Contras now under investigation.
> Lt. Col. Oliver North, for example, helped draw up a controversial plan to suspend the Constitution in the event of a national crisis, such as a nuclear war, violent and widespread internal dissent or national opposition to a U.S. military invasion abroad." The Miami Herald[340] (Emphasis added).

Implementation of Rex 84 would have turned control over the United States to FEMA, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which would act as an 'emergency czar', and turn control of state and local governments to appointed Military commanders, and also included mention of 'assembly centers and relocation camps' to house dissidents. Attorney General William Smith correctly protested that the plan "exceeded its proper function as a coordinating agency for emergency preparedness."[341]

It doesn't take reading between the lines to see the immediate intent of Rex 84. The NSA, CIA and other U.S. institutions believed that an invasion of Nicaragua might have been necessary to prevent the spread of communism so close to their borders. Such an idea isn't farfetched: Sandanista policies and their agreements with the Soviet Union indicate that they believed an American invasion was imminent.[342] Being just a decade removed from the massively unpopular Vietnam War, an invasion would have prompted widespread dissent, and Rex 84 was the NSC's plan to deal with a domestic anti-war movement.

[340] Miami Herald, "Reagan Aides and the 'Secret' Government," July 5, 1987. An absolutely fascinating article worth reading in its entirety.

[341] Miami Herald

The investigation described by the Miami Herald had interesting revelations of other activities. For example, it revealed that the 'secret government' stole President Carter's briefing book used in campaign speeches and presidential debates with Reagan, indicating that the structure was in existence before Reagan's inauguration. It noted meetings with Iranian officials to discuss the release the delay of the release of U.S. Embassy hostages until after the election. Lastly, it discussed how certain officials orchestrated leaks to paint Reagan in a positive light, such as the November 4, 1984 election day announcement that Soviet Jet Fighters were on their way to Nicaragua, orchestrated by Oliver North himself.[343]

Conclusions

Chief Counsel of the investigative Senate committee, Arthur Liman, wrote in a memo to panel leader Senator Daniel Inoyue:

> “This is the part of the story that reveals the whole secret

[343] Miami Herald

> 'government-within-a-government' operated from the [Executive Office Building] by a Lt. Col. with its own army, airforce, diplomatic agents, intelligence operatives appropriations capacity."[344]

As the 'Report of the Congressional Committees Investigating the Iran-Contra Affair' noted, the United States had an actual foreign policy that vastly differed from their public discourse, and was executed in secret without checks and balances. When Congress tried to stop the covert operations, the agencies involved simply found loopholes to subvert their legislation, going as far as to arm two sides fighting against each other in a war, and to use private actors to conduct illicit activities. Furthermore, Rex 84 shows just how serious the 'secret government' was in exerting hegemony in Latin America.

The term 'secret government' is not an exaggeration. Various investigations, public and private, noted that Ronald Reagan himself may not have been aware of many activities the group undertook. These facts were all revealed in the mainstream media in a short period proceeding the Iran arms sales revelations, yet the public was never able to fully inform itself of the depths of the scandal.

Food for Thought:

1. Why was the American public so complacent when the facts of a veritable shadow government were thoroughly revealed in the media?

2. Why was there no significant drive for reform of the CIA originating from within Congress?

---

[344] Miami Herald

3. How often does the CIA disregard domestic and international law when it interferes with their agenda?

4. Why did the CIA find hegemony in Nicaragua to be so important? What threat, if any, did the country pose to the United States?

5. Does a modern version of Rex 84 exist today?

6. How far will the United States go to suppress domestic dissent the next time they deem a foreign invasion necessary?

Continuity of Government

The definition of 'Continuity of Government' is a set of contingency plans to ensure that essential government functions remain in place after a disaster such as nuclear war. In the United States, Continuity of Government plans have been on the books since at least the Eisenhower administration. The plans involved building intricate hidden command centers such as the Mount Weather Emergency Operations Center built in 1959, nestled away in the Blue Ridge Mountains.

While the Government officially classifies Mt. Weather as a 'bunker', many sources claim that it is essentially a full blown city. According to GlobalSecurity.org, a respected institution in the intelligence community, Mount Weather contains a hospital, sewer treatment system, reservoirs, a power plant, an emergency television studio, and a thorough system of dormitories & office buildings.[345]

None of this is out of the ordinary, so to speak. It is reasonable for the government to have such plans in place. However, on September 11, 2001, the Continuity of Operations plan was officially activated and has been live ever since, meaning that Mt. Weather and similar installations are likely in operation today.

> “A national emergency exists by reason of the terrorist attacks at the World Trade Center, New York, New York, and the Pentagon, and the continuing and immediate threat of further attacks on the United States,” President George W. Bush proclaimed on September 14, 2001.

[345] Mount Weather profile at GlobalSecurity.org

Dick Cheney officially enacted the “Continuation of Government” plans shortly after the World Trade Center attacks, although the Bush Administration would not confirm that this took place until March, 2002.[346] A simultaneous 'State of Emergency' was declared and is also in effect today, extended each year by George Bush and then Barack Obama.[347]

CBS reported:

> “A 'shadow government' consisting of 75 or more senior officials has been living and working secretly outside Washington since Sept. 11 in case the nation's capital is crippled by terrorist attack. "This is serious business," President Bush said of plans to ensure the continuity of government.
> Such an operation was conceived as a Cold War precaution against nuclear attack during the Eisenhower administration but never used until now. It went into effect in the first hours after the terror attacks and has evolved over time, said senior government officials who provided details of the plan.
> Under the classified "Continuity of Operations Plan," which was first reported by The Washington Post in its Friday editions, high-ranking officials representing their departments have begun rotating in and out of the assignment at one of two fortified > locations along the East Coast.

> The Post said the first rotations were made in late October or early November, a fact confirmed by a senior government official late Thursday.
> Officials who are activated for the duty live and work underground 24 hours a day, away from their families, according to the Post. The shadow government has sent home most of the first wave of deployed personnel, replacing them most commonly at 90-day intervals.
> The government-in-waiting is an extension of a policy that has kept Vice President Dick Cheney in secure, undisclosed locations away from Washington. Cheney has moved in and out of public view as threat levels have fluctuated."[348]

Serious business indeed. There have been instances where Congressmen have been stonewalled when trying to learn more about the secret operations. One example is Oregon Congressman Peter DeFazio, a key member of the Homeland Security Committee, pushed to review the classified portion of the Continuity plan in a secure setting in 2007 but his access was denied.[349]

What can we know about the Continuity of Operations plan currently in effect? Patrick Thronson, editor-in-chief of the University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform, has put together the most comprehensive publicly available paper detailing the states of emergencies and powers granted to the executive branch.[350] Available knowledge is naturally incomplete because many powers and documents are still classified. Some highlights include:

[348] CBS, "The Shadow Government," February 11, 2009

[349] Oregon Live, "DeFazio demands access to classified information," July 27, 2007

- Congress is required by statue to vote on the continuation of a state of National Emergency every six months. Since September 11th, 2001, it has only happened once.
- There are currently thirty simultaneous declared states of emergency.
- The Executive Branch can freeze the assets and prevent financial transactions of individuals. This extends to even basic life necessities. They can go as far as to prohibit donations of food to said person.
- The president can unilaterally order the inspection and seizure of commercial vessels.
- The president is authorized to suspend or alter rules for broadcast stations, or authorize control of said station.
- Provisions to suspend or control internet traffic.

> "Thus, the only apparent legal obstacle standing between present conditions and this degree of government control over mass media and telecommunications is a presidential order. " - Thronson

- The ability to seize property

350Patrick Thronson, "Towards Comprehensive Reform of America's Emergency Law Regime," March 23, 2013

- The delegation of 'maintaining law and order' to the department of defense.
- Extend military tours of duty beyond contractually agreed termination dates.

> "A nation under thirty states of national emergency can hardly > claim that emergency laws are the exception to—rather than the > rule of—normal governance. "- Thronson

Like every other case study of covert activities highlighted in this book, 'Continuity of Operations' has a friendly face but the actual workings of the secret government are strictly secret. Suffice it to say that the powers behind the Iran/Contra activities have become fully institutionalized. The implications are that the workings of Congress, the Justice Department and other institutions have become merely a show to distract from the reality that a secret government which does not respond to civilian rule and has granted itself sweeping, unchecked powers and is certainly directly operating in the realm of foreign policy, covert activities and likely domestic espionage, among other potential activities.

Food for Thought:

1. Is there any limit to the powers that the shadow government has granted itself?

2. Why has there been nearly zero coverage of the Continuity of Government in the media? Why have only one or two congressman openly questioned its existence?

3. Who is in control of the Continuity of Government operations? What is their agenda?

That is simply one of the hard facts of life you have to face. You have done your part. You have tried to expose the evil and wrongdoing. It has hurt you terribly. Homosexual prostitution inquiry ensnares VIPs with Reagan, Bush

'Call boys' took midnight tour of White House

By Paul M. Rodriguez and George Archibald
© 1989 THE WASHINGTON TIMES

A homosexual prostitution ring is under investigation by federal and District authorities and includes among its clients key officials of the Reagan and Bush administrations, military officers, congressional aides and U.S. and foreign businessmen with close social ties to Washington's political elite, documents obtained by The Washington Times reveal.

One of the ring's high-profile clients was so well-connected, in fact, that he could arrange a middle-of-the-night tour of the White House for his friends on Sunday, July 3, of last year. Among the six persons on the extraordinary 1 a.m. tour were two male prostitutes.

Federal authorities, including the Secret Service, are investigating criminal aspects of the ring and have told male prostitutes and their homosexual clients that a grand jury will deliberate over the evidence throughout the summer, The Times learned.

Reporters for this newspaper examined hundreds of credit-card vouchers, drawn on both corporate and personal cards and made payable to the escort service operated by the homosexual ring. Many of the vouchers were run through a so-called "sub-merchant" account of the Chambers Funeral Home by a son of the owner, without the company's knowledge.

Among the client names contained in the vouchers — and identified by prostitutes and escort operators — are government officials, locally based U.S. military officers, businessmen, lawyers, bankers, congressional aides and other professionals.

Editors of The Times said the newspaper would print only the names of those found to be in sensitive government posts or positions of influence. "There is no intention of publishing names or facts about the operation merely for titillation," said Wesley Pruden, managing editor of The Times.

The office of U.S. Attorney Jay B. Stephens, former deputy White House counsel to President Reagan, is coordinating federal aspects of the inquiry but refused to discuss the investigation or grand jury action.

Several former White House colleagues of Mr. Stephens are listed among clients of the homosexual prostitution ring, according to the credit-card records, and those persons have confirmed that the charges were theirs.

Mr. Stephens' office, after first saying it would cooperate with The Times' inquiry, withdrew the offer late yesterday and also declined to say whether Mr. Stephens would recuse himself from the case because of possible conflict of interest.

At least one highly placed Bush administration official and a wealthy businessman who procured homosexual prostitutes from the escort services operated by the ring are cooperating with the investigation, several sources said.

Among clients who charged homosexual prostitute services on major credit cards over the past 18 months are Charles K. Dutcher, former associate director of presidential personnel in the Reagan administration, and Paul R. Balach, Labor Secretary Elizabeth Dole's political personnel liaison to the White House.

In the 1970s, Mr. Dutcher was a congressional aide to former Rep. Robert Bauman, Maryland Republican, who resigned from the House after he admitted having engaged in sexual liaisons with teen-age male Pulitzer Prize nominated journalist Paul Rodriguez. After years of research, Rodriguez had compiled the radical evidence necessary to publish such claims. He had uncovered a homosexual prostitution ring tied to the White House. One central figure, Craig Spence, a Republican powerbroker, had the political clout to bring prostitutes on midnight tours of the White House. The report names multiple White House insiders, military personnel and members of major media institutions as clients, based on credit card records procured by Rodriguez.

> "Among the client names contained in the vouchers - and identified by prostitutes and escort operators - are government officials, locally based US military officers, businessmen, lawyers, bankers, congressional aides and other professionals...
> Although the confiscated material was turned over to District police on the scene, witnesses and law enforcement agents say the Secret Service kept one box containing names and other information about high-level government officials who were clients of the male escort business.
> District police officials say that, to their knowledge, this is the first time the Secret Service has ever become involved in such a raid in this area." - Washington Times

Craig Spence would throw extravagant parties for the Washington D.C. elite, with 'call boys' freely available for interested party-goers. Various associates, including multiple of Spence's body guards, came forward and admitted that his house, where the parties were located, was thoroughly bugged with audio and video recording equipment, with the intent of extortion and blackmail of those who ended up in compromising positions.[354]

Spence was somewhat of a mystery man. What type of employment did he have? No one knew for sure, though Spence himself would often boast of his important connections. One of his associates told the Times:

> "He described Mr. Spence as 'strange', saying he often boasted that he was working for the CIA, and on one occasion said he was going to disappear for a while 'because he had an important CIA assignment'. According to the businessman, Mr. Spence told him that the 'CIA might double-cross him', however, and kill him instead and then 'make it look like a suicide.'" Washington Times[355]

Indeed, Spence would die just months after the interview, of an apparent suicide, but not after admitting that his parties were bugged by friendly intelligence assets which he refused to name.[356] The investigation by Paul Rodriguez and his associates would also screech to a halt after all of the evidence was either classified by the Secret Service or tied up in red tape. Someone in a high position of power clearly did not want the full extent of the revelations to become public.

Homosexual prostitution on its own isn't shocking, and depending on your conceptions of morality, no different than the heterosexual prostitution that is likewise rampant in Washington D.C. with the only tangible difference being the repercussions of entrapment (especially for Republicans). However, one particular part of the investigation leads us down a shocking rabbit hole:

In fact, the name Craig Spence would appear repeatedly in another major prostitution inquiry, this one centered around children, known today as the Franklin Scandal, one of the darkest stains in the history of the United States.

...To Franklin, Nebraska

The story of the 'Franklin Scandal' begins with Lawrence E. King, one of the fastest rising Republican stars of the 1980's. He was a public figure in Franklin, Nebraska who ran the Franklin Federal Credit Union, along with a series of restaurants and bars. These various businesses apparently furnished King's lavish lifestyle of private jets, extravagant parties and an entourage of assistants and bodyguards.

Larry King, as he was known, was accused by seven children of child abuse and prostitution before he sang the National Anthem at the 1988 Republican National Convention but despite various petitions to local police and the FBI, no official investigations were ever undertaken.[358] One of the allegations began from the serious abuse of children at the hands of Jarret and Barbara Webb, the former a member of the Franklin Credit Union board the latter a cousin of King, who adopted various foster children and would proceed to subject them to horrific physical, emotional and sexual abuse. The girls housed at the Webbs told of being taken to various parties in the Franklin area where Larry King and other important local figures sexually abused them. One of the girls, Eulice Washington, recalled being flown on King's private jets to be abused across the country.

> "Among the first accusers was Eulice Washington, who claimed King flew her to out-of-state pedophilic orgies. She had been adopted by relatives of King's in the 1970s. Her new 'mother' was King's cousin Barbara Webb, and her new 'father' was husband Jarrett Webb, who sat on the board of the Franklin Federal Credit Union. To Eulice Washington, King had been Uncle Larry. 'Larry King set up the pedophile ring,' says Eulice. 'From my knowledge and from what I saw go down, he was the man who got it moving and rolling. Everything went through him. He loves boys. He loves them like he shouldn't.'" - The Franklin Scandal: A Story of Powerbrokes, Child Abuse and Betrayal[359]

Despite Eulice passing various lie detector tests, charges were never pressed against the Webbs.[360] The Foster Care Review Board was the first organization to come across various cases of abuse, from Eulice Washington and others. They wrote numerous letters to Nebraska's Attorney General Robert Spire urging an investigation, but their pleas were ignored.

The FCRB testified to the State Legislature's Investigative Executive Review Board Subcommittee in 1988 that:

> FCRB Chairman Dennis Carlson: The nature of these allegations are something that is going to shock the Committee. They deal with cult activities... they deal with sexual abuse, and there's a correlation between these two different reports. We have, the Boys' Town report... prepared by a worker from Boys' Town named Julie Walters... (which) contains the allegations of the children that were in the Webb foster home, Nelly primarily. Years later, well, two years later, we have Loretta Smith in Richard Young Hospital who's making allegations against Larry King and as far as we know there is no relationship between Nelly and Loretta Smith... Both reports talk about the Omaha Girls Club, both reports mention a specific individual who is the superintendent of schools.
> State Senator Remmers: The question that came into mind, it's been in my mind since you've been testifying and I think you've answered part of it just now, is you're talking about about these abuses from children from Boys' Town and Girls' Club and so > Remmers: Yes, that's what I mean. It all goes back to him? OK.

Larry King would also be linked to embezzlement before he sang the National Anthem at the 1988 Republican National Convention, but again avoided an investigation. The facade unraveled in November 1988, when an IRS investigation revealed that King had stolen over $40 million from the coffers of the Franklin Federal Credit Union. The financial corruption alone shocked the city, but soon reports started circulating that in addition to various fraudulent accounting documents, investigators found a huge stash of child pornography as well.[362]

More rumors of sexual abuse began to arise, with multiple allegations that Larry King was using children from Boys Town, the nearby Catholic charitable institution for orphaned youth.[363] His yellow sports car was notorious on the Boys Town campus, where he would drive around and pick up minors for his pedophilic activities. management denied any connection to King, but financial records showed that Boys Town had a close-knit relationship to the Franklin Federal Credit Union.[364] Federal and local authorities immediately moved to close the investigation and seal evidence, claiming that allegations of child abuse were unfounded.[365]

The authorities backtracked and stated that they had done everything in their power to investigate these claims. Attorney General Robert Spire said: "We did receive some sensitive information in July. My office acted promptly and professionally and nothing was sat on." However, it would later be revealed that no authorities ever interviewed Eulice Washington and other children noted by the FCRB until 3 years later after they made their report public.[366] Despite this, Omaha Chief of Police Robert Wadman stated to the press that "Every step that should have been taken, was taken."[367] However, Wadman would later confess that he had never contacted Eulice Washington, one of the children abused at the hands of Webb, nor the Child Protective Services department that handled Washington's claims.[368] Wadman would later be identified as a child abuser at King's parties by four different victims.[369]

Obstruction, Threats and Murder

In an early police investigation, low level police officers attempted to keep their inquiries a secret from Wadman, seemingly knowing that he would be adamant about shutting down their investigation. Nebraska Foster Care Review Board official Dennis Carlson related Omaha Police Officer Carmean's testimony to the Legislature's Executive Board hearing:

> "[Officer Carmean] told me some things which I found to be somewhat startling. I asked if he was interested in information regarding Larry King and he said, yes we are, we're conducting what he called a supersensitive investigation of Larry King and he said this investigation was so supersensitive that they were not even using the steno pool in the Omaha Police Department. They were handwriting their police reports, and he also told me that Chief Wadman had come to their unit and directly asked if they were investigating Larry King.... Investigator Carmean told me, we lied to the Chief and we said, no, we are not investigating Larry King. OK, so that conversation took place on July 20th of 1988"[370]

Shortly afterword, Officer Carmean was transferred out of the Robbery and Sex unit and the investigation stalled. On July 5, 1989, in a lengthy "Inter-Office Communication" to Omaha Public Safety Director Pitmon Foxall (a cousin of Larry King), Wadman announced that Carmean needed a mental health evaluation.[371]

Many were not convinced of the Police Department's conclusion that there was no substance to the abuse allegations, including a group of 12 State Senators who decided to create their own parallel commission to investigate the charges, lead by Senator Loran Schmit. Following the money trail, Schmit and his team quickly found that it could be traced directly to the sex parties and child abuse. It became clear to Schmit that he was uncovering some serious 'dirty laundry':

> “I received a phone call on the floor of the legislature. The caller would not identify himself, but he said, Loren, you do not want to have an investigation of the Franklin Federal Credit Union, and I asked, who am I speaking to? And they said, that doesn't matter, but you shouldn't have that investigation. And I said, well, why not? And he said, it will reach to the highest levels of the republican party, and we're both good republicans.” - Loran Schmit[372]

Schmit wasn't the only one to receive threats. The lead investigator of the State Senator's Committee, Gary Caradori, had also specified that he had received a series of threats, such as obvious tampering with his vehicle, as to send a message. In early July 1990, Caradori made a trip to Chicago to meet with a secret informant who had evidence which would 'blow the lid' off the case, and reportedly confided to a friend that he was one step ahead of those who wanted to squash the investigation, saying that if 'they' knew what information he had, he would be killed.[373]

Upon returning from Chicago, Caradori's plane crashed, killing him and his son. The National Transportation Safety Board investigation found that the wreckage was scattered over a radius between 3/4 to 1 mile, indicating without a doubt that the plane broke up in the air, instead of upon impact. Certain items were missing from the crash, most notably Caradori's briefcase. Within 24 hours, all of the evidence was collected by the

The Paul Bonacci Trial

What information was so important that the pedophile network would kill the lead investigator in what looked like a blatant assassination? It turns out he was meeting with Russell 'Rusty' Nelson, a photographer for Larry King, who attended King's parties with the intention of photographing powerful men in compromising positions with minors, in order to blackmail them later.[375] Like Craig Spence, King was known to throw lavish parties for the Republican elite, with underage prostitutes allegedly in attendance. Rusty Nelson was in hiding for an entire decade after the Franklin Scandal broke but ended his silence under oath during a court hearing in 1999, in order to 'set the record straight'. He revealed that he had a very close relationship with King and kept hundreds of thousands of photographs of King's business dealings and parties in various locations. Most of the evidence had been confiscated, and more had been destroyed in Gary Caradori's plane crash.

Rusty's testimony to the District Court was very interesting. Among other events, he revealed that he personally saw Larry King place a direct call to then-president Ronald Reagan when other associates could not resolve a specific problem. He also claimed to have seen and taken pictures of the Chief of Police of Omaha Robert Wadman at various parties, engaged in various sexual acts with minors, and had once seen Wadman accept a large envelope full of bearer bonds from King. While most of Rusty's evidence was confiscated, he was able to provide the court with photographs that corroborated his close 375Court Transcripts, “Paul Bonacci vs. Lawrence E. King” relationship to King, such as photographs of King inside his private jet and limousine, and alongside male strippers.[376]

The District Court hearing was not about Rusty Nelson, but rather for compensation for one of the victims, Paul Bonacci, who had first made accusations of abuse against Larry King in 1986, two years before there was even a Franklin Scandal. The testimony given was so convincing that the judge awarded Bonacci with $1 million. The plan was to donate the proceeds to charitable organizations dealing with child abuse, but King has never paid. Paul Bonacci suffered from Multiple Personality Disorder, a diagnosis confirmed by three different state-appointed psychiatrists, from extreme abuse he had received beginning at the age of 3. At the age of 8, he became associated with Larry King and began attending his parties as a child prostitute.

The type of abuse Bonacci underwent at the hands of Larry King is shocking:

> Bonacci: "They put guns up to my head, they put guns in my mouth... Larry King sent out boys, men, to jump me, he had them pretty well beat the tar out of me from the waist down so no one would see the marks, i had my fingers broken... I can remember them burning me with hot instruments... placing stuff inside me... almost what I would call a cattle prod"
> Judge Urbom "Done by Larry King at his direction?"
> Bonacci: "At his direction."

Later on in the trial he would claim:

---

[376] Ibid.

> "If they wanted to get something passed in the legislature, he would put some people that were against it in a compromising position, by using us boys and girls."[377]

One of the men in Washington that Paul Bonacci claimed abused him is Democratic Senator Barney Frank. Bonacci was also taken on the very same midnight tours of the White House hosted by Craig Spence that journalist Paul Rodriguez wrote about in the Washington Times, as a child. He claimed that immediately after the tours of the White House, he was taken to another place to be sexually abused.[378]

The Grand Jury Coverup

Before his untimely death, Gary Caradori had compiled a leads list of 271 victims of sexual abuse in the Franklin area, though his death precluded interviewing most, and others recanted their stories under pressure from Federal authorities, often accompanied by the threat of jail time for perjury. Along with Paul Bonacci, the investigation proceeded with three other primary witnesses, Troy Boner, Danny King (no relation to Larry), and Alisha Owens.

Both Boner and Owens recounted tales, after passing multiple state-sponsored lie detector tests,[379] of attending hundreds of parties hosted by Larry King where they were abused by King and other prominent men in Lincoln and Omaha. The three would repeatedly corroborate each other in interviews taken under oath by Gary Caradori, initially without knowledge of each others participation in the investigation.[380] Most of the victims claimed that they were used to transport drugs across state lines, at the demand of Larry King and Alan Baer, a prominent Omaha millionaire.

Gary Caradori once followed a lead of Alisha Owens where she claimed that she was often abused at The French Café in Omaha. He talked to the former manager on the telephone, Sheila McGuire, who told Gary that:

> “We had parties in my apartment above the French Cafe. Larry King would wine and dine potential investors downstairs at the Cafe. When the French Cafe closed about 1 AM, King and his man called Parking Lot Bob-who worked for him (and was our coke connection)-would bring people upstairs to my place. If Larry King investors wanted drugs, booze, children or hookers (male or female) we'd get them. While these guests of Kings took their pleasures-with the kids or whoever-King would sit and watch- while he drank, did coke and played with his young boys.... > and went off to bed with Irv. King took good care of the local and out of town high rollers. If you had the money to invest at Franklin, King would cater to your most deranged perversion.

> And, let me tell you another thing. The boys in the board rooms around Omaha are shitting in their Brogans. If this case gets cracked open the list of involved will read like Who's Who. King and his crew have ruined a lot of childrens' lives."[381]

The *New York Time*s confirmed that both Federal and State investigators were given thousands of files regarding sexual abuse from children and testimonies from people involved in the foster care and education system.[382] What happened next is amazing. Instead of indictments of the accused perpetrators to develop cases against them, both Douglas County and Federal Grand Juries ordered the thousands of files to be sealed, declined to interview dozens of witnesses, and then brought charges of perjury against Alisha Owens.[383]

Both Grand Juries concluded that Troy Boner and Alisha Owens had indeed been abused, but claimed that the adults they testified against were innocent! Alisha Owens was later found guilty of perjury, and sentenced to between 9 and 15 years. She ended up spending two years in solitary confinement, more than any other woman in Nebraska history, and a clear message to other victims: Stay silent.[384]

> "This is unprecedented, probably in the history of the United States. If the children are not telling the truth, particularly if they > have been abused, they need help, medical attention. You don't throw them in jail!" - Dr. Judianne Densen-Gerber, a lawyer, psychiatrist and nationally prominent specialist on child abuse, during her visit to Nebraska in December 1990.[385]

On the same day that Alisha Owens was convicted of perjury, the charges against Paul Bonacci, who told a very similar story, were dropped.[386] Perhaps they did not want certain testimony to come to trial, such as Bonacci's claim that Larry King would send limousines to Offut Air Force Base and pick up CIA agents for his parties.[387]

The Grand Jury trial was a mockery of justice, where the state-appointed attorney Samuel Van Pelt vigorously attacked the charges and mocked the allegations of the defendants. It has to be noted that a Grand Jury is a special type of proceeding where the attorney chooses all of the witnesses and what evidence is presented; there is no presentation of the defense or cross examination. A former Chief Judge of New York State once quipped that a special prosecutor could persuade a grand jury to "indict a ham sandwich."[388]

There are shocking irregularities with the Grand Jury proceedings. First, it never called Larry King to testify. In fact, the evidence of child abuse and child pornography has never been presented against King in any court of law. One member of the Douglas County Grand Jury claimed that the Van Pelt helped write the final report, which is illegal. The report contained some very peculiar statements, such as “children do have the right to expect that if they exhibit reasonable behavior, they will not be abused.” (Emphasis added). It also contained blatant lies, such as the claim that Paul Bonacci's doctor said that Bonacci was not capable of the truth, even though not only was the doctor not called to testify, he said elsewhere that he believed Bonacci's story.[389]

Owen's attorney, Henry Rosenthal, found that the evidence shown to the Grand Jury was deliberately tampered with. The video testimony taken by Gary Caradori was edited to remove sections where Troy Boner and Alisha Owens corroborated each others claims.[390] The lawyer representing originally Owens, Boner and (Danny) King originally claimed to have had over 100 clients who had suffered sexual abuse in relation to King and Boys Town, but then later claimed that their testimonies were all fabrications, only months before admitting she had an affair with an FBI agent who had bullied Troy Boner into temporarily recanting his testimony.[391]

There is also the curious trend of upward mobility for a group of men who were instrumental in rigging the Grand Juries:[392]

1. US Magistrate Richard Kopf, who deposited Lawrence King in a federal psychiatric hospital so he wouldn't have to appear before the grand juries, and signed off on the FBI's federal search warrant of Alisha Owen's prison cell, is now a US District Court Judge.
2. Thomas Thalken, Assistant US Attorney for District of Nebraska, who prosecuted the federal grand jury in Nebraska is now a US Magistrate.
3. Gerald Moran, who was the Douglas County Deputy Attorney who prosecuted the Alisha Owen trial. is now a Douglas County District Judge.
4. Robert Sigler, who was the Douglas County Deputy Attorney who prosecuted Alisha Owen throughout her multiple appeals, is now an Assistant US Attorney for the District of Nebraska.

Troy Boner

Troy Boner had recounted his testimony during this period, after receiving threats that he himself would become the victim of perjury charges. However, in 1993 he submitted an affidavit detailing his intimidation and stating unequivocally that his testimony as well as those of his peers were truthful.

> "I lied because I truly believed and still do believe that it was a situation where I must either '...lie or die' and at the insistence primarily of the Federal Bureau of Investigation officials who were dealing with me at that time..." - Troy Boner's Affidavit[393]

Boner repeated the allegations that the Chief of Police Robert Wadmann and the Omaha Herald editor Harold Andersen were primary players in his abuse and the abuse of his peers. He recounts the various tactics the FBI used in his intimidation, including alluding to harm that may come about to a family member if he persisted in telling his story. Shortly after these threats, Troy's brother Shawn was found dead from a gunshot wound. The official story was a game of Russian Roulette.[394] Troy cites this as a primary motivating factor in coming forward with the truth in his affidavit.

[393] Troy Boner's Affidavit

[394] DeCamp

> "But, maybe the most important thing any honest investigator should do is to ask me, Troy Boner, or any of the other kids such as Alisha or Paul Bonacci, to take polygraph, lie detector tests SIDE BY SIDE ON THE SAME QUESTIONS WITH THE PEOPLE WITH THE PEOPLE WE ARE ACCUSING OF THESE THINGS. Example, ask Alan Baer if he shot mainline drugs into me and if he is a major drug dealer and if he had sex with me. Ask Eugene Mahoney if he met me at a bookstore in Council Bluffs and used to regularly pay me to have sex with him as a boy. Ask [redacted] to take a polygraph test on whether he is a big time drug dealer." - Troy Boner's Affidavit (Emphasis retained)

The polygraph tests never happened. In 2004, Troy Boner entered an Omaha hospital visibly shaken and adamant that he was being targeted because of his testimony. The next day, he was found in a hospital room dead, drugged and beaten.[395] The timing might be related to the reelection campaign of George W. Bush, who multiple victims claimed had attended Larry King's parties. Troy would round out a 'suspicious death' list that had recently reached 15 names, including:[396]

1. Troy Boner
2. Shawn Boner, Troy's brother, found shot in the head shortly after Troy was to testify before court. The official explanation of his death was ruled to be a game of 'Russian roulette'.
3. Bill Baker, associate of Larry King and alleged to be involved in the production of child pornography.

4. Gary Caradori and his eight year old son, Andrew, killed in a plane crash.

6. Clare Howard, the secretary of Alan Baer, the wealthy Omaha businessman who was alleged to be a prime member of the child abuse ring. Also 'died in her sleep.'
7. Mike Lewis, former caregiver of victim-witness Loretta Smith. Death attributed to 'severe diabetic reaction' at the age of 32.
8. Joe Malek, associate of King, died from a gunshot which was ruled a suicide.
9. Aaron Owen, the brother of victim-witness Alisha Owen, died in his jail cell hours before Alisha was supposed to testify, ruled a suicide.
10. Charlie Rodgers, alleged sexual partner of Larry King, died of a shotgun wound to the head, ruled a suicide.
11. Bill Skoleski, Omaha police officer said to be secretly keeping a file on Larry King, died of a heart attack.
12. Kathleen Sorenson, foster parent of children who had escaped the Webb family, and outspoken activist on raising awareness of the abuse of the children she cared for.
13. Curtis Tucker, an associate of Larry King, who allegedly jumped out the window of a Holiday Inn in Omaha.
14. Harmon Tucker, a school superintendent in Omaha.

Conspiracy of Silence

In 1993, a television station in Yorkshire, England traveled to Franklin to uncover the truth about the tale of child abuse in Franklin, working in tandem with the Discovery Channel. It was called “Conspiracy of Silence” and the very day it was set to air, it was pulled. No explanation has ever been given, though there are rumors that an anonymous person paid the Discovery Channel $500,000 to revoke the television rights to the film. It would only be unofficially released two years later, when someone who helped produce the video and felt it was so important it needed to be public, leaked a rough draft from the copy room to attorney and former State Senator John DeCamp. It is now widely available for viewing online.

Overall, eight high profile Omaha figures would be accused of sexual assault, with testimonies corroborated between victims. They were:[397]

1. Larry King
2. Robert Wadman, Omaha Chief of Police
3. Harold Anderson, recently retired Editor of the Omaha World-Herald
4. Alan Baer, wealthy businessman
5. Deward Finch, Superintendent of schools.
6. Peter Citron, media personality
7. Judge Theodore Carson
8. PJ Morgan, Mayor of Omaha

Of these men, only one would be convicted of child abuse, Peter Citron, on an unrelated breakout of pedophilia claims which launched a separate investigation. Before the allegations leading to Citron's arrest broke, he was threatening to sue John DeCamp for naming him as a child abuser in a memo sent to the Omaha press.

How could such a massive and orchestrated coverup take place? It involved the FBI withholding all sensitive files, including explicit videos and pictures of the relationships between King and his associates and young children. It involved a campaign of denial by the Omaha Police Department, who's chief was a primary member of the child abuse ring, and a disinformation campaign by Nebraska's media, who also had important members implicated in the ring. It involved zealous FBI agents who were self-expressed 'good friends' with Robert Wadman. And it involved a campaign of suspicious deaths designed to silence testimony. Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, it involved an American public unwilling to believe that powerful men could be implicated in child abuse, child prostitution and drug running.

The Dutroux Affair

In the summer of 1995, a wave of disappearances of young girls in Belgium grabbed national headlines. The series of kidnappings would continue through the next year, with the Belgium BOB (FBI equivalent) unable to develop any leads. Then in the summer of '96, an anonymous tip about a suspicious white van led investigators to the doorsteps of Marc Dutroux, a known pedophile who had only recently been released from prison after serving 3 years of a 13 year sentence, despite warnings from various professionals and even his own mother that he was likely to be a repeat offender.[398] The man who let Dutroux out of prison, Justice Minister Melchior Wathelet, would soon be promoted to serve as a judge at the European Court of Justice at the Hague.[399]

Various stories soon emerged in the press regarding how the BOB had repeatedly, and suspiciously, failed to implicate Dutroux during the previous years. For example, BOB officer Rene Michaux once searched Dutroux's house, but failed to investigate screams he heard, instead believing the tale that the voices were coming from children outside. Nor did he find the odd construction of Dutroux's basement, shaped in an L with one wall much newer than the others, reason for inquiry.[400] At the time, Dutroux, though unemployed and receiving welfare from the state, owned seven homes and lived quite lavishly from his involvement in selling children and child porn.[401] Michaux ignored reports from an informant who claimed to have been made an offer by Dutroux to kidnap young girls in exchange for about €4000.[402] He once had in his possession a video tape of Dutroux constructing his makeshift basement dungeon, and raping a 14 year old girl, but the tape was returned to Dutroux's wife, apparently unviewed.[403] Michaux's failures likely directly led to the death of two girls who were held captive by Dutroux at the time of the investigation and reportedly died of starvation.

The arrest of Dutroux did not come until a new lead investigator, Jean-Marc Connorette, was assigned to the case. For the first time, many victims of child abuse and trafficking in Belgium felt that they had someone they could trust, and began to come forward with their stories. The case quickly spiraled to the point where Dutroux was no longer the focus. During the investigation, these victims were each assigned a number, appended after an X.

For example, X1 was first sexually abused at the age of two, at the hands of her grandmother, who owned a hotel frequented by pedophiles. At the age of 4, she was introduced to a 'pimp' who would take her out to other locations for abuse and torture. She was diagnosed with Multiple Personality Disorder, now known as Dissociative Identity Disorder. Even after getting married and moving away at the age of 19, she was never able to fully leave the 'network': Occasionally, when her husband was out of town, her old pimp would show up and take her back to places she was abused as a child, and would be raped.[404] She named and described in great detail, to a specially assembled police team, the people and places involved in the pedophile ring. Senior judges, one of the country's most powerful politicians - now dead - and a very influential banker were included.[405]

> "The sessions not only involved sex, they included sadism, torture and murder; and again, she described in detail, the place, the victims and how they were killed." - BBC[406]

X1 and other witnesses recounted being raped by dogs and snakes, and being forced to witness the murders of other children which were captured on video tape.[407]

X1 was quoted as saying:

> "In Brussels there was a villa in which a room was set up with built-in cameras. Even in the 1970s these cameras were so discrete that only the people who maintained them and the child- prostitutes knew where they were located... Why did I had to get those guys clearly in the picture, why was I supposed to get them to hit me and brutally rape me? Why was 'regular' sex often not enough?... Blackmail, the word that was never mentioned, I only started to really understand when I was thirteen, fourteen years old..."[408]

The other victims told similar stories, all independent of one another. Most had developed Multiple Personality Disorder, and had been turned over to the 'network' by family members. Many accurately and independently verified locations and members of the network who were their abusers.[409] Perhaps most importantly, they all claimed that high profile members of society were involved.[410]

X1 also corroborated that one of Dutroux's associates, Jean-Michel Nihoul, was instrumental in the abuse parties. Nihoul had significant connections among Belgian political and financial elite, and later confessed to organizing an orgy at a Belgian chateau attended by government officials, described by the press as a 'Policeman's Orgy'.[411] It emerged that Dutroux and Nihoul were part of a long distance child trafficking ring that imported children from Slovakia, among other places. Nihoul would later be found not guilty, a decision made by the judges who overruled a 'guilty' verdict by the jury.

Just as the investigation was heating up and began to show promise, it was completely dismantled from higher powers. Jean-Marc Conorrette was dismissed from the case, which drew huge criticism from across the nation.[412] It prompted the event known as the 'White March', in which 300,000 Belgians from the nation of just 10 million took to the streets to protest the dismissal.[413][414] Conorette would later break down in tears in court while describing the death threats he received when he was still involved with the investigation.[415]

A second change that greatly affected the proceedings was the introduction of a strict hierarchy to the examinations of the witnesses, which was previously undertaken by BOB officers working independently, overseen by Gendarmerie Commandant Jean-Luc

Duterme. Duterme would conduct abusive interrogations which emotionally devastated the witnesses who were suffering from Multiple Personality Disorder. In addition, the prosecutor that replaced Conorette, Jacques Langlois, deliberately obfuscated the investigation. He sent police out on false tips and helped spread disinformation in the media. Jean-Marc Connorete once described how he felt about the leads that Langlois would end up investigating:

> "I regularly and much earlier complained about those terrible circumstances in which I had to work in the Dutroux case... We continually received information about all kinds of bizarre leads. Those then received a lot of media attention, but to us meant nothing but time loss... Just think about the Abrasax case and the digs in Jumet. If I remember correctly, the first leads in those two cases were already put under my nose in the very beginning of the investigation. Afterwards precisely Abrasax and Jumet were used by the media as an argument to say that the whole investigation was manipulated and pointed towards false leads. I experienced the same thing in the Cools case, in which the police began to manipulate and was wholeheartedly supported by the media." - Humo (Belgian publication)[416]

Fuel to the fire would be added when a highly regarded childrens activist, Marie France Botte, claimed that prosecutors were sitting on a politically sensitive list of high profile customers of Dutroux's thousands of video tapes.[417]

Marc Verwilghen, the Flemish parliamentarian who became the most popular politician in the country after leading the inquiry into Dutroux, claimed that many in the Belgian establishment, including heads of government, refused to cooperate, and sought to stifle and ridicule his report. He claimed that magistrates and police were officially told to not answer certain questions, in what he described as a 'characteristic smothering operation'. He was further quoted as saying “For me, the Dutroux affair is a question of organized crime.”[418] A parliamentary panel revealed the names of 30 government officials it said were complicit in the hiding of Dutroux's misdeeds, none have been punished.[419]

As the trial came to an end in 2004 and faded from the public spotlight, Dutroux adamantly claimed that he was not a lone pedophile but instead was acting on behalf of a large pedophile ring.[420]

> “Marc Dutroux insisted yesterday that he was not a "lone predator" who kidnapped and raped young girls but part of a wider paedophile ring... Dutroux portrayed himself as a victim, a "puppet in a show trial" who had to be put away to "hide the truth" and serve the interests of "organised corruption". Only 10% of the case had been examined, he said, asking why independent-minded policemen had been removed from the investigating team. He urged police to follow up clues he said would prove he was working for a network which kidnapped girls to be sold into prostitution.”

Today, many Belgians have expressed sorrow that most of the details of the evidence will never be known. The files are sealed, with the presiding judge claiming he saw no reason to reopen them. The Dutroux Affair follows a shockingly similar pattern to the events in Franklin, Nebraska. The local police have no interest in uncovering the child abuse ring and even go to seemingly absurd lengths to keep it a secret. The courts are hostile towards the witnesses and the trials are deliberately obfuscated. Charges of perjury are brought against those who refuse to recant their stories. The Federal investigators withheld proof of the claims of the witnesses, including the names of high profile members of the child abuse ring and visual evidence of their crimes.

The British Aristocracy Pedophocracy

> “Officers in London were inquiring into allegations made by a teenage rent boy that a Cabinet minister had been abusing him. The youth claimed to be one of a number of boys regularly having sex with rich and powerful men in the 1980s – some of whom would fly to the illegal orgies from Europe.
> As well as the Cabinet minister – who is still alive – he pointed the finger at judges, European bigwigs and senior civil servants. He told his story to detectives, who are understood to have received other allegations against the minister. But a former detective who worked on the case revealed they were suddenly told to halt the probe.

> The furious ex-policeman said: “It wasn’t that we ran out of leads but it reached a point where a warning to stop came. It was a case of ‘get rid of everything, never say a word to anyone’. It was made very clear to me that to continue asking questions would jeopardise my career.” - The Sunday Daily Star[421]

The passing of Sir Jimmy Savile in October 2011, entertainer, socialite and personal friend of the royal family, opened the floodgates of a myriad of revelations, with hundreds of victims coming forward claiming they were abused at the hands of Savile in esteemed institutions such as BBC and various hospitals. It seemed that many people where aware of the transgressions, but no one acted. Years later, new revelations are coming to light on a weekly basis. One interesting story was published in January of 2013 which read, “Jimmy Savile was part of satanic ring”.[422]

> “Dr Sinason told the Sunday Express she first spoke to the victim in 1992. “She had been a patient at Stoke Mandeville in 1975 when Savile was a regular visitor.
> She recalled being led into a room that was filled with candles on the lowest level of the hospital, somewhere that was not regularly used by staff. Several adults were there, including Jimmy Savile who, like the others, was wearing a robe and a mask.
>
> She recognised him because of his distinctive voice and the fact

> She was molested, raped and beaten and heard words that sounded like 'Ave Satanas', a Latinised version of 'Hail Satan', being chanted. There was no mention of any other child being there and she cannot remember how long the attack lasted but she was left extremely frightened and shaken."

Allegations of powerful pedophile rings in Britain were nothing new. Over 30 years ago, in 1981, Tory MP Geoffrey Dickens warned parliament against a pedophile ring he had uncovered, claiming that the network involved "big, big names – people in positions of power, influence and responsibility" and threatened to expose them in Parliament.[423]

Dickens made waves regarding the pedophile ring and dossiers he received for 4 years in parliament before backing down in the face of harassment and death threats. It seems that no one took him seriously at the time, but new evidence shows that his claims had merit: In January 2013, Scotland Yard reopened their investigation.

> "Last month Metropolitan Police began Operation Fernbridge into allegations that residents of a childrens home in Richmond, west London, were taken to the nearby Elm Guest House in Barnes, where they were abused. Pornography involving adults

> Sir Peter was among the visitors to the property. Others, according to a list seized by Scotland Yard last month, were the late Liberal MP Cyril Smith, the former Russian spy Sir Anthony Blunt, a Sinn Fein politician, a Labour MP, and several Conservative politicians.
> After neighbours complained about the arrival of children, the police raided the guesthouse in 1982 but the operation was mysteriously cut short. A 2003 investigation also failed." - The Independent[424]

Over 30 years later, the very first man that Dickens accused, Sir Peter Haymann, MI6 operative, was arrested. The new inquiry was prompted by MP Tom Watson, who has requested the original dossier collected by Dickens, but Scotland Yard has been unable to produce it.

Child abuse and pedophilia is rampant among the British elite, and the revelations of Jimmy Savile has opened new opportunities for investigations of former cases. After all, by December 12, 2012, the number of victims who had come forward claiming abuse at the hands of Jimmy Savile had reached 450, spanning dozens of childrens homes and hospitals.[425] Two famous childrens homes who were each subject to their own vast child

424Ibid.

425*BBC,* "Jimmy Savile abuse: Number of alleged victims reaches 450," December 12, 2012 abuse scandals in the last decade, Haut de la Garenne on Jersey Island, and Bryn Estyn Boys Home in Wrexham, North Wales, have had a series of fresh allegations in the wake of the Savile revelations.

In Wrexham, North Wales, the tale is a familiar one. Boys from the Bryn Estyn home would be taken to parties throughout the city where they acted as child prostitutes for socialites and were severely sexually abused.

> "Over the years, twenty seven police inquiries failed to disclose the scale of the alleged abuse. Thirteen reports by social services went unpublished. Several journalists reached out for the truth and ended up scorched by libel actions. When police finally launched a major inquiry, in 1991, they secured the conviction of only four care workers and concluded that there was no evidence of a paedophile ring. Clwyd County Council then commissioned its own independent inquiry but decreed that its report could not be published." - The Guardian[426]

Celebrated investigative journalist Nick Davies, writing for The Guardian, nails the concept and motivation behind these various sex abuse scandals with the following statement:

> "Power is the fabric of a paedophile ring, essential first to subjugate the children, whose passivity is essential for the adults'

---

[426] The Guardian, "Secrecy imposed on the exposure of alleged child abuse," October 1997 > indulgence; and second, where possible, to neutralise the authorities who might otherwise frustrate its activities."

Writing about a new Tribunal launched into the Wrexham case in 1997, Davies noted that over 300 men and women had come forward, naming 148 different abusers. The official Wrexham inquiry concluded that widespread abuse of boys did indeed occur at Bryn Estyn and other nearby childrens homes, and that dozens of potential inquiries were completely suppressed by administrators.

> "During the period under review there was a paedophile ring in the Wrexham and Chester areas in the sense that there were a number of male persons, many of them known to each other, who were engaged in paedophile activities and were targeting young males in their middle teens. The evidence does not establish that they were solely or mainly interested in persons in care but such youngsters were particularly vulnerable to their approaches."[427]

After the Savile revelations, 76 new victims came forward in North Wales, and the investigation has been reopened. The victims claimed that the 1997 inquiry only examined a small fraction of the abuse allegations.[428] The Independent revealed in 2012 further details of a coverup:

---

[427] The Telegraph, "Waterhouse Inquiry: recommendations and conclusions," November 6, 2012

[428] The Record UK, "North Wales abuse: 76 new allegations arise in investigation into a historic paedophile ring at 18 care homes," April 29, 2013

> “A damning report that laid bare the North Wales child abuse scandal might have aired the issue of sex attacks on children in care nearly half a decade before an official judicial inquiry in 2000. Instead copies of the report were ordered to be destroyed because the council that commissioned it feared it might be sued, The Independent on Sunday can reveal. Only a handful remain, including one obtained by this newspaper.” - The Independent

They claim the following details:

- “The then newly appointed North Wales chief constable, who was uncontactable yesterday, refused to meet them or help with access to the police major-incident database. "We were disappointed at the apparent impossibility of obtaining a breakdown of data. We are unable to identify the overall extent of the allegations received by the police in the many witness statements which they took."
- Some 130 boxes of material handed over by the council to the police were not made available to the panel.
- The council did not allow the inquiry to place a notice in the local press seeking information. "This was considered to be unacceptable to the insurers," says the report...
- "There were numerous claims and suggestions that senior public figures including the police and political figures might > have been involved in the abuse of young people," the report said." - The Independent[429]

After his death, Jimmy Savile would be repeatedly linked to the North Wales home. One victim claimed to have been repeatedly raped by the deputy head of the home, Peter Howarth, while Savile watched for entertainment.[430]

> "Howarth pulled down my pyjama bottoms in front of Savile. I was helpless as Jimmy watched. He thought it funny entertainment. This happened to a number of boys."
> According to "Ben", Savile would ask him: "What do you want me to do? Can I fix it for you." The victim added: "He kept on looking at me and smiling and laughing. Then he started rubbing my leg. After that I went to bed but he had other children brought up to him." - The Telegraph

The phrase "Can I fix it for you" is a sick play on Jimmy Savile's popular TV show, 'Jim'll Fix It', where Savile would put underprivileged or sick kids into contact with celebrities, or take them on trips, as a psuedo-charitable charade. This put Savile in contact with hundreds of vulnerable children. Peter Howarth was one of the few people convicted during the original North Wales child abuse inquiries.

He also said the men who abused him as a teenager frequently threatened him, saying: 'If you tell anyone, I'll have you killed.'” - The Telegraph

The Haut de la Garrene childrens home in Jersey has similar evidence of a massive coverup. Jersey, not subject to European Union regulations, has long been a haven of tax dodgers and secrecy. In 2008, more than 200 victims came forward with tales of rape and torture.[431] It soon became clear that many of the accused were Tory officials and aides, prompting a swift response by Prime Minister David Cameron to address the claims.[432] After his death, it was revealed that Jimmy Savile was a regular visitor of the childrens home.[433]

In 2008, after being replaced as the lead of the investigation, Police Chief Lenny Harper blasted the road blocks he encountered during his tenure and accused an 'Old Boys' network of obstructing his investigation.

> “In his most outspoken criticism of the Jersey authorities, Mr Harper told the Telegraph: "I can quite clearly say that the investigation is being held up. There are people on the island who just don't want us going down the route of this inquiry.

Mr Harper, who handed over the reins of the investigation to his successor on Thursday and officially leaves the Jersey force at the end of the month, also revealed fresh details of why he is so convinced that someone deliberately concealed the bones and teeth of five children, perhaps after murdering them...

Mr Harper has repeatedly said that because some of the 100 bone fragments had been cut, and because the 65 milk teeth found at the home had roots on them, meaning they did not come out naturally, children were either murdered or their bodies were illegally concealed." - The Telegraph[434]

Jimmy Savile was also linked to Haut de la Garenne. It was revealed in October, 2012 that his name had come up numerous times in a police investigation four years earlier but he was not investigated further.[435] Lenny Harper, the lead investigator into the Garenne home, told the Telegraph in 2012:

> “Savile chose his victims with great care; vulnerable and often troubled youngsters many in care homes. If they complained they were labeled troublemakers, or brutally put down. We know from court cases and statements made to my team [during the 2008 inquiry] that children in Jersey care homes were 'loaned out’ to members of the yachting fraternity and other prominent citizens on the pretense of recreational trips but during which they were savagely abused and often raped.
> “When these children complained they were beaten and locked in cellars [at Haut de la Garenne], which the Jersey authorities denied existed in 2008, but which can still be seen on YouTube footage. What chance did they have? This would have been the perfect hunting ground for Savile. The great and good of Jersey fawn over anyone with even loose connections to British royalty. Saville would have been a VIP to them and children would not

Regarding the statement about the 'yachting fraternity', Rupert Murdoch's famous tabloid News of the World launched an investigation and found that children were "loaned out to rich pedophile yachtsmen".[437] They alleged that Jimmy Savile personally delivered the boys to the club.

Jimmy Savile is certainly a weird character. He once gave an interview to Esquire Magazine where he stated:

> "I guess I am like Forrest Gump... I am like a sewing machine needle that goes in here and goes in there, but I am also the eminence grise: the grey, shadowy figure in the background. The thing about me is I get things done and I work under cover."[438]

Perhaps he is referring to his close connections with the United Kingdom's royalty. He was known to have acted as a 'marriage counselor' between Prince Charles and Princess Diana in the '80s. His weird behavior was noted by the press, where he was reported to greet Prince Charles' assistants by "taking their hands and rubbing his lips all the way up their arms."[439]

Jimmy Savile had numerous private meetings with former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, documents released in 2012 revealed. They detailed how Savile had petitioned

Thatcher to change a law that would allow easier tax deductions for Saviles involvement with the Stoke Mandeville hospital (where Savile was alleged to have abused girls during Satanic rituals). BBC explained that the documents showed that Thatcher was favorable to Savile's petition, and had several private meetings including lunch, though she was adamant that his name never be mentioned.[440] Later it was revealed that Prince Charles himself signed on to be the 'Patron of the Appeal'.[441]

As of January 2013, police have confirmed that at least 22 sexual abuse offenses by Jimmy Savile had taken place at the Stoke Mandeville hospital.[442] A 2009 police interview with Savile shows that all he had to do was threaten legal action against the police, and the claims of abuse against him were dropped. At one point he told the officers, in reference to the Stoke Mandeville hospital, "I own it."[443]

The connections between Savile and the UK elite are certainly cause for suspicion. In 2007, Prince Charles sent Savile a Christmas Card which read: "Jimmy, with affectionate greetings from Charles. Give my love to your ladies in Scotland."[444]

Perhaps the most disturbing part of the Savile tale is that everyone knew. One senior police officer told BBC that "We know Jimmy likes them young, he's got friends in high places."[445] A retired Leeds policeman has claimed that "there wasn't a copper in the city who didn't know Savile was a pervert".[446] BBC television and radio legend Sir Terry Wogan claimed that Savile's abuse was an 'open secret' and that it was common knowledge in the industry what he was up to.[447]

New revelations regarding Jimmy Savile and other pedophiles in esteemed institutions are being published every month. Hopefully the investigation trail will eventually expose just how deep the corruption goes.

Food for Thought:

1. How can a pedophile network infiltrate or compromise the authorities who would otherwise be responsible for exposing them and bringing them to justice?

2. Why is pedophilia so rampant among the elite?

---

3. How could Jimmy Savile and Larry King maintain their abuse when so many of their associates were aware?

4. Why does the reported child abuse go well beyond sexual acts into sadism and torture?

5. How widespread are these networks?

6. Is there collusion or connections between large pedophile rings?

7. Just how high up does the corruption go in Washington, the UK and Belgium?

Cults and Child Abuse

* * * *

The Finders

In 1987 the New York Times ran a story about a little known cult called "The Finders". The first paragraph reads:

> "Police officials here said today that six disheveled children found in Tallahassee, Fla., might be the offspring of members of a little known cult, but the officials said they had not ruled out the possibility of kidnapping."[449]

Who are these suspicious men, and what were they doing with 6 undocumented children, transporting them across the country? Two children who were with the Tallahassee men were found to show signs of sexual abuse.[450] The Finders had long been a topic of discussion for locals, who were naturally fascinated with the cult that lived amongst them. The Washington City Paper once described the Finders as such:

> "In appearance, the Finders—mostly middle-aged men, always in dark suits—wouldn't be out of place managing a local funeral home. But the behavior of the handful of adherents has people > wondering whether they arrived by flying saucer. Townspeople say the Finders constantly walk the streets, following people home and taking extensive notes and pictures. They often appear at local council meetings, never saying a word but simply observing the scene. At other times, they plunder the visitor's center of brochures, maps, and local travel guides. And they haunt the courthouse, scouring land deeds to find out who owns the local real estate," -Washington City Paper[451]

The Washington City Paper goes on to address the shocking specter of the alleged Satanist practices of the cult, with the startling revelation:

> "But among all the cryptic inventory, cops found a photo album entitled "The Execution of Henrietta and Igor," a series of snapshots depicting berobed adults and children slaughtering goats in a wintry woodscape. One photo depicted giggling toddlers pulling dead kids from a womb ("Baby goats!" ran the caption); another showed a grinning adult presenting a goat's head to a startled child."[452]

One US News and World Report article states:

> "The more the police learned about the Finders, the more bizarre they seemed: There were suggestions of child abuse, Satanism, dealing in pornography and ritualistic animal slaughter. None of > the allegations was ever proved, however. The child abuse charges against the two men in Tallahassee were dropped."[453]

The children were apparently en route to Mexico, to what the children described as a school for 'smart kids'. It was noted in a Customs Report that the children were unable to accurately identify themselves or their custodians, could not identify the purpose of telephones, toilets or televisions, and were only given food 'as a reward'.[454]

These shocking developments led to a raid on the Finders compound by the U.S. Customs Service. The report produced after the raid is astounding:

> "During the execution of the warrant at 3918/20 W Street., I was able to observe and access the entire building. I saw large quantities of childrens clothing and toys. The clothing consisted of diapers and clothes in the toddler to preschool range. No children were found on the premises."
>
> "Cursory examination of the documents revealed detailed instructions for obtaining children for unspecified purposes. The instructions included the impregnation of female members of the community known as the Finders, purchasing children, trading and kidnapping."
> "One such telex specifically ordered the purchase of two children in Hong Kong to be arranged through a contact in the Chinese Embassy there. Another telex expressed interest in 'bank secrecy' situations. Other documents identified interests in high-tech transfers to the United Kingdom, numerous properties under control of the Finders, a keen interest in terrorism, explosives and evasion of authorities.”

“There was also a set of instructions which appeared to be broadcast via a computer network which advised participants to move 'the children' and to keep them moving through different jurisdictions, and instructions on how to avoid police attention.”

“I was able to observe numerous documents which described explicit sexual conduct between members of the community known as Finders. I also saw a large collection of photographs of unidentified persons. Some of the photographs were nudes, believed to be members of Finders. There were numerous photos of children, some nude, at least one of which was a child 'on display' and appearing to accent the childs genitals.”

> presentation of the goat head to one of the children.”
> “The warehouse contained a large library, two kitchens, a sauna, hot tub, and a 'video room'. The video room seemed to be set up as an indoctrination center. It also appeared that the organization had the capability to produce its own videos. There were what appeared to be training areas for the children and what appeared to be an altar set up in a residential area of the warehouse. Many jars of feces and urine were located in this area.” - USCS Report of Investigation Continuation, filed by Special Agent Ramon J. Martinez, March 2, 1987[455]

A follow up report revealed the most shocking detail of the entire Finders case:

> “I was advised that all of the passport data had been turned over to the State Department for their investigation. The State Department in turn advised MPD (D.C. Metropolitan Police Department) that all travel and use of passports by the holders of the passports was within the law and no action would be taken. This included travel to Moscow, North Korea and North Vietnam from the late 1950's to the early 1970's.
> The individual further advised me of circumstances which indicated that the investigation into the Finders had become a CIA internal matter. The MPD report has been classified and is not available for review. I was advised that the FBI had > withdrawn from the investigation several weeks prior and that the FBI Foreign Counter Intelligence Division had directed the MPD not to advise the FBI Washington Field Office of anything that had transpired.”[456] (Emphasis mine).

After the Finders investigation became a 'CIA internal matter', no action against the Finders was ever taken, and the case has largely faded from public memory. Not everyone was content with the investigation simply 'ending'. Florida congressman Tom Lewis was quoted as saying:

> “'Could our own government have something to do with this Finders organization and turned their backs on these children? That's what all the evidence points to," says Lewis. "And there's a lot of evidence. I can tell you this: We've got a lot of people scrambling, and that wouldn't be happening if there was nothing here.'”[457]

Digging by the media could only produce one confirmed connection: A firm which operated as a 'front organization' for the CIA providing officers with computer training employed several members of the Finders. The Washington Times reported:

> “Other Customs Service documents and records from the FBI and Metropolitan Police provide indications that the CIA had links to the Finders or at least to some of the group’s members. A

The CIA has denied any connection to the Finders.

Presidio

On November 16, 1987, the New York Times article glibly revealed a shocking statistic: in a three year period from 1984 to 1987, over 30 different military bases were rocked by child abuse scandals, including West Point and Fort Dix.[459] This statement came on the heels of a massive scandal that was taking place in San Francisco, at a military base named Presidio.

> "A Federal grand jury in San Francisco spent 10 months investigating abuse allegations surrounding the Presidio center, and almost 100 children were examined for physical or > psychological signs of sexual abuse. At least four children were discovered to have chlamydia, a sexually transmitted disease." - New York Times

The San Jose Mercury described the West Point scandal and its relation to ritual abuse in chilling detail:

> "There had been sex abuse cases involving day care centers at several other Army bases. West Point was one of the most serious --until the Presidio. In July 1984, a 3-year-old girl was brought to the emergency room at West Point Hospital with a lacerated vagina. The child told the doctor who examined her that a teacher at the West Point day care center was the one who hurt her...
> Children at West Point told stories that would become horrifyingly familiar. They said they had been ritually abused. They said they had had excrement smeared on their bodies and been forced to eat feces and drink urine. They said they were taken away from the day care center and photographed." - San Jose Mercury News[460]

The Presidio that the San Jose Mercury News and New York Times mentioned is a military base located in San Francisco. It became the subject of one of the strangest and sickening child abuse scandals in American history. In 1987, some parents whose children attended the Presidio day care center began to notice signs of abuse in their children, who began acting strangely, using sexually provocative language and sexually inappropriate behavior. Upon taking their children to the hospital, it was revealed that they also suffered an array of physical symptoms showing clear cases of sexual abuse. When authorities would not act, the parents directly contacted the parents of other kids at the center and the result was shocking: 60 children had clear physical signs of abuse and 4 had contracted Chlamydia. Some were only infants.

[460] San Jose Mercury News, "Army of the Night," July 24, 1988

The American Journal of Orthopsychiatry wrote an extensive analysis of the victims of the Presidio. They stated:

> "The severity of the trauma for children at the Presidio was immediately manifest in clear cut symptoms. Before the abuse was exposed, parents had already noticed the following changes in their children: vaginal discharge, genital soreness, rashes, fear of the dark, sleep disturbances, nightmares, sexually provocative language, and sexually inappropriate behavior. In addition, the children were exhibiting other radical changes in behavior, including temper outbursts, sudden mood shifts, and poor impulse control. All these behavioral symptoms are to be expected in preschool children who have been molested."[461]

The U.S. Army was in no hurry to investigate the claims of child abuse. It took them 12 days to form a strategy group, and nearly a month passed before they notified other parents of the day care that child abuse allegations had been made. Although it is normal procedure to shut down a government daycare after such allegations, the Presidio Daycare Center remained open for nearly a year. By then, 59 other victims between the ages of 3 and 7 were identified.[462]

[461] American Journal of Orthopsychiatry, "PRESCHOOL CHILD SEX ABUSE: The Aftermath of the Presidio Case," April 1992

Reports of a satanic cult being housed within the military base had apparently surfaced many years earlier. Military Police had investigated some buildings after reports of a man dressed in all black holding a little girls hand had been reported. An MP was recorded as saying:

> “We kicked the door open and here's this nice little bedroom. In a corner was a mannequin with a gun aimed at the door. On the left side there was a bunk against the wall. There was a pentagram on the floor, a huge one. There were dolls' heads all over the ceiling, just off-the-wall stuff... We were sitting there, we've got a cult on the Presidio of San Francisco and nobody cares about it. We were told by the provost marshal to just forget about it.”[463]

On the Autumnal equinox of 1987, an occult day of importance, fire would strike a building adjacent to the day care, destroying many records relating to the center. A month later, fire would destroy the day care center itself. The ATF found that the causes of both fires had been arson, contrary to the Armies own investigation which claimed faulty wiring.[464]

Only one man would ever have charges brought against him: Gary Hambright, a civilian employee who oversaw the daycare center. However, the prosecution bungled the case, bringing to trial only the children who 'would make the best witnesses' and leaving out the most prolific examples of physical abuse, such as those with rectal lesions and missing hymens. The judge presiding over the case deemed the charges as 'too vague' and Hambright walked free. No other persons were charged and the US government quietly closed the case against Presidio itself.[465] The lawyer for the Presidio was Joseph Russoniello, who also defended the United States government during the Iran/Contra trials.[466]

At one point in the investigation, it was revealed that another man was being investigated by the police: Lieutenant Colonel Michael Aquino, military intelligence specialist. Army documents and child testimony showed that children from the day care center regularly took trips outside of the center, and many children were able to accurately identify what the inside of Aquino's house looked like. Investigators searched Aquino's house and retrieved thousands of videos and photographs, and found what appeared to be a soundproof room, but charges were never brought against him.[467]

Who exactly is Michael Aquino? It turns out he is an important piece of the puzzle. Aquino is openly a Satanist, who founded his own church called the Temple of Set. He coauthored the highly controversial document "Mindwar" in 1980, which would define the strategy and importance of Psychological Operations, aka PSYOPS, for the Department of Defense from that point forward. In 'Mindwar', Aquino argues that the reason for the failure in Vietnam was not tactical, but rather the United States simply lost the war of information, being unable to turn the Vietnamese to their cause and unable to convince the domestic public of the importance of the war.[468]

He proposes a new look at PSYOPS, claiming that it ought to be at the very forefront of the war effort, the very first and the most important technique employed as soon as conflict is deemed inevitable. No longer would 'tactical propaganda' such as leaflets and loudspeakers on the battlefield suffice, instead a vast array of propaganda and coercion techniques are needed. This goes beyond what we traditionally think of propaganda, such as planted news stories or front organizations that we saw in Operation Mockingbird. He also advocates 'Mindwar' on American citizens.

> "MindWar must target all participants if it is to be effective. It must not only weaken the enemy; it must strengthen the United States."

Immediately afterwords is some sick justification on the use of PSYOPS on Americans:

> "Under existing United States law, PSYOP units may not target American citizens. That prohibition is based upon the presumption that "propaganda" is necessarily a lie or at least a misleading half-truth, and that the government has no right to lie to the people. The Propaganda Ministry of Goebbels must not be a part of the American way of life. Quite right, and so it must be axiomatic of MindWar that it always speaks the truth. Its power lies in its ability to focus recipients' attention on the truth of the future as well as that of the present. MindWar thus involves the stated promise of the truth that the United States has resolved to make real if it is not already so."

So there is virtually no law barring the use of 'Mindwar' on Americans, because if it is not yet the truth, the Department of Defense will make it the 'truth'.

Perhaps most terrifying is Aquino's insistence that:

> “There are some purely natural conditions under which minds may become more or less receptive to ideas, and MindWar should take full advantage of such phenomena as atmospheric electromagnetic activity, air ionization, and extremely low frequency waves.”

Consider the magnitude of this statement, imagine the Department of Defense manipulating domestic and foreign persons with Extremely Low Frequency waves to alter their political and moral dispositions to align with the interests of the United States. It sheds light on a statement Aquino makes in the beginning of the document:

> “Psychotronic research is in its infancy, but the U.S. Army already possesses an operational weapons systems designed to do what LTC Alexander would like ESP to do - except that this weapons system uses existing communications media. It seeks to map the minds of neutral and enemy individuals and then to change them in accordance with U.S. national interests. It does this on a wide scale, embracing military units, regions, nations, and blocs.” (Emphasis retained)

Psychotronics, as defined by Aquino himself, is 'intelligence and operational use of ESP'. In the simplest terms, the Department of Defense has the capability to map a persons brain waves, and then use techniques such as ELF (Extremely Low Frequency Waves) to alter that persons brainwaves to a pattern more conducive to United States interests. This is the technique that Aquino is advocating to be used on domestic citizens, in the most defining thesis in PSYOPs history. And remember this paper was published 34 years ago. Where is the technology today?

As an important side note, Franklin victim Paul Bonacci once identified Michael Aquino as an associate of Larry King.[469] Rusty Nelson at one point identified Michael Aquino as a man who he had seen Larry King once turn over a suitcase full of cash and bonds.[470] In addition, Michael Aquino has been implicated in various other daycare and military installation child abuse scandals. One important example is the abuse case at the Jubilation Day Care Center at Fort Bragg, where multiple children positively identified Aquino as an abuser out of a video lineup of men dressed exactly like him.[471]

Satanism in Franklin, Nebraska

Two primary witnesses in the Franklin proceedings, Paul Bonacci and Loretta Smith, neither of whom knew each other, both told stories of being sexually abused at the hands of satanic cults operating in Nebraska. The Douglas County grand jury acknowledged that the allegations in the Franklin case "necessitated our studying satanic and pedophile activity in eastern Nebraska, particularly in the Omaha metropolitan area."[472]

Loretta Smith's testimony would be sealed by the Douglas County Grand Jury, but references in the Grand Jury Final Report shed some light on what she discussed:

> “In 1988 an Omaha girl, who was an inpatient at Richard Young Hospital, described a number of gruesome cult activities which she claimed to have witnessed between the approximate ages of 9 and 12.... According to the girl, she became involved in a cult where older male members sexually molested her and killed infants and children to establish their dominance over other cult members.”

Both Smith and Paul Bonacci claimed to have seen Larry King present at some rituals. Paul Bonacci wrote in his written history that King picked him up after school one day:

> "...and took me to the Triangle which is in a wooded area in Sarpy County. I witnessed a sacrifice of a human baby boy. Everyone was chanting and it was a yearly ritual around the time of Christ's birth to pervert the blood of Christ. They used daggers and cut the boy and filled a cup with his blood and mixed urine in it and forced all of us to drink from the cup and chant 'Satan is Lord Lucifer our King. Realm of darkness come now empower us your slaves.' Then they all began to chant some weird sounds and I got scared and was threatened I'd become the next sacrifice if I told anyone about it."

One of the names on the 'suspicious death list' surrounding the Franklin Scandal is Kathleen Sorenson, who took in the children who fled from the Webb family among many other abused children. Sorenson gave a stunning report to a Christian television channel which aired in Nebraska in 1989, based on her experiences with over 30 abused foster children who spent months or years in her home. It provides an eye-opening introduction to a shocking phenomenon known as Ritual Abuse. The claims without further documentation certainly seem to be fantastical, so I urge the reader to suspend their disbelief until after the empirical evidence of extreme abuse has been fully discussed:

> "We got involved and learned about this subject because we were foster parents and worked with a number of children. And several years back, several of the children began, after a period of time and building up trust, began to talk about some very bizarre events that had happened in their past and they were frightening and very confusing. I really didn't know what to think. We went to the police, and we went to social services and there was really nothing anyone could do. These children we worked with are now adopted, in safe homes, and probably would never have talked had they not felt able to trust the people they were living with. There are certain things that are in common in the childrens' stories when we talk about devil worship...
> There are things that come up in every single story, such as candles. They all talk about sex. Sex is without a doubt a part of every area of this, all sorts of perverted sex. That is what you will first hear, about the sex, about the incest, and it is so hard to believe. But once we get that, we have learned that we can go on and ask and find out... and it will involve pornography; that is always part of it. Part of the reason is that they can use that to threaten the children. "We have pictures, we will show the police if you talk." It makes the children feel that they are in great danger, and they are all very frightened of the law. They talk about the garish makeup that the people in the group wear, they talk about singing that they didn't understand. Obviously that is chanting, and that has come up in every one of these stories, and none of them call it chanting. There will be dancing. Most often that will involve sexual acts. There will always be a leader and they will be very frightened of the leader.

These children, from a very young age, and I am talking about children who came out of birth homes, the family they were born to, worshiped the devil. ...

The children I have talked to have all had to murder before the age of two. That is something beyond anything I could comprehend. But in some way, whether with the help of an adult's hand over theirs, by having them practice, by getting them excited to be part of the adult scene, they do murder. And the evil thing that happens is, that they really believe that they want to. They want to do what the older people are doing, and they are praised for that. And that becomes their goal, to be like the adults...

They are told they will never get out, no one will ever believe them, that there is no freedom, that "the law will get you," they are hopeless before they get someone willing to listen. They are threatened with death. Every time a child is killed in their group, they are told, "If you tell, this will happen to you." They have every reason to believe that. So even when they are into the [foster care] system, and with another family and begin to feel somewhat safe, they still expect these people to show up on the doorstep. They believe that these people know everything they are doing, everyone they're talking to.

One teenager told me that she had been told, that if she ever got married, that they would fool her, it would be one of them and she wouldn't know it ahead of time. They set them up to fail in every area. It is very prevalent in the Midwest, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri. Some people have speculated recently that these states are headquarters ....

As you listen to us talk about these things, there will be a natural part of you which will deny much of what you hear, and believe me, we did too. I would like to share this with you, partly in the children's words, so that you can hear the things that they said that nobody could make up, that no child could know. That's what eventually convinced me, along with the deep emotion. The grieving, screeching damage and hurt that they cry out with as they talk. The children I will be talking about, these are all children that I personally talked to. They are today between the ages of 5 and 17. When they talked they were between the ages of 5 and 15. When these things occurred to them, they were between the ages of, well birth, but of when memory enters in, I would say a year and a half to eight. So we are talking about very small children....

We are talking about children forming consciences at that time, learning right from wrong. These children do not know. They come out and do not know what is right. They are confused. What they did before, that they were rewarded for, is such a horror to anybody else, that they are shunned. And most often they have been in multiple placements, they will go to a home, they will steal, they will lie, they will hurt animals. One little guy would sharpen pencils and try to stab people. I don't mean poke, I mean stab. People don't like that in their homes. They don't have any idea what it is, they just think, "We have a weird kid." Many are sent to psychiatric hospitals where they are labeled psychotics, schizophrenics, and who would want them in?

I will begin with the first stories that we heard, which will seem horrible to you, but are very mild to me, because we have progressed and heard far worse things. The first story is about two little boys who were 7 and 9 when they talked, and they told about sexual abuse at one point, and were very grieved. We talked about good and bad touching and we thought we really had gotten to the bottom of it, and then that afternoon the little one began to cry, and when we couldn't get the answer from him, the older brother said, "He is probably crying because he was in the room, when they killed his friend."

That was the first one we know about. And as they described that, they talked about that particular victim being brought into a room, hands and arms tied, mouth taped, and how there had been x's marked on his body, on his vital organs. That was bad enough. Within a very few weeks we learned that it was not the adults who had killed that child. It was this oldest boy, who was talking. The next person that we talked to was a little boy, who was very borderline mentally. He had language problems, it was very hard for him to explain himself. And when he began to come out of it, everyone was startled the way he talked. We were real sure, we knew he had not been around these other children and heard anything, but we began to question ourselves, "Are we asking strange questions. Is there something odd about us which makes children come and dump these things on us?" The part which made me believe this child's story, he talked about different babies being killed, but this particular one being stabbed, he curled up in a fetal position, he was 9 years old when he was telling the story. He curled up in a fetal position, and his eyes got real glazed, and he said, "They cooked that baby on the grill." And I thought, he has really flipped out. I mean, I didn't know. And he said, "Oh, gross, it smelled like rotten chicken, or rotten deer." He then went on to tell us how they would cut out the heart, or cut off the sex organs, and save them in the refrigerator.

A very typical thing that these kids talk about. They worship the sex organs.... They kept it for another ceremony. I asked him where the bodies went. I did not get any answers from that child about what happened to the bodies, but the other two boys, who I spoke about first, eventually, they talked about throwing the babies in the fire. And I asked about that, "You mean they were dead when they threw them in the fire?" And the littlest one said, "No, no. Them was alive and them threw them." And by this time we were really getting freaked out. What were we going to do? How can you help these kids? Where do you find a therapist who can deal with this? ... But God set up a support system. Other families were helping us, and that really helped. The next child I will share about, and I am going sort of by categories here, how we learned, and the types of killings, this little girl is 11 today, she was 9 when she first talked. It was a very painful thing when she first started to share the sex things. The sex things are so harmful to the children and they are so embarrassed and it is so personal to the children, and they know that they enjoyed that. They know that. We had been through all that. She began to draw pictures of cats, and the cats all had tails that were on the other side of the page, or their leg was someplace else.

As we began to work with her and talk, she said that she had had to kill a pregnant cat. She first said that they had killed a pregnant cat. We said how did you know it was pregnant. Well, she could not explain that, but as we got into it, she confessed that she had had to kill the cat. And I asked her. And her description was, "With a knife, I put it in her bottom, and twisted it." Now you tell me, does a kid know that? If I ask a kid how do you kill a cat, do you think they will say that? Those are the kinds of details these children tell us. Later, and they eventually cut the cat open, and that was how they knew the cat was pregnant. And they eat parts of the cat, and the feces and the blood.

And again, this was just the beginning. It progressed, and the next time she had to kill a baby, the same way-put the knife in the bottom and twist. The baby was alive and he was screaming. And that child hears that, to this day, and has nightmares and flashbacks. And they cut the baby open, and they ate the baby. They do this, so there are no bodies left, and they bum what is left and grind up the bones. And she talked about that, pouring gasoline on the bodies and burning them in the back yard. And I used to think that was nuts, but I have heard it enough times now that I know it must be so....

We know there are mortuaries involved, to cremate the bodies, and that makes sense.... The most horrible story about fire that I have to tell, and this is extremely, extremely disturbing, it was a little girl, she was a teenager when she was telling me. And she was describing a barn where they used to go to have their meetings and they used to gather outside the barn, and there would be chanting. And then as they went inside the barn they would be split into different groups. And she was never with any of her family, they all went to different places. And I asked her where she had to go and she said "I was always in the burning room." And as she went on to describe the burning room, I thought, how she came out of this, with any sanity at all, I don't know.

She was a very small child. They would take in children, probably pre-schoolers, and they would hang them from the rafters in this barn, and there would be as many as five or ten hung in a row. They would be fully clothed, which is unusual, because frequently they are naked. The children, like this girl, were all given candles. And you can picture the ceremony as she described it. And the candles were lit. Then the adults would go forward and would pour liquid from a cup on each of the children's clothing, which was obviously gasoline or kerosene. And then they would give a signal and the others would have to go forward and set the children on fire. When they were done they would cut them down. The first child that this girl had to kill was a cousin, a little cousin. What does that do to you? But you couldn't object, because the children that objected were killed.

This child, about two years ago, just fell to the ground at Christmas time, everyone thinks that Christmas is such a > wonderful time. And she confessed that she hated Christmas, she couldn't wait until everything was put away, because all she could hear was babies crying. Christmas is the time when the most babies die. And she covered her ears and cried for hours, and screamed, "Stop it, stop it, stop it! Talk to God and make him stop it!" All she could hear is the screams and the babies crying.... Christmas for the children I have talked to, has been one of the worst times. I have had three children tell me about a very similar ceremony, and I will kind of merge that and tell you how it went. They were taken to a church, and all the children, it is a very festive occasion, and they are taken to the front of the church, and a small child is now brought in, two of them talked about babies and they put them on a platform. The adults are all celebrating and dancing, and singing and the children are getting into the spirit of it, and what they are doing is forming a circle around the child, and of course the child represents the child Jesus, and they begin mocking, and spitting, and calling names, and then they encourage the children to begin doing it, and you can imagine how it gets out of control. And at some point they hand all of the children knives and then they are all hacking, and slashing until the baby is dead, and then they all celebrate because the child Jesus is dead."

Kathleen Sorenson died in October 1989, shortly after this testimony. On a long rural road returning to her home, a car heading in the opposite direction crossed lanes and caused a head-on collision. Both the young woman driver and her husband had police records for cruelty to animals.[473]

Historical Precedent

The idea of active widespread satanic and other occult activity in the United States certainly seems ludicrous. But there is an historical precedent. Consider these two quotes from the works of Alestair Crowley, founder of the Church of Satan in the year 1900:

> “Moreover, the beast 666 adviseth that all children shall be accustomed from infancy to witness every type of sexual act, and also the process of birth, lest falsehood fog, and mystery stupefy, their minds, whose error else might thwart and misdirect the growth of their subconscious system of soul-symbolism... There are cases when seduction or rape may be emancipation or initiation to another. Such acts can only be judged by their results.” - Crowley, The Law is for All[474]

> “In any case it was the theory of ancient magicians, that any living being is the storehouse of energy varying in quantity according to the size and the health of the animal, and in quality according to its mental and moral character. At the death of this animal the energy is liberated suddenly. The animal should therefore be killed within the circle, or the triangle, as the case > may be, so that its energy cannot escape. An animal should be selected whose nature accords with that of the ceremony… For the highest spiritual working one must accordingly choose the victim which contains the greatest and purest force. A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim.” - Crowley, Magick in Theory and Practice[475]

Empirical Evidence

In 1996, three members of the American Psychological Association conducted a survey of the organization, receiving feedback from 2,709 clinical psychologists. 30% acknowledged seeing at least one case of “ritualistic or religion-related abuse since January 1, 1980”.[476] 2/3rds of these cases were described as 'religion related' and 1/3rd were described as 'ritual abuse'. Of those who acknowledged seeing these cases, 93% of the clinical psychologists said that they believed the abuse did indeed occur. The authors concluded that the psychologists, psychiatrists, and social workers who responded to their survey “overwhelmingly believed both the allegations of abuse and the allegations of ritual or religious elements of the abuse”.

Another study surveyed 810 members of the British Psychological Society who had patients who suffered from sexual abuse, and found that 15% had patients who reported satanic ritual abuse. Of these, 80% believed that their patient did indeed suffer from the reported abuse.[477]

[476] Bottoms, Bette L.; Shaver, Phillip R.; Goodman, Gail S. “An analysis of ritualistic and religion-related child abuse allegations.” Law and Human Behavior, Vol 20(1), Feb 1996

One study examined 270 cases of substantiated sexual abuse involving day cares in England found that 13% of the cases included allegations of ritual abuse.[478]

One survey of the membership of the International Society for the Study of Multiple Personality and Dissociation concluded that 88% of 1185 respondents "reported belief in ritual abuse, involving mind control and programming".[479]

> "In 1992 alone, Childhelp USA logged 1,741 calls pertaining to ritual abuse, Monarch Resources of Los Angeles logged approximately 5,000, Real Active Survivors tallied nearly 3,600, Justus Unlimited of Colorado received almost 7,000, and Looking Up of Maine handled around 6,000. Even allowing for some of these calls to have been made by people who assist survivors but are not themselves survivors, and for some survivors to have called more that one helpline or made multiple calls to the same helpline, these numbers suggest that at a minimum there must be tens of thousands of survivors of ritual abuse in the United States." - Catherine Gould, The Journal of Psychohistory[480]

In 2007, four researchers created an international online survey divided into three parts, available in English and German, called Extreme Abuse Surveys, in an effort to gather a large number of responses to gather preliminary data on the nature and prevalence of extreme abuse.[481] The researchers were Wanda Karricker, PhD and retired U.S. psychologist, Bettina Overcamp, PhD and active psychologist in Germany, Thorsten Becker, German social worker who won the "German Child Protection Award" in 1994 for his work with abused children, and Carol Rutz, a survivor of extreme abuse and mind control. The surveys show repeated allegations of abuse used for the purposes of mind control, which will be explored in the next chapter.

1,471 participants from 31 countries answered at least one question on the survey listed for 'Adult Survivors', and 451 people from 20 countries responded to at least one question listed for 'Professionals' who have worked with at least one adult survivor of extreme abuse. Of the adult survivors, 257 people from 15 countries responded that they had been victims of 'Government Mind Control' experimentation as a child, and 71 professionals from 6 countries responded that they had worked with at least 1 adult survivor of extreme abuse who reported to have been a victim of government mind control experimentation as a child. 166 survivors reported being experimented on by doctors who spoke German or with a heavy German accent.

Of the adult survivors, 236 reported to have been drugged against their will, 236 reported to have been sexually abused by multiple perpetrators, 228 reported being threatened with death if they ever discussed their experiences, 222 reported sensory deprivation experiments, 217 reported electroshock experiments, 197 witnessed murder by their perpetrators, 196 witnessed animal mutilations, 184 reported the use of feces in their abuse, 183 reported being used in child pornography, 178 reported starvation, 171 reported hypnosis, and 169 reported child prostitution.

Of the 257 EAS respondents who reported that secret mind control experiments were used on them as children, 69% (177) reported having been abused in a satanic cult. Of the 543 EAS respondents who reported that they had been abused in a satanic cult, 33% (179) reported having been used in secret mind control experiments as children.

[481] Extreme Abuse Survey

159 survivors had heard Greek letters being used during their abuse, and 160 experienced sexual mind control programming used for blackmail or personal use. 228 survivors answered 'yes' to the question: “My perpetrator(s) deliberately created/programmed dissociative states of mind (such as alters, personalities, ego-states) in me.”

Research has consistently shown that false allegations of child sexual abuse by children are rare. One 1987 study examined 576 consecutive referrals of child sexual abuse to the Denver Department of Social Services, and categorized the reports as either reliable or fictitious. In only 8% of the total cases were children judged to have possibly advanced a fictitious allegation.[482] In a more recent study, investigators reviewed case notes of all child sexual abuse reports to the Denver Department of Social Services over 12 months. Of the 551 cases reviewed, there were only 14 (2.5%) instances of erroneous concerns about abuse emanating from children. These consisted of three cases of allegations made in collusion with a parent, three cases where an innocent event was misinterpreted as sexual abuse and eight cases (1.5%) of false allegations of sexual abuse.[483]

Researchers into the phenomenon of Satanic Ritual Abuse have come to the conclusion that the phenomenon is widespread and transcends geographic boundaries.[484] One such study, titled “Multiple Personality Disorder and Satanic Ritual Abuse: The Issue of Credibility” states:

[484] Van Benschoten, Susan C., “Multiple Personality Disorder and Satanic Ritual Abuse: The Issue of Credibility” (PDF Warning)

> “The comparability of both the child and adult accounts is said to transcend geographical and relationship boundaries, with descriptions emerging from both survivor groups revealing common themes, behaviors, symbols, and paraphernalia. Assuredly, the possibility of cross-contamination of accounts exists when, for example, a group of suspected or potential victims seems to he involved in a single day care case, or when adult contemporaries are aware of the details of others' reports. However, one can not discount the similarity of accounts given spontaneously and independently by individuals who are unrelated personally, geographically, or through shared knowledge.”

The empirical evidence of ritual abuse for the purposes of mind control establishes that the phenomenon is widespread and international, and consistency between methods of abuse. Furthermore, the methods of abuse correlate both with known experimentation under MK-ULTRA and the testimonies of child abuse case studies such as Franklin and Presidio. It also reveals a solid consensus that psychiatrists who have been exposed to patients who have suffered from ritual abuse believe that the abuse did indeed occur. Its interesting to note that such a widespread consensus is relatively rare in the field of psychology, let alone for such a controversial topic.

The 'False Memory' Hoax

When the evidence of extreme abuse began surfacing in surprising numbers, the 'False Memory Syndrome Foundation' was set up to promote the theory that victims are suffering from a syndrome that creates false memories, often at the suggestion of psychotic parents or over-zealous psychiatrists. The members of the FMSF have been called as expert witnesses in hundreds of trials around the United States and have been routinely quoted as experts in the media. Their mission has been exceptionally successful, as the 'false memory syndrome' has become accepted as a fact in most of the public consciousness. Unfortunately, people rarely stop to ask the question, who exactly are the members of the FMSF, and how solid is their science?

Peter J. Freyd initiated the founding of the FMSF after being accused of sexual abuse by his daughter, Jennifer. His behavior has been particularly suspect, such as accusing his daughter of being brain damaged, despite the fact that she holds a PhD in Psychology, graduated magna cum laude from Penn and is currently a tenured professor of psychology at the University of Oregon. Speaking to The Oregonian, Jennifer Freyd stated that "I'm sometimes flabbergasted that my memory is considered 'false' and my alcoholic father's memory is considered rational and sane."[485]

Peter Freyd once stated that "With the help of Harold Lief and Marin Orne, the FMSF quickly gathered a respectable appearing advisory board, giving the new syndrome an aura of scientific acceptance."[486] Interestingly, Dr. Martin T. Orne has been heavily involved with MK-ULTRA experiments since the early '60s, where he undertook hypnosis studies at Harvard Medical School with a $30,000 grant from the CIA.[487] CIA documents have confirmed that Orne had a 'top secret' clearance in MK-ULTRA.[488] He has published many papers relevant to the creation of a 'Manchurian candidate', including one called

"Can a hypnotized subject be compelled to carry out otherwise unacceptable behavior?", another called "The significance of unwitting cues for experimental outcomes: Toward a pragmatic approach", and lastly "Restricted use of success cues in retrieval during post-hypnotic amnesia".[489] This is an interesting subject matter history given the FMSF's insistence that hypnotism is illegitimate.

Dr. Harold Lief was involved with brain electrode experiments at Tulane University, a notorious MK-ULTRA institution.[490] Another prominent member, David Dinges, was a co-worker with Martin T. Orne and has been involved in research for Naval Intelligence, who oversaw the precursor mind control experiments to MK-ULTRA.[491]

Founding member Ralph Underwager once proudly proclaimed to the pro-pedophilia publication Paidika:

> "What I have been struck by as I have come to know more about and understand people who choose paedophilia is that they let themselves be too much defined by other people. That is usually an essentially negative definition. Paedophiles spend a lot of time and energy defending their choice. I don't think that a paedophile needs to do that. Paedophiles can boldly and courageously affirm what they choose. They can say that what they want is to find the best way to love. I am also a theologian and as a theologian, I believe it is God's will that there be closeness and intimacy, unity of the flesh, between people. A paedophile can say: "This closeness is possible for me within the choices that I've made." Paedophiles are too defensive. They go around saying, "You > people out there are saying that what I choose is bad, that it's no good. You're putting me in prison, you're doing all these terrible things to me. I have to define my love as being in some way or other illicit." What I think is that paedophiles can make the assertion that the pursuit of intimacy and love is what they choose. With boldness, they can say, "I believe this is in fact part of God's will."[492]

Regarding the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, Columbia Journalism Review stated:

> "Rarely has such a strange and little-understood organization had such a profound effect on media coverage of such a controversial matter. The [False Memory Syndrome] foundation is an aggressive, well-financed PR machine adept at manipulating the press, harassing its critics, and mobilizing a diverse army of psychiatrists, outspoken academics, expert defense witnesses, litigious lawyers, Freud bashers, critics of psychotherapy, and devastated parents."[493]

The FMSF has repeatedly cited a study presented at a Harvard conference where researchers were repeatedly able to implant the false memory of mundane tasks like grocery shopping, into their subjects using techniques such as hypnosis.[494] It has been championed as proof that memories are easily manipulated. However, research has shown that memories of abuse function very differently than average memories.

> “However, leading memory researchers such as Dr. Bessel van der Kolk of Harvard Medical School maintain that traumatic memories, which typically are engraved in the sensorimotor processes, are not subject to the same kinds of contamination that can affect normal memory. Traumatic amnesia, described in the DSM-III-R as psychogenic amnesia, is a phenomenon which has been known to mental health professionals for more than 100 years. The clinically observed characteristics of traumatic memory formation and retrieval match precisely the patterns of memory recovery exhibited by SRA survivors, and strongly confirm the reality of their cult abuse.”[495]

There is also the case of Paul and Shirley Eberle, who are famous for propagating the idea of a 'satanic panic', that the widespread reporting of ritual abuse is merely a social contagion. They have published two books titled “The Politics of Child Abuse” and “The Abuse of Innocence” which promote this theory, and have been cited as experts in courts and the press. Ms. Magazine wrote a review of the interesting past of the Eberles, stating:

soft-core magazine in California called the L.A. Star that contains a mixture of nude photos, celebrity gossip, telephone sex ads, and promos for The Politics of Child Abuse.

In the 1970's, however, the Eberles were also publishing hard-core pornography. Their publication, Finger, depicted scenes of bondage, S & M, and sexual activities involving urination and defecation. A young girl portrayed with a wide smile on her face sits on top of a man whose penis is inside of her; a woman has oral sex with a young boy in a drawing entitled "Memories of My Boyhood."

The Eberles were featured nude on one cover holding two life-size blow up dolls names "Love Girl" and "Play Guy." No dates appear on the issues and the Eberles rarely attach their names, referring to themselves as "The L.A. Star Family."

The Eberles were the distributors of Finger and several other underground magazines, says Donald Smith, a sergeant with the obscenity section of the Los Angeles Police Department's vice division who followed the couple for years. LAPD was never able to prosecute for child pornography: "There were a lot of photos of people who looked like they were under age but we could never prove it." The pictures of young children in Finger are illustrations, and child pornography laws were less rigid a decade ago than they are today.

> "Sexpot at Five," "My First Rape, She Was Only Thirteen," and "What Happens When Niggers Adopt White Children" are some of the articles that appeared in Finger. One letter states: "I think it's really great that your mags have the courage to print articles & pixs [sic] on child sex...Too bad I didn't hear from more women who are into child sex...Since I'm single I'm not getting it on with my children, but I know of a few families that are. If I were married & my wife & kids approved--I'd be having sex with my daughters."
> Another entry reads: "I'm a pedophile & I think its [sic] great a man is having sex with his daughter!...Since I didn't get Finger #3, I didn't get to see the stories & pics of family sex. Would like to see pics of nude girls making it with their daddy, but realize its too risky to print."[496]

It is truly fascinating how 'compromised' the leading debunkers of ritual abuse are.

Conclusion

Even in light of the evidence, the idea of an active network of abusive cults certainly sounds ludicrous. In the context of psychopathy, the potential is at least recognizable.

---

[496] Ms. Magazine, "Paul and Shirley Eberle: A Strange Pair of Experts," December 1988

Cults serve as a network for psychopaths who enjoy sadistic sexual practices and the potential for concealing knowledge. The very concept of the occult is based is taking knowledge out of the circulation of the masses and reserving it for a select few. In other words, keeping knowledge for selfish usages and to use this knowledge to wield power over others.

Former members of the Church of Satan and other similar cults have testified that the basic goal of the 'occult knowledge' is to understand the human psyche, primary human motivations and how humanity functions. This knowledge is then used to exploit people. The worldview of these groups is extremely dark, and is based on controlling others, gaining knowledge to use as influence, and then partnering with like-minded individuals and groups to expand upon this knowledge and use it more effectively.

The next step into the rabbit hole is that these groups act as 'psychopath filtration' centers. They deliberately target psychopaths for initiation and then use their resources to put them into positions of power in a variety of fields such as politics, law, business, education, science and more. Franklin, Dutroux, Savile, the Presidio and the Finders are all examples of psychopathic networks that have infiltrated these institutions of power, and are each a small glimpse into the hierarchy of the Pathocracy.

The next chapter will explore the uses of extreme abuse for the purpose of mind control, and why so many men involved with MK-ULTRA would have a vested interest in marginalizing the existence of such abuse.

Food for Thought:

1. How connected are occult groups with each other?

2. Is the CIA responsible for various cults as 'front groups' for MK-ULTRA and other projects?

3. Why is the discussion of the existence of cults marginalized from the mainstream?

4. Why were the Finders interested in terrorism and explosives?

5. How widespread are networks that abuse and sell children?

6. What are the profits from child pornography and prostitution earned by cults such as the Finders used for?

7. How much influence has Michael Aquino's 'MindWar' had on official Psychological Operation policy?

8. How much has technology discussed in 'MindWar' regarding the manipulation of the brain advanced in the more than 30 years of its publication?

9. Is it disturbing that Aquino's Temple of Set, and likely by extension other occult groups, have knowledge and access to this technology?

10. Why were there child abuse cases at 30 separate military bases in a 3 year period?

Trauma-Based Mind Control

“'The end apparently justifies the means, is the approach we had taken,’ he said, ‘and so covert operations and assassinations, and maybe even the use of children in Monarch[497] and all these other things, seemed reasonable at the time, because we were saving the country. Everything for saving the country. National security and the Cold War. In war, all is fair.’” - CIA Director William Colby, as related by John DeCamp, Executive Intelligence Review, Volume 26, Number 12, March 19, 1999

“And to go a step further, he recalls one senior KGB man who told too many sexual jokes about young boys. "It didn't take too long to recognize that he was more than a little fascinated by youths," says the source. "I took the trouble to point out he was probably too good, too well-trained, to be either entrapped or to give away secrets. But he would have been tempted toward a compromising position by a preteen. I mentioned this, and they said, 'As a psychological observer, you're probably quite right. But what the hell are we going to do about it? Where are we going to get a twelve-year-old boy?' " The source believes that if the Russian had had a taste for older men, U.S. intelligence might have mounted an operation, "but the idea of a twelve-year-old boy was just more than anybody could stomach." - John Marks[498]

[497] 'Monarch' is the alleged name for the program of Trauma-Based Mind Control, most frequently given by the victims of the program themselves, although the legitimacy of this moniker has not been confirmed.

The idea of using a child for entrapment might have been too much for the CIA operatives to stomach, but what about to the psychopathic leadership?

Connecting the dots between the use of hypnosis, drugs and entrapment under MK-ULTRA, the abuse of children in Franklin, Belgium, Presidio and under the auspices of the Finders cult, and the extreme abuse perpetrated by occult groups against children, a dark picture begins to emerge. One link that ties together many of these cases is the creation of multiple personality disorder, now known as Dissociative Identity Disorder, in the victims of extreme abuse. Franklin's Paul Bonacci alleged that his condition was created deliberately by scientists operating out of Offut Air Force Base outside of Omaha, Nebraska, beginning at the age of 3.[499] Later, he was introduced to the pedophile and child abuse ring of Larry King, where he became a child prostitute to wealthy men and politicians around the country, as well as acting as a drug courier on many of his trips. Dutroux's first victim-witness, X1, alleged that her multiple personalities were induced at a young age, as young as two, by being introduced to a group of violent pedophiles at the age of two by her grandmother.

Indeed, Multiple Personality Disorder is a big part of the picture. The current understanding of the disorder is that its onset begins at a very young age, after a child suffers from horrific abuse, often sexual in nature, that in a very real sense 'shatters' the childs mind into a collection of coexisting personalities to deal with the abuse they have received.

> “As many as 98% to 99% of individuals who develop dissociative disorders have recognized personal histories of recurring, overpowering, and often life-threatening disturbances at a sensitive developmental stage of childhood.” - WebMD[500]

The brain apparently dissociates exceptionally well: researchers have found that sufferers of Dissociative Identity Disorder will often have no memories of abuse they endured, and go as far as to vehemently deny their past experiences, despite extensive documentation by hospitals and courts of the abuse at the time it happened, and in addition, lifelong physicals scars and symptoms that had arisen from the abuse. However, when an 'alter' was present as the dominant psyche, detailed memories of the abuse were present.[501] The same study found that the 'alters' would have completely distinct personalities, with different handwriting, and often, different genders.

It is very likely that the possibility of deliberately creating multiple personalities in a child was understood at least as early as the medical experiments undertaken during World War II by the Third Reich. A cursory reading of the available data regarding the work of certain doctors such as the notorious 'Angel of Death' Dr. Mengele shows that much of the research undertaken at concentration camps had to do with inflicting trauma and recording its various effects. A logical conclusion is that these psychopathic doctors attempted to understand and then exploit the condition.

Remember G.H. Estabrooks, associate of the FBI and CIA, and World War II hypnotist who was discussed in the MKULTRA chapter? Here is a salient quote, taken from a 1968 article in the Providence Evening Bulletin, which will set a stage for the introduction to the topic of Dissociative Identity Disorder and hypnotism:

[500] WebMD, “Dissociative Identity Disorder (Multiple Personality Disorder)”

[501] Lewis, Dorathoy Otnow et al. “Objective Documentation of Child Abuse and Dissociation in 12 Murderers With Dissociative Identity Disorder.” American Journal of Psychiatry

> “The key to creating an effective spy or assassin rests in splitting a mans personality, or creating multiple personalities, with the aid of hypnotism… this is not science fiction. This has and is being done. I have done it.”[502]

The CIA and Estabrooks conceded that only 1 in 5 people could be susceptible to hypnotism, and even less would be able to be subjected to the extreme dissociation and amnesia involved in the creation of multiple personalities. True to CIA form, recalling the MK-ULTRA chapter, was the research done towards increasing the susceptibility of hypnotic mind control through the use of drugs and electroshock. The latter technique offers a glimpse of the tip of the iceberg into a variety of techniques involving using trauma to store memories in a sensitive part of the brain, with long-lasting recall potential but otherwise amnesiac effects in the primary personality.

The extension of this research is known as Trauma-Based Mind Control. The general idea is to subject children to horrific and unthinkable abuse at a sensitive age of development with the purpose of deliberately creating multiple personalities. The alternate personalities would then be programmed, through the use of hypnosis, drugs and further trauma, sometimes to store sensitive information, sometimes to create spies, assassins, prostitutes and more. The victim's primary personality would be completely unaware not only that they had programmed alternate personalities, but that they had been a victim of extreme abuse in the first place. Due to the associated trauma, the programming would be stored in a different part of the brain than normal memories, increasing both the power of the memory and the difficulty of recall.[503] Using hypnotic suggestion, anyone with the proper information, such as a code word, would be able to access a victims alternate personality and exploit the programming.

The 'Greenbaum' Speech: A Trauma-Based Mind Control Exposé

In 1992, the preeminent psychologist in the study of clinical hypnosis, Dr. Corydon Hammond, PhD, gave an astounding speech delivered to the Fourth Annual Eastern Regional Conference on Abuse and Multiple Personality Disorder, sponsored by the Center for Abuse Recovery & Empowerment, The Psychiatric Institute of Washington, D.C. in which he explained his experiences with patients suffering from Dissociative Identity Disorder, titled “Hypnosis in MPD: Ritual Abuse.”[504]

Before analyzing the speech, here are Dr. Corydon's credentials:

- B.S., M.S., Ph.D. (Counseling Psychology) from the University of Utah.
- Diplomate in Clinical Hypnosis, the American Board of Psychological Hypnosis.
- Diplomate in Sex Therapy, the American Board of Sexology.
- Clinical Supervisor and Board Examiner, American Board of Sexology.

Dr. Hammond had been examining patients with Dissociative Identity Disorder and came across some startling discoveries, which he verified with many of his peers. Many of them had undergone horrific ritual and sexual abuse as a child exactly as described in the case studies examined in previous chapters.

---

[505] University of Utah Health Care, profile of Dr. Corydon Hammond, Phd.

After a brief introduction, Dr. Hammond began with saying:

> "In Chicago at the first international congress where ritual abuse was talked about I can remember thinking, "How strange and interesting." I can recall many people listening to an example given that somebody thought was so idiosyncratic and rare, and all the people coming up after saying, "Gee, you're treating one, too? You're in Seattle ... Well, I'm in Toronto ... Well, I'm in Florida ... Well, I'm in Cincinnati." I didn't know what to think at that point. It wasn't too long after that I found my first ritual-abuse patient in somebody I was already treating and we hadn't gotten that deep yet. Things in that case made me very curious about the use of mind-control techniques and hypnosis and other brainwashing techniques...
> The fascinating thing was that as I did a telephone consult with a therapist that I'd been consulting with for quite a number of months on an MPD case in another state, I told her to inquire about certain things. She said, "Well, what are those things?" I said, "I'm not going to tell you, because I don't want there to be any possibility of contamination. Just come back to me and tell me what the patient says." She called me back two hours later, and said, "I just had a double session with this patient and there was a part of him that said, 'Oh, we're so excited. If you know about this stuff, you know how the Cult Programmers get on the inside and our therapy is > going to go so much faster.'

> ...I've consulted in eleven states and one foreign country, in some cases over the telephone, in some cases in person, in some cases giving the therapist information ahead of time and saying, "Be very careful how you phrase this. Phrase it in these ways so you don't contaminate." In other cases not even giving the therapist information ahead of time so they couldn't. When you start to find the same highly esoteric information in different states and different countries, from Florida to California, you start to get an idea that there's something going on that is very large, very well coordinated, with a great deal of communication and systematicness to what's happening.
> So I have gone from someone kind of neutral and not knowing what to think about it all, to someone who clearly believes ritual abuse is real and that the people who say it isn't are either naive like people who didn't want to believe the Holocaust or—they're dirty."

Immediately we get the understanding that these victims are not confined geographically, and in addition, an insight into how Dr. Hammond approached his investigation as to avoid 'hypnotic suggestion' and other techniques which the 'False Memory Syndrome Foundation' cites as the basis of all ritual abuse claims. The last line, stating that those who deny the existence of ritual abuse are either naive or dirty, was met with lots of applause from the audience.

"What they basically do is they will get a child and they will start this in basic forms, it appears, by about two and a half after the child's already been made dissociative. They'll make him dissociative not only through abuse, like sexual abuse, but also things like putting a mousetrap on their fingers and teaching the parents, "You do not go in until the child stops crying. Only then do you go in and remove it." They start in rudimentary forms at about two and a half and kick into high gear, it appears, around six or six and a half, continue through adolescence with periodic reinforcements in adulthood.

Basically, in the programming the child will be put typically on a gurney. They will have an I.V. in one hand or arm. They'll be strapped down, typically naked. There'll be wires attached to their head to monitor electroencephalograph patterns. They will see a pulsing light, most often described as red, occasionally white or blue. They'll be given, most commonly I believe, Demerol. Sometimes it'll be other drugs as well, depending on the kind of programming. They have it, I think, down to a science where they've learned you give so much every twenty-five minutes until the programming is done.

They then will describe a pain on one ear, their right ear generally, where it appears a needle has been placed, and they will hear weird, disorienting sounds in that ear while they see photic stimulation to drive the brain into a brain wave pattern > with a pulsing light at a certain frequency, not unlike the goggles that are now available through Sharper Image and some of those kinds of stores. Then, after a suitable period when they're in a certain brain wave state, they will begin programming, programming oriented to self-destruction and debasement of the person. In a patient at this point in time, about eight years old, who has gone through a great deal of early programming that took place on a military installation, that's not uncommon. I've treated and been involved with cases who are part of this original mind-control project, as well as having their programming on military reservations in many cases. We find a lot of connections with the CIA."

The victim testimony of the use of drugs and other techniques is fascinatingly similar to the available evidence regarding MK-ULTRA experiments such as Dr. Ewan Cameron's 'psychic driving' and the documented search for drugs which help induce hypnosis. The references to this type of mind control being undertaken at military bases certainly seems absurd, as does Paul Bonacci's claim that he was victimized at Offut Airforce Base. But remember the New York Times article cited earlier that referenced 30 different military institutions having sexual abuse scandals within a 3 year period, and the depths of horrors unleashed at West Point and Presidio?

Another important aspect that Dr. Hammond mentions is the creation of certain brain wave state before the programming begins. When a mind control subject would be put into a certain brain wave state and hypnosis, then their programming could only be activated under that brain wave state, a type of 'state-dependent learning'. This increases the amnesiac effect of the abuse and programming from the primary personality of someone suffering from Multiple Personality Disorder.

Dr. Hammond goes on to describe the details of what a 'cult programming session' would entail for one of his subjects:

> “This patient now was in a Cult school, a private Cult school where several of these sessions occurred a week. She would go into a room, get all hooked up. They would do all of these sorts of things. When she was in the proper altered state, now they were no longer having to monitor it with electroencephalographs, she also had already had placed on her electrodes, one in the vagina, for example, four on the head. Sometimes they’ll be on other parts of the body. They will then begin and they would say to her, “You are angry with someone in the group.” She’d say, “No, I’m not” and they’d violently shock her. They would say the same thing until she complied and didn’t make any negative response. Then they would continue. “And because you are angry with someone in the group,” or “When you are angry with someone in the group, you will hurt yourself. Do you understand?” She said, “No” and they shocked her. They repeated again, “Do you understand?”—“Well, yes, but I don’t want to.” Shock her again until they get compliance. Then they keep adding to it. “And you will hurt yourself by cutting yourself. Do you understand?” Maybe she’d say yes, but they might say, “We don’t believe you” and shock her anyway. “Go back and go over it again.”

They would continue in this sort of fashion. She said typically it seemed as though they'd go about thirty minutes, take a break for a smoke or something, then come back. They may review what they'd done and stopped, or they might review what they'd done and go on to new material.

She said the sessions might go half an hour, they might go three hours. She estimated three times a week. Programming under the influence of drugs in a certain brain wave state and with these noises in one ear and them speaking in the other ear, usually the left ear, associated with right hemisphere non-dominant brain functioning, and with them talking, therefore, and requiring intense concentration, intense focusing. Because often they'll have to memorize and say certain things back, word-perfect, to avoid punishment, shock, and other kinds of things that are occurring.

This is basically how a lot of programming goes on. Some of it'll also use other typical brainwashing kinds of techniques. There will be very standardized types of hypnotic things done at times. There'll be sensory deprivation which we know increases suggestibility in anyone. Total sensory deprivation, suggestibility has significantly increased, from the research. It's not uncommon for them to use a great deal of that, including formal sensory-deprivation chambers before they do certain of these things."

The idea of 'cult schools' certainly recalls the 'Finders' case study discussed earlier. It is possible that after the series of revelations and inquiries such as the Joint Hearing of the Select Intelligence Committee during the 1970's prompted the CIA to discontinue their official relationship with these projects and instead contract them out to cults such as the Finders and Michael Aquino's Temple of Set. After all, official documents discussed in the MK-ULTRA chapter mentioned 6% of projects being too sensitive for any connections to the agency. In addition to the lack of official connection to the CIA, which diminishes liability and culpability, there is a bonus effect: Plausible deniability. When these projects are uncovered, people are simply be disbelief that such atrocious acts could have occurred, let alone connected to the United States government.

Dr. Hammond goes on to describe the different brainwave states during which programming took place, which were consistent throughout all of his patients and those of his peers: Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, Theta, Gamma and Omega, a phenomenon noted by over 100 of the respondents to the Extreme Abuse Surveys. Each brainwave state was associated with a specific type of programming and seemed to be present in a specific 'alter', which was also mostly consistent among the patients.

> “Alphas appear to represent general programming, the first kind of things put in. Betas appear to be sexual programs. For example, how to perform oral sex in a certain way, how to perform sex in rituals, having to do with producing child pornography, directing child pornography, or prostitution. Deltas are killers trained in how to kill in ceremonies. There’ll also be some self-harm stuff mixed in with that, assassination and killing.

Then there's Omega. I usually don't include that word when I say my first question about this or any part inside that knows about Alpha, Beta, Delta, Theta, because Omega will shake them even more. Omega has to do with self-destruct programming. Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. This can include self-mutilation as well as killing-themselves programming. Gamma appears to be system-protection and deception programming which will provide misinformation to you, try to misdirect you, tell you half-truths, protect different things inside. There can also be other Greek letters.

I'd recommend that you go and get your entire Greek alphabet, and if you have verified that some of this stuff is present and they have given you some of the right answers about what some of this material is, and I can't underline enough: DO NOT LEAD THEM. Do not say, "Is this killers?" Get the answer from them, please. When you've done this and it appears to be present, I would take your entire Greek alphabet, and with ideomotor signals, go through the alphabet and say, "Is there any programming inside associated with Epsilon, Omicron," and go on through. There may be some systematicness to some of the other letters, but I'm not aware of it. I've found, for example, in one case that Zeta had to do with the production of snuff films that this person was involved with. With another person,

> Omicron had to do with their linkage and associations with drug smuggling and with the Mafia, and with big business and government leaders. So there's going to be some individualism, I think, in some of those. Some of those are come-home programs, "come back to the Cult," "return to the Cult" program."

One gets the impression that there is a very large, tightly connected network working through numerous organizations and institutions to undertake these experiments. At one points, Dr. Hammond notes that while the programming seems to be widely systematic among victims with no personal or geographic relations, there is one factor that is always different: Erasure codes to remove certain aspects of programming.

> "Here's the flaw in the system. They have built in shut-down and erasure codes, so if they got into trouble they could shut something down and they could also erase something. These codes will sometimes be idiosyncratic phrases, or ditties. Sometimes they will be numbers maybe followed by a word. There's some real individuality to that. At first I had hoped if we can get some of these maybe they'll work with different people. No such luck. It's very unlikely, unless they were programmed at about the same point in time as part of the same little group. Stuff that I've seen suggests that they carry laptop computers, the programmers, which still include everything that they did twenty or thirty years ago in them, in terms of the names of alters, the programs, the codes, and so on.

I remember a woman who came in, about twenty-four years old, claimed her father was a Satanist. Her parents divorced when she was six. After that, it would only be when her father had visitation and he would take her to rituals sometimes, up until age fifteen. She said, “I haven’t gone to anything since I was fifteen.” Her therapist believed this at face value. We sat in my office. We did a two-hour inquiry using hypnosis. We found the programming present. In addition to that we found that every therapy session was debriefed, and in fact they had told her to get sick and not come to the appointment with me. Another one had been told that I was Cult and that if she came I would know that she’d been told not to come and I would punish her.

If anything meaningful comes out in a patient who’s being monitored like that—from what I’ve learned thus far, they’re tortured with electric shocks—my belief is if they’re in that situation you can’t do meaningful therapy other than being supportive and caring, and letting them know you care a lot and you’ll be there to support them. But I wouldn’t try to work with any kind of deep material or deprogramming with them, because I think it can do nothing but get them tortured and hurt, unless they can get into a safe, secure inpatient unit for an extended period of time to do some of the work required. I have a feeling that when you make inquiries you’re going to find that probably greater than fifty percent of these patients, if they’re bloodline, meaning mother or dad or both involved, will be monitored on > some ongoing basis."

Much of the rest of the speech deals with techniques for the therapists attending the conference to approach treatment of patients who have Dissociative Identity Disorder and were victims of Satanic Ritual Abuse. But Dr. Hammond doesn't hesitate to come to conclusions about the purpose of the programming or the perpetrators:

> "The way you create Manchurian Candidates is you divide the mind. It's part of what the Intelligence Community wanted to look at. If you're going to get an assassin, you're going to get somebody to go do something, you divide the mind. It fascinates me about cases like the assassination of Robert Kennedy, where Bernard Diamond, on examining Sirhan Sirhan found that he had total amnesia of the killing of Robert Kennedy, but under hypnosis could remember it. But despite suggestions he would be able to consciously remember, could not remember a thing after was out of hypnosis. I'd love to examine Sirhan Sirhan...
> The interesting thing is how many people have described the same scenario, and how many people that we have worked with who have had relatives in NASA, in the CIA, and in the Military, including very high-ups in the Military...
> People say, "What's the purpose of it?" My best guess is that the purpose of it is that they want an army of Manchurian

> Candidates, ten of thousands of mental robots who will do prostitution, do child pornography, smuggle drugs, engage in international arms smuggling, do snuff films, all sorts of very lucrative things, and do their bidding and eventually the megalomaniacs at the top believe they'll rule the world."

The end of Dr. Corydon's speech was met with long, sustained applause by the attendees of the conference who recognized the bravery of going public with this information was well as many having their suspicions regarding the nature of mind control in their patients confirmed.

Victims Speak

Bill Clinton's administration hosted the Presidential Advisory Committee on Radiation Experiments on March 15, 1995, and two victims of trauma-based mind control along with their therapist gave a stunning presentation of their abuse at the hands of MK-ULTRA. The case of victim Claudia Mullen is particularly interesting. Claudia had been referred to Psychiatrist Valerie Wolf after experiencing a sexual assault, and was unresponsive in therapy for many months. Unlike many other therapists, Wolf did not use hypnosis or any other memory retrieval techniques with Mullen.

> "It needs to be made clear that these clients have remembered these names and events spontaneously, with free recall and without the use of any memory retrieval technique such as > hypnosis. As much as possible, we have tried to verify the memories. I have sent information from one of my clients to Alan Scheflin, Professor of Law at Santa Clara University Law School (and a judicially recognized expert on mind and behavior control). He has been able to confirm that the information that she has supplied is absolutely true, and that her memories could not have been derived from any published source." - Valerie Wolf, speaking to the Presidential Advisory Commission on Radiation.[506]

Here are some excerpts from Claudia Mullen's testimony, from which she has earned no money and named men who were still alive:

> "Good afternoon. Between the years 1957 and 1984 I became a pawn in the government's game. Its ultimate goal was mind control and to create the perfect spy, all through the use of chemicals, radiation, drugs, hypnosis, electric shock, isolation in tubs of water, sleep deprivation, brainwashing, verbal, physical, emotional and sexual abuse. I was exploited unwittingly for nearly three decades of my life and the only explanations given to me were "that the end justifies the means" and "I was serving my country in their bold effort to fight communism". I can only summarize my circumstances by saying they took an already abused seven year old child and compounded my suffering beyond belief. The saddest part is, I know for a fact I was not alone. There were countless other children in my same situation and there was no one to help us until now...

---

In 1958 they told me I was to be tested by some important doctors from the Society, or the Human Ecology Society and I was instructed to cooperate. I was told not to look at anyone's faces, and to try hard to ignore any names because this was a very secret project. I was told all these things to help me forget. Naturally, as most children do, I did the opposite and remembered as much as I could. A Dr. John Gittinger tested me, Dr. Cameron gave me the shock, and Dr. Greene the x-rays. Then I was told by Sid Gottliebe that "I was ripe for the big A" meaning ARTICHOKE. By the time I left to go home, just like every time from then on, I would remember only whatever explanations Dr. Robert G. Heath, of Tulane Medical University, gave me for the odd bruises, needle marks, burns on my head, fingers, and even the genital soreness. I had no reason to think otherwise. They had already begun to control my mind.

The next year I was sent to a lodge in Maryland called Deep Creek Cabins to learn how to sexually please men. I was taught how to coerce them into talking about themselves.

I was used to entrap many unwitting men including themselves, all with the use of a hidden camera. I was only nine years old when the sexual humiliation began.

> Another time I heard Dr. Martin Orne, who was the director then of the Scientific Office and later head of the Institute for Experimental Research state that "in order to keep more funding coming from different sources for radiation and mind control projects", he suggested stepping up the amounts of stressors used and also the blackmail portions of the experiments. He said, "it needed to be done faster then to get rid of the subjects or they were asking for us to come back later and haunt them with our remembrances.
> I would love nothing more than to say that I dreamed this all up and need to just forget it. But that would be a tragic mistake. It would also be lie. All these atrocities did occur to me and to countless other children, and all under the guise of defending our country. It is because of the cumulative effects of exposure to radiation, chemicals, drugs, pain, subsequent mental and physical distress that I have been robbed of the ability to work and even to bear children of my own. It is blatantly obvious that none of this was needed, nor should ever have been allowed to take place at all, and the only means we have to seek out the awful truth and bring it to light is by opening whatever files remain on all the projects, and through another Presidential Commission on Mind Control."

In follow-up interviews, Mullen went into more details regarding the entrapment operations she was a part of.

> “The CIA kept hotel rooms in two of the best hotels in New Orleans, and year around they kept a suite. It was unique in that it had two bathrooms, and one bathroom was where they kept the hidden cameras, and I was actually shown the hidden cameras by three men who handled that part of it. They called him Captain George White. He was formerly a doctor. He used to be in the narcotics squad in California, and then he became a doctor and joined the CIA. And then there were two other men who worked with him. They would put me with the subjects who would be filmed (the men) and then when the men would come into town — I am talking about local politicians, government officials — anybody who they needed to possibly get something on, keep on file for future reference — should they need to coerce this person into supporting the projects. Senators, congressmen, anything like that — if they were in town, they were given this room. They had no reason to think there was anything strange about the room. It didn't look any different than any other room. It was just one of the better suites in the two hotels. I was shown how the cameras were set up behind mirrors — behind the mirrors which are in every hotel room, behind the dresser. They would sit there and they would film it.
> When I was first told this I ... when I was nine, and I went to the Deep Creek Cabins in Maryland. That's when I was taught I was > going to be part of this project, I had been accepted into this project, that I had been accepted into this project that would help the government stop Communism. "[507]

At another point, she stated that one man she was involved with as an entrapment operation was Frank Church.

> "Some of them were. I think they were afraid they would talk about the projects, and so they had to use something to keep them quiet. For instance, there was a guy named Church - all I knew was, he would try, he was very important to them because he was going to convince other people to let the projects keep going and so they had to get something on this guy, Church. This was later, when I was in high school. Supposedly he ended up talking other people into letting the projects keep going. He was supposed to be investigating - to see if there was anything wrong being done by the CIA - and so he of course decided nothing wrong was being done because they had a film on him."[508]

Senator Frank Church headed the United States Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, popularly known as the 'Church Committee'.[509] The committee was the first to investigate the CIA for their illegal actions under MK-ULTRA, Project Mockingbird and other enterprises. The alleged entrapment of Frank Church may explain how the CIA was able to escape any sort of reform from Congress and continued many illicit projects, albeit with more secrecy. It is the perfect example of how important entrapment was to the agency and how effective it could be to their uninterrupted continuation.

There is certainly the potential that Mullen's testimony is a lie. After all, many of the names she alleged to have been a part of her mind control program had been publicly named as a part of the MK-ULTRA program. At least one had not: Darwin Fenner, a 'high-society' socialite and MK-ULTRA institution Tulane administrator.[510] Mullen has not seemed to make any money from her allegations, against many men who were still alive, given to a Presidential investigative committee. In addition, her testimony was reviewed by Alan Scheflin, Professor of Law at Santa Clara University Law School and judicially recognized expert in mind and behavior control, who stated that her claims could not have been derived from any known publication, making her testimony worth discussing.

One particularly disturbing sentence from Mullen's testimony is: "[Dr. Martin T. Orne] said, 'it needed to be done faster then to get rid of the subjects or they were asking for us to come back later and haunt them with our remembrances.'" The idea that trauma-based mind control victims would be 'disposed of' once they outlived their usefulness is truly terrifying, but certainly in the mind of a psychopath it would be a logical and necessary step to take. Perhaps it explains why only a handful of victims have been able to recover from their abuse and synthesize their memories coherently enough to present their case of being abused.

Conclusion

[510] Tulanelink.com

All in all, trauma-based mind control has become a widespread program extended from original MK-ULTRA research. Extreme abuse at a young age has been revealed to be the most effective way of controlling the mind, and psychopathic networks in both occult groups and clandestine agencies jumped at the opportunity to create a veritable of mind controlled slaves using the most depraved and violent techniques at their disposal. By using torture such as electric shock and sexual abuse, these psychopaths have found a way to literally create blank slate alternate personalities which can be programmed for all sorts of illicit activities. Child prostitution, pornography, snuff films, assassinations and drug running are all direct applications of mind control programming. Another likelihood is programming among elite military units to undertake activities that would otherwise be balked at, such as death squads and terrorism.

The documented MK-ULTRA interest in electric shock, hypnosis and sensory deprivation are collectively the forerunners to trauma-based mind control, with the only missing documented ingredient being sexual abuse. It is certainly horrifying to consider that groups, government or otherwise, would deliberately subject children to such abuse but in the context of psychopathy, where psychopaths are sexual deviants and sadists, it is actually quite logical.

It is unclear how much of an overlap there is between the CIA and occult groups. The most likely scenario is that occult groups infiltrated the MK-ULTRA program and began using the knowledge they learned for their own subversive plans. It is also possible that the leading researchers into MK-ULTRA were simultaneously members of occult groups themselves. The crossover between occult groups and military occupations, such as the Presidio, Michael Aquino and Dr. Corydon's statement that “The interesting thing is how many people have described the same scenario, and how many people that we have worked with who have had relatives in NASA, in the CIA, and in the Military, including very high-ups in the Military," certainly demands further investigation.

Many of the victims discussed by Dr. Hammond and those who responded to the Extreme Abuse Surveys claimed to have been born into a 'direct bloodline', meaning that their families have been practicing in a satanic cult for as many as 12 generations. These children have been essentially born for the purpose of being abused and exploited by cults. Some have referred to themselves as the 'chosen generation', perhaps indicating that they have a role to play in the 'end game' of the Pathocracy. Children outside of these bloodlines seem to be more expendable, and are likely killed once they enter adulthood, when they are no longer useful for child prostitution or pornography, and their programming begins to weaken. We can only speculate about the death toll.

The two main groups involved in extreme abuse, the occult and clandestine intelligence agencies, seem to have distinct goals with significant overlap. The occult groups believe, in the vein of the writings of Alestair Crowley, that there are legitimate spiritual reasons for abuse and always perform their mind control operations during rituals. The CIA, on the other hand, seems more interested in espionage and entrapment. The overlap between the two is the goal of making money, and possibly the causing of violence and terror as part of a 'strategy of tension' campaign designed to steer the populace towards certain political goals and psychological states of terror, making manipulation of the populace easier.

Some researchers have suggested that trauma-based mind control dates as far back as the ancient Egyptian Mystery Schools, with the Book of the Dead serving as a blueprint to torture and utilize drugs to exert control over that person, raising the possibility that occult groups have been practicing a form of mind control for millenia and used the laboratory settings of the Nazis and the CIA to enhance and refine their techniques.[511]

[511] Ron Patton, "Project Monarch, Nazi Mind Control."

I want to state emphatically that the entirety of the evidence does not necessarily point to a world with comprehensive and full subversion by satanic cults. These cults comprise only a portion of the occult groups operating within the Pathocracy and instead seem to be one arm of the psychopathic network, being concealed and protected for the use and creation of mind controlled slaves, profits from drug and child trafficking, and entrapment of pedophiles in government, military, finance and beyond.

Ultimately, the full motivations of trauma-based mind control, the breadth of the operations and number of victims cannot fully be known until the Pathocracy which is responsible for these crimes against humanity is brought down and dissected. There is no knowledge more important towards this end than the extent of pedophilia and child abuse at the hands of the government and elite.

The disbelief of trauma-based mind control is understandable so we must collectively work together to bring further evidence to light. After all, before the liberation of Auschwitz, the general sentiment was that such atrocities were impossible and reports of mass murder were greatly exaggerated. Unfortunately, they did happen, and serve as a reminder that crimes against humanity at the hands of psychopaths are very real.

As the final word on trauma-based mind control, I would like to reiterate the conclusion of Dr. Corydon Hammond:

> People say, “What’s the purpose of it?” My best guess is that the purpose of it is that they want an army of Manchurian Candidates, ten of thousands of mental robots who will do prostitution, do child pornography, smuggle drugs, engage in international arms smuggling, do snuff films, all sorts of very lucrative things, and do their bidding and eventually the megalomaniacs at the top believe they’ll rule the world.”

Food for Thought:

1. Are 'Manchurian candidates' responsible for many of the assassinations and terrorist attacks in world history?
2. What are the limits of the possibility of controlling a society using mind control?
3. How many victims of Monarch are currently programmed today?
4. How many deaths have occurred due to the Monarch Program?
5. Why are members of the Military Industrial Complex so interested in marginalizing the existence of extreme abuse?
6. Just how dark does the crimes against humanity perpetrated by networks of psychopaths get?

The Pathocracy

On August 12, 1991, Investigative Journalist Danny Casolero was found dead in a bathtub at a hotel in West Virginia. He was in the state to meet a source on a story he was working on called “The Octopus”, which referred to a sprawling international criminal cabal that was exerting influence over a multitude of world events, such as the Iran hostage crisis that helped get Ronald Reagan elected. Although his death was ruled a suicide, the Casolero family was adamant it was a murder, citing threats on Danny's life.[512]

“The Octopus” that Danny Casolero was following is the Pathocracy. It has grown over the centuries, spreading its many tentacles across the globe, tightening it's grip on control of information, money, wars and beyond. The scope of this book was mostly kept within the context of the United States but the scope of the “Octopus” is truly international. Of course, we cannot fully know the extent of the beast until it is starved and dissected. But until then, we can still reasonable construct the 'big picture' of our current situation.

The history recounted thus far is the history of institutions that have become saturated with psychopaths, who began to act ruthlessly on their desires to control and manipulate others. The process is called Ponerology, a term coined by Polish psychologist Andrjez Lobaczewski, who studied how the governments of the Soviet bloc became increasingly evil. The term comes from the Greek word poneria, meaning lawlessness. Lobaczewski published his work in a book titled Political Ponerology.[513]

Lobaczewski had tremendous difficulty in publishing his book; At one point the manuscript was thrown in the furnace shortly before a raid by the secret police, and later the publication was blocked by none other than Zbigniew Brzezinski himself. He had hopes that by sending his manuscript to the Vatican, the word about Pathocracy would be heard on a global level. The manuscript was never returned. When he came to the United States, he figured that the freer society would be more accepting of his thesis; again, publication was blocked and his work was marginalized.

[512] Washington Post, “Area Writer Investigating Inslaw Case Found Dead,” August 13, 1991.

[513] The book, though dense and sometimes difficult to navigate, is one of the most important pieces of literature ever written. A PDF is available here, I recommend everyone reads it.

What was so revolutionary about Lobaczewski's work that it was repressed by the elite worldwide? It is impossible to come to any conclusion from his work except that the development of Pathocracy is inevitable as long as the general population is ignorant about the psychopathic other. Psychopaths have always existed, and they view the world of normal people, those with morality and conscience, as something to be looked down upon and exploited. Perhaps the most shocking revelation of his work is that psychopaths learn to recognize each other, even at a young age.[514] The natural result is a network of psychopaths, a subset of the population that recognize their differences and feel not only contempt for the rest of society, but the need to control and manipulate them as well. Over time they become experts in our weaknesses and follies, watching from a distance with curiosity and amusement.

The idea that Psychopaths can recognize each other is central to the Pathocracy. Imagine for millenia the process of evolution of a psychopathic cabal growing in power and numbers, increasingly manipulating society. You would think that the United States would think twice when in 2004 we had one presidential candidate who was a member of a powerful secretive society known as the Skull and Bones run against the Presidential incumbent who was also a member of the same secretive society.[515]

> Tim Russert: You're both were members of Skull and Bones, a secret society of Yale. What does that tell us?

---

[514] Political Ponerology, page 127

[515] The Telegraph, "The secret society that ties Bush and Kerry," February 1, 2004

> Sen. John Kerry: Not much because it's a secret.[516]

These connections are not insignificant, rather they are the tip of the iceberg of a vast covert network of collusion, the result of the process of the ponerization.

This process of ponerization has happened to the major centers of covert power in our world. The CIA, FBI, NSA and the global financial elite all the way down to local police departments have all become ponerized institutions. Understanding the condition and development of ponerized networks is not just important, it is perhaps the most important information that society can have. It is the next step in evolution of society, the next grand paradigm shift.

This is the context under which the Pathocracy operates. A system of government hidden from the public view and operated by a psychologically distinct subset of the population whom do not feel empathy, have no conscience, and derive pleasure from the manipulation and abuse of the mass of the population they view as inferior. When we read accounts of horrific extreme abuse perpetrated against children, understand that the psychopathic other enjoys this abuse. They derive pleasure from torture and murder.

These psychopaths recognize each other and over time they come to be the sole holders of power wherever it exists in an unadulterated form. Seemingly antagonistic institutions such as competing banks are actually operated by the same psychopathic cabal behind the scenes. In the same way that you and I naturally exclude social deviants from our social groups, psychopaths do with normal people. The result is a web of mutual conditioning of evil. Through a vast propaganda matrix, the Pathocracy is slowly conditioning humanity to conform to their sick standards such as endless war, resulting in a large portion of the population displaying 'secondary psychopathic' tendencies. This is the group that has subverted Democracy not only in the United States but around the world, and are currently manipulating world events behind the scenes.

Terrorism Today

At the outset of Operation Cyclone in the late '70s, the CIA, acting as an arm of the Western financial elite, began fostering close relationships with a variety of powerful and important figures in the Middle East. The goal was a profoundly different landscape in the region, one where governments could do little to prevent the manipulation and control of indigenous resources and ideas.

One of these men was Osama bin Laden, a wealthy Saudi businessman, who would maintain a relationship with the CIA for an extended period of time, coordinating Islamic radicals to promote the goals of the CIA through terrorism and indoctrination, and further acting as a scapegoat to cast out to the public as an enemy that, for some reason, evaded capture for decades.

Bin Laden was not alone, but his organization, Al-Qaeda, would become the centerpiece of a contrived conflict known today as 'The War on Terror', which would eventually create trillions of profits for the very people tasked with ending it.

The United States made strong alliances with the very countries and people responsible for the funding and proliferation of terrorists such as Bin Laden, Saudi Arabia and Pakistan. The intelligence agencies of these countries are entirely corrupt, and have grown massively in power, to the point where they exert more control than the nominal governments of these states, becoming the 'Deep State', where the true power of a country resides in its covert operations and with people who's names are generally not known to the public. Each of these countries, including the United States, act as an arm of the Pathocracy, and are responsible for a vast majority of the terrorism in the world today.

To some extent they literally operate organizations such as the Taliban and Al-Qaeda. This relationship becomes crystal clear when we see that the objectives of Al-Qaeda are perfectly in line with those of the Pathocracy. In Middle East conflicts such as the Libyan 'Revolution', struggles in Kosovo and Serbia, the Syrian 'Civil War', we see Al-Qaeda and the United States fighting on the same side.

The lack of any tangible results from the War on Terror is a 'smoking gun' for it's uselessness. Terrorism today benefits the Pathocracy and the Pathocracy only. The alleged true perpetrators of terrorism have their homelands bombed and ravished while it provides an excuse for continuous militarization and increasingly repressive domestic policies that do more to stifle legitimate domestic dissent than to curb foreign violence. Terrorism in countries such as Afghanistan and Iraq provide a convenient reason for increasing military presence, and to make the local governments dependent on the United States for protection. The resulting destabilization makes the economies and resources easier to exploit. It is not a coincidence that terrorism and destabilization seem to precede important geopolitical objectives in that region. Domestic terrorism serves to keep the populace in fear and justify increased infringement of civil rights. Tragic events such as school shootings are nearly universally followed by a push for an agenda that furthers the goal of the Pathocracy.

That the last known meeting of Operation Gladio coordinators was in 1990 ought to have been, and still should be, front page news. A variety of the actors involved with Gladio are absolutely still in significant positions of power today.

Gladio has evolved from a localized European campaign of terrorism into a global network. Former FBI agent turned whistleblower Sybel Edmonds refers to it as 'Gladio B'. The 'Strategy of Tension' has proved to be one of the most useful tools of the Pathocracy. Across the world, they have assassinated leaders, terrorized populations, destroyed infrastructure and spread destructive propaganda, and it has worked.

Where would Latin America be today had they not been terrorized by the Pathocracy? Decades of progress have been lost to repressive dictatorships propped up by the CIA spreading corruption and keeping the means of economic production in the hands of foreign powers.

And what about the Middle East? The landscape would be radically different without decades of interference. Minor differences between Islamic sects have been exploited to divide communities and nations. If even only a portion of the countries in this region united economically, the house of cards of the Pathocracy would tumble down. They know this, and it is why the Middle East is such a hotbed of violence and destabilization today.

* * * *

The Agenda

The Pathocracy has been firmly in control of the United States democratic process for decades. As it stands, there are no significant tangible differences between the two parties. To hide this fact, a variety of actors routinely circuit the mainstream media spitting vehemence towards their political 'rivals' while behind the scenes they joke about the smoke screen they have created.

The 'Agenda' that has evolved over the past decades is one of global hegemony, economic and military. Once distinct ideologies of liberalism and conservatism have evolved into neo-liberalism and neo-conservatism, who share the same goals and differ only slightly in means of implementing them.

The 'Agenda' is the agenda of the financial elite, using a manipulated democratic process, the United States military, and covert institutions as tools of maintaining their socially dominant position. When a foreign country threatens to upset the status quo, there is a regime change in nearly every single instance. In the few countries where this hasn't been accomplished, it is very likely that a regime change is in the works, a plan evolving behind the scenes as I write.

In the entire history of the United States, the country has not gone 40 months without a military conflict since at least 1963.[517] There are long periods where the enemy is focused around one vague ideology. Yesterday's communism is today's Islamic radicalism: the 'Red Scare' is alive and well, it has found a new face to demonize. Today's wars show no sign of ending.

The Pathocracy has repeatedly exploited crises to implement new legislation with applause that would otherwise be universally panned. 9/11 brought us the Patriot Act and Continuity of Government, which has laid the groundwork for a vast surveillance state and indefinite detention. What crises will be manufactured when the Trans-Pacific Partnership is ready to be officially revealed?

The Deep State

In the United States, and indeed much of the nations around the world, there exists two governments: one that operates out in the open, which the citizens are familiar with and interact with, and a parallel top secret government, whose existence is visible only to a select few and only occasionally exposed to the general public. This clandestine hybrid network of shadowy institutions and figures, both public and private, operates with its own intentions and its own power regardless of who is formally the Head of State.

> “The Deep State does not consist of the entire government. It is a hybrid of national security and law enforcement agencies: the Department of Defense, the Department of State, the Department of Homeland Security, the Central Intelligence Agency and the Justice Department. I also include the Department of the Treasury because of its jurisdiction over financial flows, its enforcement of international sanctions and its organic symbiosis with Wall Street. All these agencies are coordinated by the Executive Office of the President via the National Security Council.” - Mike Lofgren[518]

The 'Deep State' is also largely privatized. The Washington Post has reported that the number of private contractors with top-secret clearances has reached 854,000, a mind-blowing number in itself, and greater than the number of top-secret clearances among civilian employees of the government.[519] Wall Street is also a main component of the 'Deep State', by which the very grease that allows the cogs of the machine to run originates. If there is any one thing that the 'Deep State' requires, it is silent and uninterrupted cash flow.

[518] BillMoyers.com, “Essay: Anatomy of the Deep State,” February 21, 2014

[519] The Washington Post, “Top Secret America,” an investigate project spanning from 2013 to 2014

The 'Deep State' was legalized on September 11, 2001 after George W. Bush declared a state of emergency and enacted the Continuity of Government operations. It is the natural result of the progressive number of power grabs by various intelligence agencies detailed throughout the previous chapters. It is the 'Deep State' that is responsible for endless war and the one-party state, effectively ensuring it's continued existence and importance by providing an impetus for war, surveillance and propaganda while simultaneously removing any possibility of civilian reform.

The 'Deep State' is the vehicle from which the Pathocracy operates. It has expanded its operations into drug-running, child trafficking and more so that it does not have to rely entirely on taxpayer money for its projects. For all intents and purposes, the rise of the 'Deep State' can be considered a silent coup on the United States of America.

* * * *

Cults

When we peel back the layers of the Pathocracy and travel deeper into the rabbit hole, by exploring the depths of trauma-based mind control and child abuse that has become institutionalized among the elite, we are given a glimpse of the world of cults. The reality is that the Pathocracy sits on top of, and in the process conceals and protects, a 'black' network of Satanists and other occultists who explore the darkest evils imaginable. The Pathocracy conceals this arm of the octopus because it provides a valuable service to their goals and has a network of lots of influential people.

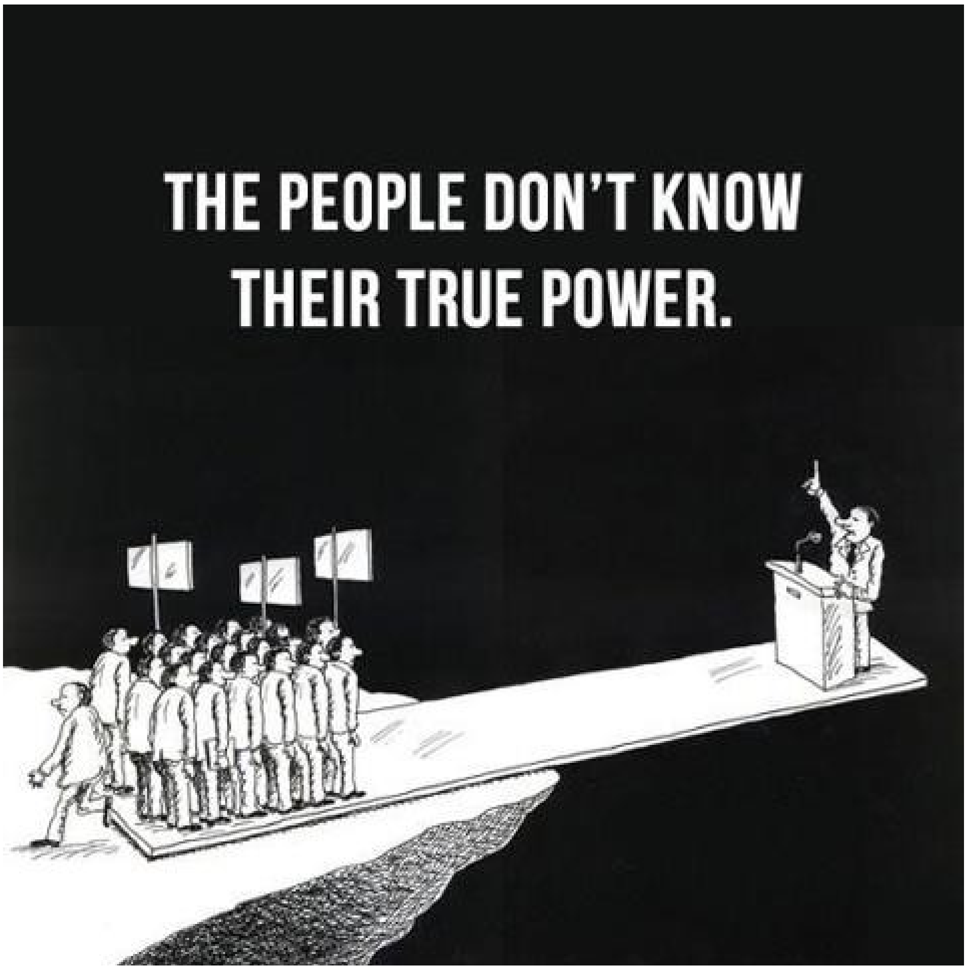
Furthermore, cults likely operate as 'psychopathic recruitment centers'. The whole idea of a cult revolves around hidden knowledge and the manipulation of the masses. Psychopaths are drawn to such ideologies, and are then recruited into the broader Pathocracy.

There is no topic that reveals the depths of depravity of the Pathocracy more than their use of pedophilia as a tool for control. It is how they conceal their biggest conspiracies, by holding over the heads of their subjects a type of blackmail that will ensure compliance. In addition, there is no topic that reveals the necessity of action than their abuse of children. And if the extent of this phenomenon can be exposed fully, no truth will bring down their reign quicker.

Unfortunately, it is necessary to paint such a dark picture because the reality is dark, and we cannot pretend that the 'endgame' of the Pathocracy does not exist. If resistance to the Pathocracy grows, we must be prepared for the worst, such as a series of major terrorist attacks, wars between major world powers, and the collapse of fiat currency. This is the 'Big Picture': An agenda of total control, and events are accelerating as the Octopus tightens the grip of its tentacles around the globe. We are living in grand times, at no point in history has the current moment been so important for the future of humanity.

Fortunately, the Pathocracy is doomed to fail.

Solutions



The problem of the Pathocracy seems to be so vast and complex; it is certainly intimidating. We are fortunate that the solutions are relatively simple. It begins and ends with education and non-participation. Ignorance is the sole tool that keeps the Pathocracy afloat. Its truly this easy. An awake populace can collectively choose to stop holding the pyramid above their shoulders by refusing to oil the gears of the machine. We need to collectively move our money out of banks, support local enterprise instead of multinational corporations, and be excessively vocal about the truth.

The time to start being as vocal as possible was decades ago. By this I mean that there is no time for anything else anymore. If you are awake, start making waking others up your number one priority. There are few things I desire to do than to forget all of this and get lost in World of Warcraft. Yet the stakes are too high, there is something bigger going on than our selfish desires. Imagine yourself reflecting on the past in 20, 30 years. Will you be content with the impact you had on the awakening, or will you regret not doing more as the police state becomes fully entrenched around you and it is too late to make a difference?

The first step is to become fully educated yourself. Be able to articulate the problem to even the most skeptical. Collect information and resources that effectively expose the abuses and inner workings of the Pathocracy. Then take this knowledge and share it. I know I have had reservations about sharing the truth with those who seem so content with their circumstances because shattering worldviews is not a pleasant experience by any means. But it is time to put these reservations aside. The building is on fire, and we need to evacuate before it is too late; those who will be momentarily angry for being slapped awake will be grateful once the gravity of the situation becomes clear.

While a personal discussion is certainly the most valuable tool, there are other means. For example, you can compile the sources and information you find most pertinent and send them out in an anonymous email to your contacts list.[520] Perhaps begin your email with “From a concerned friend, please read this information with an open mind”. If 1 out of 100 people is reached this way, the seed will be planted for an inevitable blossom. Ideas follow a pattern of being ridiculed until they reach a critical mass and are accepted. We must endeavor to reach this critical mass as soon as possible, before the grip of the

One valuable tool we have is alternative currencies, especially cryptocurrencies. First off, it is a great way to avoid using traditional means of money transfer and bank holdings that prop up the beast. Yet there is another tremendously important value, especially with Bitcoin and potentially with future Bitcoin competitors: It has made the counterculture rich. There are thousands of people who are receptive to the type of information contained in this book who thanks to new found wealth from cryptocurrencies now have the means to proliferate the truth far and wide. If this applies to you, please consider using your assets for a positive impact, perhaps by placing relevant information in public places, by organizing protests, or supporting independent media.

The worst thing we can do is wait for someone else to step up and be a leader, for someone else to organize a movement for us to join, for someone else to take a stand against the Pathocracy. A true paradigm shift has to start from within ourselves. An organization or institution has too much propensity to be led astray or infiltrated. After all, 'preventing the rise of a messiah' is a documented top priority of the Pathocracy.

Be the change you want to see in the world, and educate others to do the same. Research where the materials you consume come from, and make smart purchasing choices. Strive to minimize your 'corporate and government footprint'. It is truly as simple as this, and this chapter can be complete while being one of the shortest in the book. Stop holding the pyramid above us and let it collapse around us, then we can put the important pieces back together without the potential for the massive centralization of covert power that we see today. One by one is how the awakening grows, until it is inevitable.

The Awakening

The date was December 21, 2012, one day after my graduation from the University of Illinois. I was sitting at home, contemplating life, exhausted from a frenzy of theses, finals and celebrations. I wondered what I would possibly do with a degree in History, a question I had been deftly avoiding throughout my time in school. I wondered if I could ride out my bartending gig into adulthood, wondered how quickly I could get myself out of the suburbs and out of the Midwest.

That night, in my typical fashion of procrastinating instead of facing issues head on, I was lead to the dark corners of the internet. I was not a conspiracy theorist, but I found the topics interesting, and fell head first deep into the rabbit-hole of MKULTRA. A truth so dark and disgusting that I cried: a mountain of evidence that the cabal that I would eventually come to know as the Pathocracy is responsible for a global network of child trafficking and child abuse.

My worldview was flipped upside down the moment it all sunk it. Some call it 'Waking Up'. I looked at the clock, and the time read 10:33.

* * * *

Synchronicity was described by Carl Jung as 'temporally coincident occurrences of acausal events'. In other words it means events that are causally unrelated yet experienced together in a meaningful manner, related conceptually with the chance of them occurring together being very small. That evening, I would look at the clock again at 11:33, 12:33 and 1:33. It was the beginning of a lengthy and profound series of synchronicity I would experience with the number.

33 had been my lucky number for quite some time. At age 10, it was the centerpiece of an inside joke for my camp counselors. I didn't understand the joke, of course, but I emulated them as any 10 year old would. It was the number of my Lacrosse jersey in High School, and my standardized test score. Its labeled on the bottle of one of my favorite beers. Nothing seriously profound, but enough for it to be my number.

I remember being quite hungover on December 21, not just because of celebrating my graduation, but because of a series of parties centered around the end of the Mayan calendar, which some believed predicted the end of the world. Neither my friends nor myself truly thought that the world was going to end, it was just another excuse to get hammered and party as if there was no tomorrow. Yet in hindsight, perhaps this date was not a coincidence. The end of the calendar didn't intend to predict the end of the world; rather, it reflected the Mayan belief that the end of the calender era would usher in a new age: The Age of Enlightenment.

In the months proceeding December 21, I would go days, sometimes even weeks at a time seeing :33 on the clock every single hour I was awake. I had been a committed Atheist for much of my life. I still understand it to be one of the most rational worldviews. After all, the world is filled with evil and suffering, and the major religions are filled with corruption and hypocrisy. But this was a phenomenon I could not ignore, and decided to explore it further.

It went deeper than just numbers on a clock: I would come to profound thoughts and insights at :33, I met a great friend who had the 33rd ticket at the pub I flipped burgers at to pay the bills, I have frequently and repeatedly published important writing at :33. Following insights from synchronicity brought me to South America, where I met my soulmate and spiritual partner at 6:33 p.m.

I am having a direct communication with God and the experience has been phenomenal.

My experience with synchronicity goes beyond numbers. Reflecting on my life, I am fascinated by how events weaved their way together to put me in exactly the right place at the right time to wake up and to have developed the skills to synthesize this information and share it with others. When I needed to learn an important lesson, the structure of my life evolved to put me into a position to truly internalize new values and ideas, a sort of 'synchronistic flow' of events.

The 'ride', as the brilliant comedian and commentator Bill Hicks would put it, has not been easy. My whole life has been a series of 'learning the hard way'. I had to fail out of school to learn the value of learning. I had to spend weeks in a hospital with major burns to get a grip on my issues with drugs and alcohol. I had to get arrested to learn how my actions impact others. I had to experience obesity to learn the value of health and caring for my body. I had to experience deep and prolonged depression to appreciate happiness and action. A whole lot of experiences to synthesize in 23 years of living, but I am grateful for every one of them. They made me who I am today.

In the same sense, humanity is learning the hard way. We have to confront the Pathocracy in order to collectively evolve, to not just blindly follow the next paradigm shift but to actively construct it within ourselves. As the waning Pathocracy clashes with the rising Awakening, there will be a lot of suffering, but we should not be upset: Instead, we should be grateful for the catalyst that will be responsible for the inevitable beautiful renaissance that represents the light at the end of the tunnel.

* * * *

I absolutely wish I could lay out a comprehensive metaphysical thesis here but the truth is, I simply don't know what the truth is. I do know that at the very bottom of the conspiracy rabbit hole, is that each and every one of us is a powerful spiritual being. We have a part of us that is eternal and perfect, hidden behind layers of ego. Some have more layers than others, and that is OK: Not everyone began their journey at the same time, and eventually we will all finish it. There is a series of paradoxes: the present we are experiencing is but a blink of an eye along the path of evolution for our souls, yet simultaneously the road ahead of us is of the utmost importance. There is an infinite amount of life not only in this universe but each one that exists beyond it, that has existed before it and will exist after it. Yet, we are each special. This is the nature of infinity: We are not insignificant.

Entering the Age of Enlightenment, and Lifting the Veil, means more than just shining a spotlight on the Pathocracy. While I think the information contained within this book is important, I believe that it's true significance lies in showing that our collective understanding of reality is vastly incomplete and largely incorrect.

As we move forward, we must base our thoughts and actions not in hate and anger towards the Pathocracy but with love and respect towards one another. This is not only the best means of confronting the problems we face but it is simply the right thing to do. It is time to search deep inside ourselves and hold on tightly to our inner light, develop it and share it with others. Be a catalyst for the beautiful renaissance that is in our future. As you fight fire not with more fire but with water, fight evil not with evil but with love. The return of 'God Consciousness' to our world, or whichever name you want to give it: This is the true meaning of the Age of Enlightenment and Lifting the Veil, the underlying meaning of the existence of the Pathocracy and the struggles we will face as we confront it.

About Me

My name is Timothy Silver. I am 23 years old. I have a Bachelors degree in History from the University of Illinois. I understand that these credentials aren't going to blow anyone's mind, which is why I opted for the approach of citing every claim with a publicly available source. After all, I am simply too young to have the advanced degrees that would thrust this work into the spotlight. Does that make the information any less true, any less profound?

I have spent most of my life in Illinois, some of it in Chicago, some in the suburbs, and most of the last 5 years in Champaign. Currently, I have no permanent address. I am backpacking through South America experimenting with alternative ways of living and experiencing different cultures. My budget is 15 dollars a day and I have temporarily settled in Lima, Peru to spend time with my girlfriend and focus on production of more work related to shining light on the truth. The trip has been phenomenal.

Lifting the Veil is my first full project, and I have been running a blog called The Peoples History for the last 5 months. It has been a fantastic experience. I am grateful for all of the positive feedback I have received during this time. I've received threats that I consider credible as well, many months before I began writing this book, back when I began raising hell over the suspicious circumstances surrounding the death of Investigative Journalist Michael Hastings. I don't think there is any value in discussing them in depth other than to make the fact public record. For that reason, I won't be promoting this book to any significant extent. There is a time for bravery and a time for common sense. If you found the content of this book insightful, please share it with as many people as possible, anonymously if you must. It is the only way these ideas will spread.

Please contact me if you have any questions, and criticism or input, research you think is important, or if you simply want to say hi. I thoroughly enjoy all of the correspondence, and find my opinions and views are constantly being refined through discussing them with others.

In Memory of Michael Hastings

THIS WAS NOT an ACCIDENT

On July 18, 2013, Investigative Journalist Michael Hastings, the man who single-handedly brought down one of the most powerful men in the military with his reporting,[521] died in a fiery car crash in Los Angeles.

Suspicious circumstances of his death immediately began streaming in. For example, Hastings had contacted the Wikileaks lawyer just hours before his death worried that he was being followed by the FBI.[522]

The next day, an email that Hastings had sent to colleagues was released, titled 'FBI

In a 2012 interview, Hastings revealed that he had received numerous death threats from recent investigative reporting.[524] “Yes. Every once and awhile, I'll get a death threat from someone--like, 'if we don't like what you write, we'll hunt you down and kill you' kind of thing.”

The autopsy report found that neither drugs nor alcohol played a role in the crash.[525] Why, then, have witnesses described Hastings' vehicle, a Mercedes C250 (a car not prone to bursting into flames) traveling at full speed down a suburban road, crossing a red light and then skipping over a median into a tree, exploding?[526] Security footage from a gas station caught the speeding, the crash and the explosion, confirming the eyewitness testimony.[527]

> “Hastings was intensely interested in government surveillance of journalists. In May, the story broke about the Department of Justice obtaining the phone records of Associated Press reporters. A couple weeks later, Edward Snowden's revelations about the National Security Agency's massive surveillance program became public. Hastings was convinced he was a target....

Help Improve This Work

I am grateful for all of the help and insights from peers I have received over the course of writing Lifting the Veil. Each time I write an essay or present an idea, I find that my work is constantly refined from input. Due to this, I plan on continually releasing updates of this book as I refine my thesis and come across new research to synthesize. If you have any constructive criticism, any ideas to add, or any other type of help to offer, please do not hesitate to contact me at timsilverpeopleshistory@gmail.com.

Stay Tuned!

In the works:

- 'Lifting the Veil II', which will explore the history of government complicity in global drug trafficking, the foreknowledge of 9/11, the scam of the global monetary system, the real motivations behind modern geopolitics, the occult history of the United States political elite, and more. Much of the work for this book is already completed though cut from this edition to maintain an accessible length.
- 'The CIA, Cults, Mind Control and Child Abuse' (Title subject to change), an expanded version of the chapters MK-ULTRA, the Pedophocracy, Cults and Child Abuse, and Trauma-based Mind Control into a stand-alone book with an expanded thesis.

The Final Solution

JACK The RIPPER

STEPHEN KNIGHT

JACK The RIPPER

STEPHEN KNIGHT

With blood-curdling brutality he murdered five English prostitutes; terrorized London's East End; tantalized generations of crime buffs; and inspired books, films, and far-flung myths. The name Jack the Ripper triggers terror, but the man Jack the Ripper was never apprehended, and the crimes for which he has been held responsible for almost a century have never been solved—until now.

From the confused skein of truths, half-truths, and lies that has been woven about the case, an ace investigative reporter has finally teased the truth. Jack the Ripper was not one man, but three. He was not a single assassin stalking his prey through the gaslit streets of one of London's worst slums, but two professional killers and an accomplice, whose connections can be traced to a high-level conspiracy that went right to the heart of political upheaval and social unrest in self-righteous Victorian England.

Foreword

Jack the Ripper. A rubric name that glisters in the black Pantheon of criminal legend. He must be the best-known unknown murderer in the world. In his continuing anonymity lies his enduring fame. More ink has been spilt on him than blood flowed in all his murders; millions upon millions of words which, if placed end to end, would stretch from here to . . . nowhere. Nowhere, because, when all has been written, the evidence accumulated and assayed, the theories counted and discounted, the arguments for this or that suspect waxed hot and waned cold, we have always ended up precisely where we started—in a grey limbo of unknowing.

Always, that is, until now.

Now, Mr Stephen Knight presents us with a most cleverly worked out, plausible—brilliant, even—solution, in this thoughtful, wide-ranging book. I speak with feeling, for I have myself zealously pursued the red shadow through the twisting alleys and thwarting culs-de-sac of thirty-five years. In that time I have read all the literature and studied the case unceasingly. I was fortunate in that when I began I was able to examine the loci of the murders while they still remained largely unaltered, and had the opportunity of talking with a number of old people who had been living in the East End in the 1880s, and could provide me with clear, contemporary recollections of the events of that long-ago autumnal reign of terror. The results of all this lengthy research I incorporated in my critical analysis of the entire corpus of hitherto known facts and speculations, A Casebook on Jack the Ripper. I had travelled to what I held to be the absolute limits of conjecture. There was, I felt, no more that I could do. Even so, it seemed that, like the song the Sirens sang, the mystery was destined to remain as I had found it—insoluble.

But is it? Stephen Knight does not think so. He is confident that he has found the solution. And a very pretty case he makes out against his unholy trinity: for it is his belief that Jack the Ripper was not a solitary lurking slayer, impelled by the private excitements of an ungovernable lust for blood, but a conspiracy of three, who slew, not indiscriminately, but by careful design, and for a very particular reason.

His research has been massive and meticulous, and he has written a book which, even to one such as myself, saturated in minutiae and jaded by reading and re-reading through a wearisome acreage of previous print, never fails to intrigue, never bores, and succeeds in producing constant surprises.

That in itself is no mean achievement, but the author has also contrived by his industry and patent dedication to garner many new facts for the winnowing, and to bring novel and stimulating interpretations to old facts. In the course of his research, he has enjoyed the advantage of a sight of the secret Scotland Yard files, officially closed until 1992, and, by sheer hard work in tracking down previously unsuspected sources, earned the benefit of much fresh data.

His dismissal of all quondam suspects seems to me absolutely conclusive; but then I was never a 'Pedachenkovian', a 'Druittist', a 'Clarentian', or a 'Stephenite'. After following Mr Knight's strongly supported indictment of those he conceives to be the guilty parties, it is difficult to resist becoming a converted 'Gullible'.

A great part of the fascination of the Ripper case has always resided in its abiding mystery; the puzzle, the tantalizingly endless permutations of possibility—and impossibility—which it throws up, spinning the mind like a white mouse in a whirring wheel. It may be that, after so long, subconsciously, I don't want the answer to be found, the guessing game to end. For what is deader than a puzzle solved, a crossword completed? Is that why I hesitate? If so, I am, I admit, being less than judicial. But at least I am sufficiently elastic in my prejudices, sufficiently judicious, to recognize that this is a book of central importance which no one who has the slightest interest in the Jack the Ripper murders dare neglect to read and consider with the utmost care.

It does provide absorbing reading. And an alarmingly convincing final solution.

RICHARD WHITTINGTON-EGAN

Preface

Researching and writing this book has been one of the most difficult tasks I have ever undertaken. It has also been one of the most rewarding. It has led me to people I would have been unlikely otherwise to meet, people who began as contacts and whom I am now privileged to count as friends. That well-worn tribute, 'without whom this book could not have been written', applies to so many people in the present case that I am at a loss to know where to begin in thanking them.

At the top of the list of those to whom I owe a huge debt of gratitude are Paul Bonner and Ian Sharp. Without their initial research, and that of Karen de Groot and Wendy Sturgess, I should have been at an immense disadvantage in embarking on the quest for Jack the Ripper. For making their invaluable material available to me, and for their time and advice, given so generously despite the rigorous demands of their own lives and livelihoods, I am deeply grateful.

I wish to thank Joe Gaute, not only for his expert advice and encouragement but also for his open-mindedness in being prepared to listen to a beginner who thought he had something worth while to say. To Ken Thomson I should like to say thanks on a hundred different counts, notably his unfailing approachability, sensitive guidance and his many thoughtful suggestions about text and illustrations. To Ken must go the credit for the present title, an apter and far more memorable one than my own The Real Jack the Ripper.

For reading and making vital comments upon my synopsis and manuscript I must thank Robin Odell, whose own Jack the Ripper In Fact and Fiction is one of the few really good Ripper books.

Richard Whittington-Egan, that most audacious and tenacious of modern literary detectives, has contributed a foreword to the book. For Richard's charm and friendship, for his Holmesian percipience and his most illuminating criticism—offered always in the spirit of helpfulness—I can only say, most sincerely, thank you.

There comes a time for almost every author where he wonders if the book on which he has toiled will ever be published, so great and so numerous seem the obstacles. I am grateful for the kind words of encouragement given me by Donald Rumbelow when I reached my own, mercifully short-lived, period of uncertainty. Don's constant interest, consideration and many ideas have contributed in great measure to the present form of this book.

My good friend Bernard Taylor is to be thanked for pointing out some subtle and not-so-subtle errors in grammar that everyone else had missed.

Others who have read sections of my unfinished manuscript, or submitted themselves to my own readings from it, and whose views have been invaluable are Harry Jackson, my brothers Leonard, Richard and Adrian, Dr Anthony Storr, John Wilding, my stepdaughters Natasha and Nicole and my mother. Of especial importance was the inspiration provided by my friend Joan Moisey. Without her this book could, but is unlikely to, have been written.

The following people have contributed by giving their time for often lengthy interviews: Karen de Groot, Wendy Sturgess, Michael Parkin, Alan Neate, Robert Mackworth-Young, Harry Jonas, Elwyn Jones, William Ifland, Anthony Storr, Terese Stevens, Emily Porter and of course Joseph Sickert. I have spent many hours with Marjorie Lilly, and her reminiscences have provided rich background material. Here it is important to point out, however, that any conclusions reached in this book are my own.

Many people have helped by taking the trouble to write me letters, some extremely long and informative, others quite brief, all of them courteous. These include Michael Harrison, Timothy d'Arch Smith, H. Montgomery Hyde, Frederick Bratton, Alan Neate, the Marquess of Salisbury, Donald McCormick, Wendy Baron, Sir John Gielgud, Dame Peggy Ashcroft, Donald Rumbelow, Dr J. Mason, G. Lüdemann, Nigel Morland, Michael Thomas, Algernon Greaves, T.

Tindal-Robertson, John Symonds, Dr Alan Barham Carter, Martin Cresswell, Lady Muriel Dowding, Thomas Orde, Sir Philip Magnus-Allcroft, Mavis Pindard, the Law Society, the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple, the Director of Public Prosecutions, H. G. Pearson of the Home Office, Nellie J. Kerling and Constance-Anne Parker.

I am grateful to Mrs Edwina Browning and the many Freds of Scotland Yard's record department for their charming hospitality and for the help given by Mr T. H. East of the Home Office. Thanks are due to Mr Eric Harvey, Departmental Records Officer at New Scotland Yard, for permission to examine the Yard file on the Whitechapel Murders, to the Rt. Hon. Roy Jenkins, M.P., for permission to examine the Home Office papers on the case, and to Her Majesty the Queen for permission to see some of the unpublished private correspondence of Queen Victoria.

Thanks are due to the Royal College of Physicians for permission to reproduce part of a letter from Sir William Gull; to Michael Joseph, Ltd. for permission to quote from Jack the Ripper by Daniel Farson, to Joseph Sickert for permission to include several family photographs in the book, and to Faber and Faber for permission to reproduce the photograph of young Walter Sickert, from The Life and Opinions of Walter Richard Sickert by Robert Emmons. Photographs and transcripts of Crown copyright records in the Public Record Office appear by permission of the Controller of H.M. Stationery Office.

I wish to offer my sincere thanks to my friend Harry Jackson for his help whenever needed. Two of his splendid photographs are included in the book. I have met no one with more enthusiasm for the subject than Harry, and I have spent many happy hours talking Ripper with him and his charming wife Belinda.

I am grateful to my friends in general for tolerating my anti-social behaviour during the preparation of the book. Many of them I virtually ignored for eighteen months. I must particularly thank Terry and Janice Sweeney who, as always, were there when needed, notably when the paper ran out. Several people have lent me books which have proved most useful. They include Dave Bootle, Brenda Lyons, Richard and Leonard Knight, Harry Jackson and Joe Gaute.

Two high-ranking Freemasons have helped with information and comments. To both I am grateful, and comply with their wish to remain anonymous.

Others who have helped in the production of this work are Ron Rothery, Rod Southwood, Margaret Adey, Jack Hammond, Pauline Silver, Christopher Falkus, David Newnham and the resourceful staff of the British Museum Reading Room and of Tower Hamlets Libraries, especially the Local History Library and the Music and Art Library at Whitechapel.

Mr R. F. Armitage and Joyce Hatwell contributed more than they know.

Roy Minton made many suggestions that were both practical and imaginative. I am grateful for his expertise.

The two lives of the author who also has a full-time job are not always compatible. I have to thank Chris Coates for his help and understanding in allowing me time to carry out research. No one could ask for a finer News Editor.

Finally I must express my deepest gratitude to my wife Margot and our daughters Natasha and Nicole. They have listened with patience and encouragement to long and often complicated monologues about the Whitechapel Murders. I am grateful for the love with which they accepted Jack the Ripper as our house guest for nigh on two years. Most of all I am thankful to Margot for her faith in me, unwavering even at times when I had little faith in myself. Without her this book would never have been contemplated.

CHAPTER ONE

New Light on an Old Mystery

Jack the Ripper is a misnomer. The name conjures up visions of a lone assassin, stalking his victims under the foggy gaslight of Whitechapel. It is just this mistaken notion, inspired almost solely by that terrifying nickname, which rendered the murder of five East End prostitutes in 1888 insoluble. For Jack the Ripper was not one man but three, two killers and an accomplice. The facts surrounding their exploits have never before been teased from the confused skein of truths, half-truths and lies which have been woven around this case. Falsehoods deliberate and accidental have hopelessly enmeshed the truth. The idea of the solitary killer has been propagated by author after author, each striving to prove that his own particular suspect was without a doubt the most notorious criminal in history. It explains the wide gulf of inconsistency into which every theorist's 'logical' reasoning has ultimately fallen. It is the root of widespread disagreement, even over such a basic point as how many Ripper killings there were. Some say as few as four, some say more than twenty. Most experts, however, agree with Sir Melville Macnaghten, who joined Scotland Yard as an Assistant Chief Constable with the Criminal Investigation Department in 1889, the year after the murders. In a batch of confidential notes he wrote:

> The Whitechapel Murderer had 5 victims and 5 victims only.

Macnaghten's official notes list the five victims thus:

(i) 31st Aug '88. Mary Ann Nichols—at Buck's Row—who was found with her throat cut—& with (slight) stomach mutilation.
(ii) 8th Sept. '88. Annie Chapman—Hanbury St:—throat cut—stomach & private parts badly mutilated & some of the entrails placed round the neck.
(iii) 30th Sept. '88. Elizabeth Stride—Berner's Street: throat cut, but nothing in shape of mutilation attempted, & on same date Catherine Eddowes—Mitre Square, throat cut, & very bad mutilation, both of face & stomach.
(iv) 9th November. Mary Jane Kelly—Miller's Court, throat cut, and the whole of the body mutilated in the most ghastly manner.

Macnaghten was right in identifying these five alone as the victims of Jack the Ripper, but not for the reasons previous writers have ascribed to him. Elizabeth Stride, for instance, has been accepted as a Ripper victim on the most tenuous evidence, namely that she was killed on the same night as an established victim and that her throat was cut. On that shallow reasoning there is nothing to connect Stride with this series of murders; she was neither mutilated in the customary manner of the Ripper, nor, numerous writers have stated, was her throat cut from left to right like all the other victims, but in the reverse direction. That Stride's murder was one of the series is shown by new evidence, gleaned from secret Government and police papers and from a post-mortem report which was suppressed, even at the inquest. It shows that Long Liz Stride's throat was cut in precisely the same left-to-right sweep that dispatched the other victims.

There is also more concrete new evidence which entangles Stride in the web and turns the popular vision of the crimes topsy-turvy: four of the five victims knew each other. These were no random killings perpetrated by a sexual lunatic, but the systematic elimination of specific targets. Marie Kelly, in common with the other four women, was no hapless harlot who just happened to run into Jack the Ripper. She was the intended final victim. And in her hitherto obscure history lies the solution.

One of the myriad seemingly inexplicable details arising from Stride's murder was the butchery of Catherine Eddowes so soon after. Of all the theories propounded with such abandon, none has explained how Eddowes was found as far as half a mile from Stride, less than three-quarters of an hour later, and yet was murdered and elaborately mutilated by the same hand. At last the answer is available.

It is common knowledge that in some recess at Scotland Yard there is a secret file relating to the Whitechapel Murders. Rumour-mongers have insisted that the solution to the riddle, even the name of the killer, is concealed there. I have been given access to the Scotland Yard file, which was due to remain closed until 1992, and also to the secret Home Office papers on the case. Neither file identifies Jack the Ripper, but both provide crucial evidence in support of the thesis examined in this report. The fascinating information contained in the secret documents is published for the first time here.

The truth about Jack the Ripper is ugly. Many would rather not hear it, others will revile it.

But it is the truth.

The basic story which led to this book is no fantasy dreamed up by a nobody desperate for publicity, for the source of the information was New Scotland Yard itself. It was not released in an official statement but via a furtive leakage of intelligence from those who have maintained for years they have no knowledge to impart. The new facts gleaned from the Yard led eventually to an unknown artist who lived in contented anonymity with his family and pets in a large but unspectacular north London house. He repeated an unpleasant and incredible story told him by his father, a famous painter and renowned raconteur. The artist had no proof of the story's veracity, just an unshakable conviction that his father had not lied.

The first steps in the quest were taken early in January 1973. A revival of interest in Jack the Ripper which had started more than two years before and showed no signs of abatement prompted BBC Television to explore the possibility of a series of feature programmes on the murders. From the beginning shadowy Jack had haunted the febrile imagination of the public like no other killer in history. He had featured in more than a hundred books, numerous films and plays and countless magazine and newspaper articles. In November 1970, just as it seemed there was nothing left to say, interest in the subject reached a new intensity with the publication of a sensational and groundless article denouncing Queen Victoria's grandson, Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence, as the Ripper. The article was reprinted and discussed by three thousand newspapers all over the world, and almost every week between late 1970 and the time the BBC became involved the Whitechapel Murders were featured somewhere in British newspapers and periodicals, and two major theories, one completely new, were published in book form.

After prolonged deliberation the BBC decided not so much to climb on the bandwagon as to find out the reasons behind the sustained upsurge of 'Rippermania', and then to attempt to produce the definitive account of the case. Perhaps, the producers pondered in their more heady moments, they might even solve the mystery. It would be a fitting commemoration for the eighty-fifth anniversary of the murders.

For the first time since television began the BBC decided on a joint effort between their features and drama departments. The series was to be utterly factual; but the material would be presented and discussed by fictional characters, the popular detectives Barlow and Watt, to endow a serious documentary with the audience-attracting power of a thriller.

On the features side Paul Bonner—a man who had been responsible for several major programmes, including a controversial investigation of the Lusitania disaster—was chosen to produce the series. He was responsible for researching the entire factual content of the series, and was to head a team of researchers, all of whom shared his own enthusiasm for the subject. Customary sources of information such as newspapers, libraries, public records offices, the British Museum, articles and contemporary writings all had to be minutely examined. But this was to be the final word on Jack the Ripper, not an amalgam of previous words cleverly dressed up.

The centre of operations eighty-five years before had been Scotland Yard, headquarters of the Metropolitan Police. It seemed the logical place to open the new investigation. The Yard, since removed from their Victorian location at Whitehall to an imposing new building off Victoria Street, Westminster, had for years remained silent about the case, except for the odd comment to professional inquirers who were invariably told, 'The case is closed. We know nothing which has not already been published.' Yet this know-nothing stand was incomprehensible, Bonner reasoned. They must know something, if it were only the background details of an abortive investigation. Along with Elwyn Jones, the creator of Barlow and the man selected to write the Ripper scripts, Bonner went to New Scotland Yard to see if the police were prepared to help in any way.

They had lunch with a senior Yard man, whom Jones already knew. Though his name cannot be disclosed, he is regarded as an impeccable source. They quickly outlined their plans. A tense hour followed during which they underwent a long grilling about the intentions behind the proposed documentary. The contact was anxious to be assured that their treatment of the subject was to be conscientious in the extreme, and that they genuinely hoped to provide the definitive account of the Ripper murders. Once satisfied that this was the case—and it was no easy task convincing him—he produced a scrap of paper from his pocket. It bore several handwritten notes. He would not specify the source of the information he was about to give, but attributed it to 'one of our people'. He also requested that what he told them should be in confidence.

He asked if they had had any contact with 'a man named Sickert who has some connection with the artist'. He said the man knew of a marriage between the Duke of Clarence, son of Edward VII and Heir Presumptive to the throne until his death in 1892, and an Alice Mary Cook. The clandestine ceremony had taken place in 'St Saviour's' and the two witnesses present were later to become victims of the Ripper. Alice Mary died in 1920. No other information was given. Ian Sharp, a research assistant who worked on the series, described what followed:

> Thinking this could be a test to see how thorough we were in our research we were determined to find out, on what little information there was, whether a marriage certificate existed which would substantiate the story. The major problem turned out to be finding the place the wedding was supposed to have happened. Even hospitals and infirmaries had chapels attached to them at that time. But as Elwyn and Paul were not certain if their informant had mentioned "infirmary" or "church", it seemed a good idea at first to try just plain St Saviour's Church. There was a St Saviour's Parish at that time south of the river, so I went along to Southwark Cathedral, formerly St Saviour's, and saw the verger Mr Philip Chancellor. He kindly showed me the records for the years 1880 to 1889, but there was no sign of a certificate containing any of the names mentioned.
> The British Medical Association were more productive, and after several days they returned my phone call with the news of a St Saviour's Infirmary in Osnaburgh Street, just off Euston Road. Unfortunately, it no longer existed and the area has now been converted into offices and flats. The Marylebone Records Office had no trace of any papers belonging to the chapel of the infirmary, which was within their boundaries, and assured us they would be there if anywhere.

In the meantime two other researchers and I personally ransacked Somerset House in an attempt to track the wedding, and the existence of an Alice Mary Cook. We drew blanks all round. After a fortnight we had come up only with the existence of a St Saviour's Infirmary, which was anyway a long way from the area we expected it to be in—the environs of Whitechapel, or at least within a cock-stride of the area where three East End prostitutes would have been liable to stray.

So it was decided that we should try our Yard man for more information, and preferably the whereabouts of Sickert, if he still (or even) existed. I remember very clearly Paul Bonner ringing the informant and in urbane and diplomatic tones inform him we had found nothing, without actually saying so. He then asked if Sickert was still around. And then to Paul's astonishment he provided him with Sickert's phone number within a couple of seconds. Since this was a fortnight after their meeting and there had been no contact during that time, it appeared very odd that he should now lay hands on the phone number instantly. He may well have had it on the slip of paper, but why hadn't he given it to them at the time? The excitement was too much and the entire team retired to licensed premises for mouth-to-glass resuscitation.

That evening I rang Sickert and told him what I had heard without disclosing any sources, other than the fact that the BBC were interested, as they were doing a series of documentaries on the subject. He seemed very surprised and asked me to repeat what I had said to another man who was very well-spoken, sounded much older and was a little deaf. The old chap then handed the telephone back to Sickert and we made an appointment for the following morning.

The address I was given was an artist's studio in Myddelton Square, Islington, which belonged to a Mr Harry Jonas, the old chap. The studio belongs to another world, a fabulous old place which is utterly shambolic. There were canvasses, paints, brushes, pots, empty bottles, disused milk cartons, tins of paint and beans, and in the centre one of those splendid old stoves with a pipe reaching out through the roof. There were no windows, and the only source of daylight were two huge skylights. Harry Jonas and Sickert were there.

For three hours I was subjected to intensive cross-examination as to how I had got the information, what exactly had been said and by whom. They gave absolutely nothing away but it was during the course of this that I realised why the previous fortnight had been spent in abortive research. The names, places and events described by our informant at the Yard were slightly wrong. Jonas and Sickert spent a considerable time discussing whether Scotland Yard had deliberately given us wrong information, so that we would find it necessary to drop them and contact Sickert himself. They assured me they had not spoken to Scotland Yard.

They created a remarkable atmosphere of conspiracy, and I confess they did look worried and were extremely cautious. Sickert stressed that this was a personal story, and that his part in it was only "a small chapter in a very large book". They were agreed that if the story were told, the BBC would not be able to broadcast it.

Eventually we parted on the understanding that I would get more detailed accounts of the source of our information, and as soon as I had done so I was to contact them, and we would meet again. I left wishing I was working on Holiday 73 or some nice cushy little number in an anonymous corner of Quiz Unit.

A couple of days later I returned and this time the atmosphere was more relaxed. We went out to a café round the corner and Sickert bought the meal, despite my banging on the counter with my handkerchief.

Slowly the story began to emerge, that the Ripper episode had its origins in Cleveland Street, which at that time was the artistic centre of London where Sickert's father, Walter Richard Sickert, had his studio. At No. 22 Cleveland Street there was a confectioner's and tobacconist's shop in which Annie Elizabeth Crook worked. Her assistant, or the girl who worked in the shop with her, was Marie Kelly, the same girl who was the last Ripper victim. It was here that Prince Eddy, Duke of Clarence, had met Annie Elizabeth on one of his secret visits to the area.

There had been a wedding in St Saviour's Chapel but there was only one relevant witness, Marie Kelly. In 1888 there was a police raid on certain premises in Cleveland Street and two people were taken away, the Duke of Clarence and Annie Elizabeth, the latter being confined at various institutions until she died in 1920, insane. Marie Kelly had seen what had happened and also had care of a child, Alice Margaret. She fled to the East End, where she hid in a convent and the next time she was heard of was November 9th.

> All this information did not come in clear, precise, chronological order but I had to glean it from rambling and sometimes vague discussion as names and places descended on me by the dozen. They went backwards, forwards and sideways, and I was fairly confused. But out of all this the story began to take shape. The actual Ripper episode was hardly mentioned and no names were disclosed as to his or their identities, but I was given the impression that more than one person was involved.

So it went on. Sharp, Bonner and company patiently continued their research, and repeatedly visited Sickert and Jonas in an attempt to pry further information from their wary lips. Jonas would say nothing without the say-so of Sickert, and despite his earlier confidence in the BBC men, Sickert now seemed disposed to remain silent after all. Patience and sincerity are virtues, however, and as such reap their reward. Sickert, a shy and troubled man, at last realized he could completely trust his new friends, and felt he could mention, in confidence, a few names. But even then the story did not come either concisely or completely. The same rambling conversations were carried on, with no attempt at all to convince, merely to talk. He seemed to find some sort of relief in telling his story at last. And finally, the unbelievable narrative which his father had handed down to him began to make some sort of sense.

But still Sickert was adamant that his story must not be made public. He could see no benefit, only suffering, resulting from the publication of the truth so long after the event. Let them all bicker and squabble over their theories. What did it matter? He said he had even begun to think it was a mistake his having spoken in the first place. If he had kept quiet the story would have died with him, and 'the sins of the fathers would not have been visited on the sons', as he so enigmatically put it. The BBC team as well as Sickert's own closest friends, notably Jonas, set to work to show him that if he knew the truth it was his duty to speak out. His own Church, the Roman Catholic Church, rigorously opposed the concealment of any sin. Only good could come from the truth being known. After many weeks of coaxing, cajoling, reasoning and persuasion he came reluctantly to the conclusion that it would perhaps be best if his long-secret story were told. So on Friday 17th August 1973 Joseph Sickert appeared as a surprise witness in the final episode of the Jack the Ripper series.

I met Sickert the following month when I visited his Kentish Town home to interview him on behalf of the East London Advertiser. He had been chary on the phone, but agreed to see me after I pointed out that the Advertiser was the one surviving newspaper covering the area where the Whitechapel Murders had taken place, so had a sort of personal interest. He agreed that after his appearance on television he had nothing to lose by explaining his story more fully to the people of the East End. I found him a nervous little man, charming but withdrawn. His swept-back hair and elegant beard were silver-grey, and his face was rugged and aristocratic. He looked, I thought, like a delicate buccaneer. His voice was a self-contradiction, being at once genteel and rough. He pronounced words badly, but spoke them elegantly. He would say ' 'arsh' not as if it were 'harsh' and he was too lazy or untutored to pronounce the 'h', but as if ' 'arsh' were the correct pronunciation, and he spoke such peculiar diminutives with perfect diction. His friends knew him affectionately as Hobo. He did not seem eager to have any further publicity.

After several cups of coffee and a long dialogue on the ethics of speaking the truth at all costs, he seemed to warm to me, and said, 'I may have remained silent too long, I don't know. But the more time went by the more certain I became that no good would come of speaking out. I confess I do feel less burdened now I have shared what I know.'

Then he told me the whole story. His mother had been a nervous woman whose fears and unhappiness were born in the dreadful isolation of a workhouse childhood. Congenitally deaf, she had started life at a disadvantage. The brutal treatment she had received during much of her early life had combined with her physical disability to make her unnaturally shy of contact with strangers. She was over-protective towards Joseph, and from his earliest days the boy was given the impression that some sinister memory haunted his mother's life. The odd unguarded word, snatches of conversation accidentally overheard, his mother's visible tenseness when a policeman came into sight—all this convinced the perceptive young Joseph that there was something in her past that threw a dark shadow over her present.

Years later, when he was about fourteen, his father, the famous Impressionist painter Walter Sickert, took him aside one day and in confidential tones recounted a tale the boy at first found impossible to believe. The story began, he said, sub-siding into an armchair, in Victoria's Court in the early 1880s.

The Queen's grandson, Prince Eddy, later Duke of Clarence and Avondale, was a complex boy, and when he was twenty, in 1884, his mother, Princess Alexandra, became concerned about his personal development. His father Prince Edward, later King Edward VII, all but disowned his son. He did not like him, and took no pains to conceal the fact. To him the boy was a dunderhead, and about as fit to become King as one of his simpering college friends. To a devoted mother the restricted circles of the Court seemed a stifling environment in which to watch her boy grow up. If Eddy was to be King he must learn the realities of the people he would one day rule. And as he was of an artistic rather than an academic turn of mind, Alexandra looked to the world of art as the one hope for Eddy's salvation. There he could be himself; his personality could grow; he could develop something of the noble Saxe-Coburg charisma which she had once loved so much in her husband, but which in him had become submerged in immorality, and in Eddy had never appeared at all. Above all, Eddy could escape the narrow confines of the Court and the damaging antipathy of his father.

In turning to the art world Alix's eyes could not fail to come to rest on the handsome young painter Walter Sickert. Four years Eddy's senior, he was a third-generation painter, both his father and his grandfather having been artists to the Royal Court of Denmark, whence Alix herself had come twenty years before. Alix wrote to Sickert and requested him to take Eddy under his artistic wing. The Princess was used to getting her own way, and the painter was always eager to further his own interests by ingratiating himself with the influential. He readily complied with the request, and also with the proviso that Eddy's ventures into the world of reality would not reach the ears of his father or grandmother.

'Mama would be troublesome', the wayward Alix told Sickert, who well knew the rage of Victoria was not to be dismissed lightly.

During this period, in the early days of his career after his premature exit from the Slade School of Art and his apprenticeship with the great American painter Whistler, Sickert rented rooms in a great red-brick terrace house at 15 Cleveland Street, the centre of an area that had become the Montmartre of London. Cleveland Street ran parallel with Tottenham Court Road. Its surrounding by-ways formed a little Bohemian village, a self-contained community of artists, writers and shopkeepers snuggling in self-satisfied oblivion between two of the busiest thoroughfares of the metropolis. The area attracted the young, the creative and the revolutionary. The mingling of their diverse characters, consistent only in their rejection of convention, produced a colony of upper-class beatniks that included William Morris and the young Bernard Shaw.

In his long vacations from Cambridge, and during illicit absences in term-time, the young Prince would pay secret visits to Sickert. Leaving the palace in a carriage emblazoned with the Royal Arms, he would change vehicles at a predetermined spot and continue his journey to Sickert's in an ordinary coach, so forestalling by more than fifty years the system by which Edward VIII used to elude palace watchdogs when he was courting Mrs Simpson. Eddy's coachman on the second part of the journey was a likeable but ruthless young womanizer called John Netley, a man committed to carving a secure place in the service of the powerful, whatever the cost.

Eddy thrived in the relaxed atmosphere of the community, and eagerly urged Sickert to introduce him to as many varied people as the painter knew. Sickert's innate talent for seeing the good in others transcended class barriers, and he was accepted wherever he went, high or low. He was equally at ease with a fisherman or a king. Eddy grew to love him as a teacher and a friend, and grew ardently to identify himself with the alias he had assumed for his visits. As Sickert's younger brother Albert he had more freedom than he had ever tasted, and he relished the cloak and dagger touch of being referred to by his new acquaintances as 'young Mr S.'.

In the sweltering summer of 1884 Sickert introduced Eddy to a young shop-girl who frequently modelled for him. Her name was Annie Elizabeth Crook,[1] and she worked in the tobacconist's at 22 Cleveland Street, clearly visible from the front windows of the studio. Though illiterate, the girl had an effusive charm. She was of Scottish descent, and had wound her way to London from her country village in the Midlands, her rustic imagination brimming with visions of fortune in the big city. The drabness of the town had at first disappointed her, but she was intelligent enough not to be too surprised to find the streets paved with stone. She was far from beautiful, but Eddy was immediately attracted to her because of the resemblance she bore in his eyes to his beloved mother. To say Eddy suffered from an Oedipus complex would be overstating the matter, but the relationship between him and Alix had always been one of great intimacy. The natural closeness of mother and son was intensified both by the alienation he suffered at the hands of his father, and the lack of outside stimulus inevitable for any member of a royal household. His less than healthy dependence upon her was exacerbated by her own possessive love.

[1] Sickert said she was also known as Annie Elizabeth Cook.

Annie was flattered by the attention she received from her painter friend's younger brother. He looked at once strong and gentle, and his eyes betrayed kindness born of a strange sadness she could not fathom. On their first encounter, said Sickert, he saw those eyes look appealingly into hers, and through them a little boy seemed to reach out, as through a misty window, and he knew one side of Eddy cried out for her while another, more entrenched and cautious, restrained him. Annie could have no notion of the pangs and longings which haunted Eddy endlessly during his happy visits to Cleveland Street, and which clouded his new-found contentment with bouts of depression. For all his adolescent longings for freedom, he knew he had but to look behind to see the spectral image of the throne, which was to pursue him unremittingly to his grave. That seat of majesty must be his only objective. All other ambition must be subordinated to the natural fulfilment of his destiny, kingship.

But with Annie he could deceive himself, and in her embrace be convinced by the cheering motto of Chaucer's prioress, 'Love Conquers All'. He presently gave himself over fully to his youthful passions, and half expected his responsibilities to melt under the advance of his burning love. Their emotions flared, and each helped convince the other they were deeply in love. Perhaps they were.

Annie became pregnant almost immediately, and at Marylebone Workhouse the following April she gave birth to a girl, Alice Margaret. The child underwent two baptisms, Anglican and Catholic. The affair between the couple was still a closely guarded secret between themselves and Sickert. Annie continued to live in the basement of No. 6 Cleveland Street and to serve in the shop. A girl she had worked with there, an Irish Catholic called Mary Kelly, was paid by Sickert to give up her job and move into the basement as the child's nanny. Kelly was eager to oblige because it had been Sickert who found her the position in the first place. The proprietor of the shop had been in need of assistance, and Sickert had approached one of his many friends, a lawyer who ran an East End refuge for poor working women. Within a matter of days the lawyer had brought Kelly to Cleveland Street and she started work in the shop.

The need for secrecy over Eddy and Annie's affair was impressed upon them all by Sickert, who had been warned by Alix not to allow her son to 'get himself into trouble'. They later went through a Catholic wedding ceremony at a St Saviour's private chapel, and Sickert and Kelly were the witnesses. Sickert himself was married to Ellen Cobden in 1885, and from then on travelled regularly to Dieppe, the Normandy port where he was to produce some of his finest paintings. When Eddy was away—which was often—Sickert would traipse contentedly back and forth from France with Annie and the child in tow. At least twice during the summer of 1886 Kelly went too. During her stay she developed an affection for the more romantic ring of the French language, and laughingly insisted ever after on being addressed as Marie Jeanette.

Eddy and Annie's union was doomed from the beginning. Too many had come to know Eddy's real identity, and even the friendliest tongues began to wag incorrigibly. When insidious rumour and garbled third-hand speculation finally filtered into the higher echelons of Whitehall the reaction was first disbelief, then amazement, finally horror. The Marquess of Salisbury, then Prime Minister, hardly needed the sharply worded note instructing him to deal with the situation which had been penned in a paroxysm of fury by the Queen as soon as she learned the news. But Salisbury's interests were at variance with those of the Queen, who merely wanted the affair brought to an end and Eddy's part in it hushed up.

For Salisbury the tidings from Cleveland Street represented more than a family scandal. Victoria was furious not because she expected Eddy's behaviour to rain destruction upon the throne, but because a member of her household had dared have private feelings and a mind of his own, and that a serious course of action had been taken without Her Imperial Majesty's leave. After her initial fit of rage she regarded the episode as hardly more than an eldest son's peccadilloes, worthy of a reprimand but little more. The discerning Salisbury, however, could see that Eddy had been sowing not only wild oats, but the seeds of revolution.

Many pundits already thought Victoria would be the last monarch. Socialism was claiming new devotees with alarming speed, and there was something in the intensely patriotic spirit of the British that had always nurtured a covert mistrust of its Teutonic Royal Family. This dormant resentment was played upon unashamedly by the republicans, and as the seventies became the eighties it frequently seemed clear that England was entering her last years as a sovereign state. Poverty and disease ravaged the lower classes no worse than they had in previous reigns, but now, thanks to the republicans, the poor had someone to blame—the idle rich. There was little love for their Queen left in the hearts of the poor; the Irish spoke of her disparagingly as the Famine Queen. Finally there were attempts to assassinate her. Her son Edward's involvement in divorce scandals and his insatiable sexual appetite made the situation drastically worse.

Eddy seemed the only hope of salvaging some last vestige of the common man's affection for his Royal Family. Young and attractive, he was popularly regarded as the one King who might make the throne secure again. If he too slid on to the downward path of immorality and dissipation, Salisbury feared, the end of the monarchy was surely nigh.

In his adventures at Cleveland Street Eddy had created a danger worse even than if he had followed in his father's mucky footprints. For he had courted and married a Catholic, and even fathered a child by her. The age was bedevilled with an anti-Catholic feeling so intense that even without the prevailing threat of socialism, Eddy's marriage could have precipitated a revolution. Salisbury's first troubled Administration had begun in 1885. The following year there were dynamite outrages in London, and rioters at Trafalgar Square clashed violently with the police and the Army in the Bloody Sunday conflict. Ireland, that eternal powder keg of chaos, had exploded with renewed fervour. Salisbury was in his most desperate situation since coming to power. But he was little concerned with his own regime; that was of small consequence at a time when the monarchy and the very structure of British politics seemed on the brink of collapse. Every titbit of information was used by the socialists and republicans to embarrass and disgrace the Crown and to discredit the Government. Salisbury could see with crystal clarity that Eddy's behaviour was enough at this perilous moment of history to fire the fuel of revolution.

To end the affair quickly, he staged a raid in Cleveland Street in 1888. Sickert later described the raid to his son. It was late afternoon as he wandered into the street from Maple Street and saw a gang of ruffians lounging against the wall near Howland Street. They were all strangers, an uncommon sight in that insular community. He sensed that there was something odd in their presence, but was too immersed in his own thoughts to isolate his suspicions. Later, too late, he realized the truth. They may have been dressed as ruffians, but in reality they were a trained body of men imitating the loafing classes.

Suddenly a shout went up and a street brawl began. Soon that end of the street was a morass of fighting bodies. They cried out and cursed, and the vulgar spectacle drew people from their homes and shops. Sickert still could not define his fears, but he vaguely felt the acid taste of impending misfortune when he looked up and saw the studio end of the street deserted. He made off at a brisk pace towards the studio to ensure all was well with Eddy, who was staying there at the time. Before he was half-way along the street two hansom cabs turned into the road from Tottenham Street. One drew up outside the studio, the other went directly to the corner and parked by Annie's basement at No. 6. Two men in brown tweed went into the studio, and a fat man and a woman went into the basement. Sickert knew then the meaning of the charade behind him, and he knew it was too late to do anything without bringing harm upon himself. The two men came out of the studio, leading Eddy between them.

'He knew what it was all about', said Sickert, 'I could see the fear written in his face. I stood in the shadows by the shop and looked on with an awareness of the absurd inevitability of tragedy, the same in life as on the stage. Nothing can alter the inevitable.'

The man and woman emerged almost immediately from the basement and brought Annie struggling to the street. The lovers caught a last desperate glimpse of each other as their captors bundled them into separate cabs. When Eddy saw her he reached into the void between them and howled lamentably. She remained silent, but his continued sobs, soon muffled under the covers of the cab, expressed the insupportable grief of them both. Then the cabs were rattling off towards Oxford Street, one turning right at the end, the other left. Sickert never saw Eddy again—and Annie once, possibly twice. But he never again saw the carefree Annie of Cleveland Street, just a hag. The raid was all over in a minute. As the last cab turned the corner the brawl behind him ended as quickly as it had begun and the charlatans dispersed. He went away and got drunk.

Eddy was returned to Court and placed under strict supervision. Annie was confined for a hundred and fifty-six days at Guy's Hospital, and later at various workhouses and other hospitals. She died thirty-two years later, insane. But Marie Kelly escaped, Sickert knew not how, and fled back to the East End, taking the child with her. Somehow, by a tortuous route, the child was returned to Sickert, and he placed her in the care of some poor relatives. Later, about 1895, he took her to Dieppe, where she spent the rest of her childhood. Here his own story ended, he reflected soberly, but he had come to know details of what followed Kelly's flight.

In the event, removing Annie only compounded Salisbury's dilemma, for Marie Kelly fell in with a gaggle of gin-sodden East End harlots and shared her forbidden knowledge. Sickert maintained he never really knew the details of the affair, but it seemed that with the support of others, Kelly devised an ambitious blackmail, which fatal greed brought about their own destruction. Salisbury was now faced not only with the desperate need to hush up Eddy's misdemeanours; but worse, he had to conceal the ruthless way his bride had been institutionalized. A few stray but vital pebbles kicked loose by Eddy had started to dislodge an avalanche. Of one thing Salisbury was certain, said Sickert. Kelly and her accomplices had to be silenced.

The man entrusted with the mission was Sir William Gull, Physician in Ordinary to Queen Victoria, a noble and loyal servant who had several times performed discreet abortions in the marbled bedchambers of Windsor. The troublesome had more than once been rendered harmless by Gull certifying them insane. He had signed just such a bogus certificate in the case of Annie. He was possessed of a bizarre sense of humour, and an appetite for self-aggrandizement. He was also a Freemason of high standing. Sickert made the startling claim that neither the Royal Family nor the Government was behind the plot to silence Kelly, but at the instigation of Salisbury—one of the country's most influential Freemasons—the operation was carried out by and on behalf of the secret brotherhood. For Masonry was the power behind the Throne and Government alike. If the Throne went, and Britain became a republic, the Masons went too. Kelly and her cronies had to be silenced if the reins of power were to remain firmly in Masonic hands, but old Sickert thought it unlikely that Lord Salisbury ever wanted anyone murdered, or imagined for a moment that Sir William Gull would invent Jack the Ripper. It was more likely that he spoke with the rashness of Henry II over Becket and spat out angry words to the effect of, 'Will no one rid me of these meddling whores?'

It all sounded terribly unlikely.

CHAPTER TWO

The Sickert Story

I sat and looked at Joseph Sickert in silence. My mind was choked with a mass of questions so dense that to articulate any of them would instantly have obscured others. He had been speaking in his customary vague and disordered manner for nearly four hours. I was saturated with names and dates, and was having a hard job working out where facts ended and speculation began. I needed time to let it all sink in and to work out the real implication of his story. But despite my own confusion and the growing conviction that his story was not—could not be—true, I was sufficiently mesmerized by it to seek a further interview. Of one thing I was certain: Joseph Sickert may have been grossly misled, but he believed utterly in every syllable of his tale. If this was indeed the final solution, I told him, no amount of television programmes or newspaper articles like the one I was proposing to write could do justice to the story. A book was needed. The animated expression his rugged features had taken on as he became more involved in the telling of the tale seemed to recede behind a mask of stone, disappearing like a frightened bat in a sudden blaze of light. He reminded me that he had agreed to see me only in my role as reporter from the East London Advertiser. He was not seeking publicity, and had already turned down offers to have his story written by several well-known authors.

However, he did agree to see me again with a view to ironing out any details I was not clear about. He had lived with the story so long he could be forgiven for imagining that all I lacked were a few last pieces to the jigsaw. As far as I was concerned, at least, if his story was a jigsaw most of the pieces were missing and the rest lay face down. I was utterly befuddled.

I met him the following Sunday and we drove to Cleveland Street. As we toured the area where most of the early events in the Ripper saga were supposed to have taken place, he fed me extra details. Later, in between showers, we drove to the East End and walked around the grimy lanes and back alleys to the individual murder sites. I rifled his memory as we walked, and he seemed sufficiently at ease in my company by now to talk quite freely. As we wended our way through the rain-soaked streets, crowded with East Enders trudging to and from Petticoat Lane Market, and later in a tiny Commercial Street cafe over the strongest mug of tea I have ever tasted, understanding slowly dawned.

After the removal of Annie Elizabeth and the pacification of the ingenuous Eddy with a stern but paternal lecture from Lord Salisbury, the situation cooled somewhat. For the Queen, the problem was solved. It remained only for her to speak to her son the Prince of Wales in the strongest possible terms. Victoria's tirades rarely failed to wreak their desired influence on the bluff but not very tough Bertie. Reluctant but total obedience was the family tradition. This had even been the case with the christening of Bertie and Alix's eldest son; it was Victoria who chose Albert Victor Christian Edward for the infant Eddy; and it was Victoria who got her way, then as always. The anger she expended on her son over the Cleveland Street affair guaranteed that a strict discipline would be exerted upon the recalcitrant Eddy, at least for a few months.

Yet Salisbury was acutely conscious of the threat posed by the nanny, Marie Kelly. In a normal political climate the embarrassment she was capable of causing might have proved negligible. In 1888, though, her tale of the goings-on at Cleveland Street would have been seized with relish by the gossip-mongers of the republican and socialist movements. The dog-eat-dog political situation was creating some ferocious enemies for the Government and the Throne. If Kelly's scandalous morsel was picked up by these adversaries its scent would be followed back to Annie Elizabeth. The wicked treatment she had received, combined with Eddy's lamentable behaviour, would feed the revolutionary cause. The hateful spectre of a classless society loomed ever just below the horizon.

The view was, admittedly, extreme, and had taken shape in the mind of a man who thought he saw his beloved motherland with her back against the wall. In more stable times Salisbury was as humane as his position allowed, but these were awkward days, and the tension of the age was reflected in his policies. The sort of democracy that favoured now the Liberals under Gladstone, now the Conservatives under his own leadership, was the only basis, he believed, for a healthy society. It was not his own position as Premier, nor even the dominant role of the Tories, that Salisbury felt it his duty to protect. Who played the Administration and who the Opposition at any given moment was of minor importance when Britain's entire political system seemed threatened. What had to be made secure was the sacred Tory-Liberal merry-go-round—the Establishment. The monarchy was the foundation of that Establishment—which, according to Sickert, had always to rank more importantly in Salisbury's list of priorities than any number of individuals. Hence the removal of Annie Elizabeth and the impending measures against Marie Kelly.

For some months nothing was heard of Kelly, and Walter Sickert thought she had fled back to her native Limerick. She had left Ireland as a young girl when her father, John Kelly, faced with hopeless unemployment beyond the Irish Sea, packed up his troubles, uprooted his family of six sons and two daughters and set sail for North Wales. There he found employment at an ironworks, and eventually became a foreman. Marie married a collier called Davies when she was sixteen, but any contentment she might have found in the harsh, death-haunted life of a miner's wife was curtailed less than three years later when he was killed in a mine explosion. She spent the following eight or nine months in a Cardiff infirmary recovering from an unspecified illness, and then she moved in with a female cousin living near by. Her life had ever been simple and often poor, but the poverty and squalor of those early days of widowhood were worse than anything she had hitherto experienced. Like so many underprivileged youngsters in the two and a half centuries since the fable of Dick Whittington and his cat had first beguiled the populace, she focused her still innocent mind's eye on London Town, that merry cluster of citizens at the end of the rainbow. She arrived in 1884 and never escaped. In a few short months she was rubbing shoulders with the dregs of humanity in London's East End, though she was still a cut above the degradation later to be imposed upon her by gin, fear and vital anonymity. Shortly after arriving in London she found her way to an East End convent which provided her with board and lodging in return for the coppers she earned doing domestic work. In 1885 she found a permanent position at the tobacconist's in Cleveland Street and left the East End, planning never to return. Only three years later, in the wake of the raid, circumstances washed her back to Whitechapel, where she went into hiding.

Salisbury's investigations showed she had not fled back to Ireland, where one of her brothers was thought to be serving with a battalion of the Scots Guards. Discreet inquiries were set in motion there, and also in Wales, and at all the known points on her journey to London where it was thought likely she may have fled. But little of her history was known by any except Sickert, whose show of ignorance forced the inquiry to grind to a fruitless halt. In the absence of fresh news it seemed that any hope of development was out of the question. The minnow had swum through the gap in the shark's teeth, and it was not going to be snapped up again too easily. In the weird, paradoxical style peculiar to politicians Salisbury regarded the failure as success. For Kelly to have evaded his net so completely she was remaining silent. As soon as she broke her silence with any degree of effect her whereabouts would be revealed, and she could be removed. If she was never heard of again it would only be because she had held her tongue. If she did that she would be harmless. And safe.

In late July or early August the inevitable and long-awaited clue arrived. A shoddy and unsophisticated attempt at blackmail was initiated. The old painter never revealed who had been the victim of the demand, but it was for a paltry—in other circumstances he might have said laughable—sum. It emanated from the East End. It seemed the blackmail was being practised only to pay protection money to a better-organized gang of blackmailers. Sickert was not familiar with the details, but it was discovered that Kelly was involved with three prostitutes, into whose class she had descended to fight off starvation, and at their instigation had resorted to the blackmail. It was a desperate act. She had seen enough of the Cleveland Street raid to enable her to predict her own fate if she were discovered. But fear is relative. It was easy to run the risk of a distant danger if the gamble delivered her from a close one. The perils at hand were death from starvation and the more sinister threats of the blackmail gang of which she had fallen foul. This was probably the Old Nichol Gang, which demanded money and dealt out violence and even death to the holder of an empty purse. Life was never cheaper than in Whitechapel in the eighties. Three women—Nichols, Chapman and Stride—were found to be involved in Kelly's pathetic coterie, and they had to be rendered harmless. On 31st August the operation began.

Sir William Gull was entrusted with the mission. In many ways an unlikely candidate, he was, in Salisbury's opinion, best qualified for the job for several reasons. Perhaps most significant, he was one of the country's most prominent Freemasons, and had played a leading part in the select Masonic gatherings called by Salisbury to debate how best to handle the Cleveland Street case. As Sickert had impressed upon his son before, Freemasonry was the power behind the Government, and it was the unseen influence of the Masonic elders which dictated major policies, not the pleasing façade of Commons debate. As Gull was already deeply committed it was unnecessary to introduce an extra party. A loyal servant of Masonry who could see the value of the Crown to the secret brotherhood was essential for the task. Gull epitomized these qualities. Thanks to his ascension into the higher degrees of Masonry, he had, in 1871, been introduced to Princess Alexandra when her husband the Prince of Wales was struck down with typhoid. It had been only ten years since the death of the Prince's father, Prince Albert, of the same disease. It was therefore staggering at the time, and it has never been satisfactorily explained since, that the unknown Gull, son of a country barge-owner, should have been called in to attend the Prince, and that the Royal Physician, Sir William Jenner, should have been called merely as second opinion. Gull's supremacy as a Freemason explains his sudden promotion over the head of the greatest doctor in England. With Jenner's assistance he cured Bertie, but alone he reaped the rewards, receiving a baronetcy the following year. By 1888 he had repeatedly been made aware of the debt he owed to Freemasonry, and its subtle manipulation of those in power. He had already institutionalized Annie Elizabeth Crook with a bogus certificate of insanity, and no doubt Salisbury fully expected him to act in a similar way with Kelly and her associates.

What was not taken into account was Sir William's highly developed sense of the bizarre and his adamantine determination to proceed with a course of action entirely in his own way. He had always been hard-headed to the point that it was said his resemblance to Napoleon went beyond physical appearance. Since a minor stroke in 1887 his steadfastness in remaining faithful to any decision he may have made, however abstruse, was almost obsessional. He decided that capturing the whores and incarcerating them like Annie Elizabeth could have proved almost as unwise as allowing them to remain free. One poor woman shrieking for her truths to be heard and begging inspectors, doctors and visitors to believe she was the wife of a prince could easily have been dismissed as mad. But four apparent lunatics crying out the same tale, even though they were mere East End whores, would have produced a pattern many would have been eager to interpret. If to certify or imprison them was out of the question, and to leave them at large was clearly unthinkable, to kill them was the only practical alternative to Gull's ruthless mind.

He proceeded, said Sickert, to eliminate the women strictly according to Masonic ritual, and though Salisbury was disquieted by the embarrassment the murders caused his Cabinet, he was simultaneously pleased at the shameless display of Freemasonic supremacy it represented. Gull was conforming to a time-honoured Masonic rule, and nothing could be done to dissuade him from his course.

He was driven into the East End on several reconnaissance trips in the carriage of John Netley, chosen because he too was already deeply involved in the affair, having chauffered Eddy to and from Cleveland Street. Advance inquiries by Netley elicited the rough whereabouts of the victims, and Kelly herself was located with the aid of a picture. The third member of the Ripper party—and this seemed the most slender thread of Sickert's amazing story—was none other than the Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police and another high-ranking Freemason of the same lodge as Gull and Salisbury, Sir Robert Anderson. Gull had set aside a month for the whole operation to be completed. During that time he planned to kill the four women Nichols, Chapman, Stride and Kelly. In keeping with some weird Freemasonic principle, he contrived to spread a panic and terror that would be brought to a frightening climax with the final killing. But something went wrong, and for a reason Sickert never learned Catherine Eddowes was mistaken for Kelly and died in her place.

Because of the deliberately engineered panic which had a stranglehold on the East End after Eddowes's murder, it was out of the question to renew the quest for Kelly straight away. Thus Jack the Ripper lurked in the shadows for thirty-nine days, and many thought his day was done. But on 9th November, the morning of the Lord Mayor's Show, when most of the police force was absorbed with duties centred around that splendid event, Marie Kelly too was silenced. And Jack the Ripper dissolved into the nothingness from which he had so violently erupted only ten weeks before.

During the lull before the final murder Annie Elizabeth was removed from Guy's Hospital, said Sickert. Again his knowledge was vague, but he felt sure some vile operation had been performed upon her, he suspected by Gull himself. Whether this had been an attempt to erase dangerous memories from her mind he could only guess; but on the one or two occasions he saw her after that her personality had been transformed. She seemed only half aware, and did not recognize him. Unaccountably, she had also become subject to violent epileptic fits. She spent almost the whole of the rest of her life confined in workhouses, prisons and infirmaries. Whatever experiment may have been carried out on her, however, she did not totally forget her past. For on one occasion only she somehow managed to escape from an institution, and by sheer determination found Sickert's friends near Cleveland Street who were caring for Alice Margaret. She was soon rearrested, and returned to the workhouse.

'Audaces fortuna juvat—fortune favours the bold', said Walter Sickert, succumbing to his weakness for expressing himself in other languages. 'The Ripper crimes met with such ghastly success because of the audacity with which they were executed.'

He said the murderers located their victims, and in the cases of Nichols, Chapman, Stride and Eddowes they offered them a lift in their carriage. All but Stride were murdered inside the vehicle as Netley jogged through the busy main streets. The killers later allowed Netley to place the bodies where they were found. Stride was too drunk to be reasoned with, and she shambled off along the road when the carriage came to a halt near her. Netley concealed the vehicle in a dark thoroughfare south of Commercial Road, and Gull remained inside. Anderson and Netley followed Stride to Berner Street, and there she was accosted by Netley as Anderson kept watch, said Sickert. The coachman overpowered her, threw her to the ground and slashed her throat. They quickly made their way back to the carriage where Gull awaited them and drove on to Aldgate to murder the helpless tart they believed was Kelly. One of the two younger men—Sickert did not say whether it was Netley or Anderson—had learned Kelly was in custody at Bishopsgate Police Station for drunkenness. They knew that at any time after midnight she could be released, in keeping with the humane and expedient policy of the City Police whose cells were not adequate for them to retain all the drunks they arrested in a night. Kelly was still at large, however, for the Aldgate victim turned out to be Eddowes. Sickert never knew how she was mistaken for Kelly. When she was finally run to earth, Kelly, who alone of the victims had her own room, was murdered indoors.

'Only the undreamed of but simple truth that the murders of Nichols, Chapman and Eddowes did not take place where the bodies were found explains the impossible speed with which these elaborately brutal killings were executed, and the queer lack of blood on the ground near the bodies', Sickert explained.

The painter was induced to remain silent about the whole affair, he frankly confessed to his son, by fear for his own safety. He knew more than anyone else about Jack the Ripper, apart from the actual participators in the conspiracy. He felt relieved that he was allowed to remain in England, even though he did spend as much time as practical on the Continent to be away from the heart of the web. He even bought himself a house at Dieppe when he was toying with the idea of leaving England permanently. No actual threats were made but he did receive some strange, disconcerting warnings that he never fully described.

His silence was further guaranteed one day when he was working in his Dieppe studio. He was touching up a hurriedly painted river scene, a fishing-boat bobbing on a gentle swell. Suddenly and without warning the door opened and Lord Salisbury walked in. Without examining the picture on the easel, or even casting a glance at the rest of the canvases scattered about the room, he offered Sickert an immediate £500 for the picture. Sickert was surprised by the episode, but it did not take him long to work out the reason behind it. No mention had been made of Cleveland Street or the Whitechapel Murders, but he would have been a dullard not to have seen that the exorbitant fee was hush-money. At a time when he had to fight off a damaging sense of complacency if he received three pounds for a painting, the warning was almost welcome. As little would have been achieved by defiance, he accepted the bribe and remained silent until the day he felt compelled to tell all he knew to Joseph.

One violent and unexpected postscript was that the loathsome Netley, misguidedly believing he would find favour with the powerful, continued a lone campaign against Alice Margaret. If he killed her, he seemed to imagine, he would remove the final blemish from the future of his masters. Alice Margaret had at first been taken from Sickert and removed to Windsor, where she was to have been found somewhere to live and to have been cared for as befitted a royal child, however unwanted. Eventually the embarrassment of her presence became too acute, and, chiefly due to the machinations of those behind the Ripper murders, she was returned to Sickert. He passed her on to some poor relatives, and later had her looked after in Dieppe. Netley twice tried to murder the controversial infant by running her down with his cab—once in 1888 at the height of the Ripper's reign of terror and once in February 1892. On the first occasion he ran Alice Margaret down as she crossed either Fleet Street or the Strand with an elderly relative. When the cab struck her it passed right over her body. The driver was later described to Sickert by the relative, and he knew it could be none other than Netley. Sickert said that in the confusion after the second 'accident', in Drury Lane, Netley pushed through the crowd and fled to Westminster Bridge, pursued by several passers-by. He threw himself into the Thames and drowned. When Alice Margaret grew up she married a man called Gorman, who turned out to be impotent. Her relationship with Sickert had always been close, and the desperate loneliness that descended on her with growing deafness and a marriage devoid of physical love made the step from being Sickert's ward to being his mistress a natural one. She was his lover for more than twelve years, bore him a son, Joseph, and died in 1950. Sickert himself died in 1942.

As the years passed and the events of 1888 failed, like the rest of Sickert's memories, to fade into a uniform vagueness contrasted only by the odd pinnacle of clearly remembered detail, a strange effect manifested itself. He found himself, half willingly and half unconsciously, painting into his pictures cryptic references to the truth behind the Ripper murders. For many years, he said, it was his way of living with his ghastly knowledge and, in a perverse way, almost of setting the record straight.

CHAPTER THREE

The Truth and Nothing but the Truth?

In an article about Jack the Ripper in the Pall Mall Gazette in December 1888 the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres declared:

> In endeavouring to sift a mystery like this, one cannot afford to throw aside any theory, however extravagant, without careful examination, because the truth might, after all, lie in the most unlikely one.

Unlikely as Sickert's story was, it would have been irresponsible to dismiss it merely because it sounded absurd—it cried out to be investigated. To be fair, though, even absurd was an understatement. It sounded the most arrant, if entertaining, nonsense ever spun about Jack the Ripper, with the possible exception of the suggestion that the murderer was an escaped gorilla.

If the details of the road ahead were indistinct, at least its general direction was clear: every point in Walter Sickert's story had to be checked to see if any part of it was true. It could well have been a sensational fiction. It seemed significant that Walter offered no evidence to support his story. He had anxiously petitioned Joseph not to breathe a word, so he had clearly not expected it to reach the ears of the public. Perhaps this was why he produced no corroboration. Or perhaps the whole narrative was a pack of lies, and there could be no corroboration.

Admittedly a few facts were immediately apparent which began to establish Sickert's credentials. Hereditary deafness has blighted the Sickerts, just as it has the Royal Family. Princess Alexandra passed the disability on to her son Eddy. If Eddy had fathered a child as Sickert claimed it is almost certain she would have carried the trait. Alice Margaret Crook, the daughter Sickert ascribed to Eddy, was deaf. The registers of the St Pancras Board of Guardians, under whose care she came in 1902, make the terse comment: 'Stone deaf'. That the affliction was permanent is confirmed by a report made out by the Relieving Officer of the Westminster Union on 11th October 1905, on which date Alice Margaret applied for workhouse assistance because an injury to her foot was preventing her earning her own living. In a column headed, 'Cause of Distress, Temporary or Permanent', her deafness is once again noted. Her son Joseph is almost completely deaf in one ear, and his youngest daughter has no hearing at all. There is no evidence that Alice Margaret's mother Annie suffered any form of deafness, so the disability is almost certain to have been inherited from her father. Photographs of Joseph Sickert's three daughters as young children bear a certain similarity to a portrait of Eddy's three sisters, painted in 1883 by S. P. Hall, now hanging in the National Portrait Gallery. Joseph himself is the image of Walter Sickert, and appears to bear no physical resemblance to members of the Royal Family. A photograph of Alice Margaret, however, shows a marked similarity between her features and those of Princess Alexandra. Most noticeable are the widely spaced eyes, small mouth and firm, rounded chin. The story of Walter Sickert's fear for his own safety in the years succeeding the murders makes sense of a bewildering aspect of his life that even his friends were at a loss to explain—his frequent unexpected trips to the Continent. One of his closest friends, Marjorie Lilly, recalls his odd restlessness, his unpredictable departures for Dieppe and his equally unexpected returns. These disappearances were all the more difficult to account for because they damaged his influence on the development of new styles in painting. He could and should have wrought enormous changes in England's artistic policies. Instead he would return after long absences to an England where he would be dismissed as 'dated'.

These scattered facts which were emerging from the complicated Sickert saga were not evidence, however. The first task was to investigate Walter Sickert himself and to discover, for instance, if he was even remotely likely to have been chosen by Alix to befriend her son. It seemed inconceivable.

But Sickert was not, as I had always imagined, a down-at-heel artist whose penetrating paintings of low life reflected his own sordid background. He did have connections with royalty. He was born at Munich on 31st May 1860, the eldest son of Oswald Adalbert Sickert. Paint ran in their veins. Notable artistry first appeared in the family with Johann Jürgen Sickert, Walter's Danish grandfather, who was born at Flensborg in Schleswig-Holstein in 1803. Walter wrote of him:

> He was at the same time a painter of easel pictures and head of a firm of decorators, who were employed in the royal palaces by Christian VIII of Denmark. He lived and carried on his business in Altona.

Johann Jürgen was one of the earliest lithographers, and he sent his son Oswald, Walter's father, to study at Paris. Oswald, who was born at Altona in 1828, came to the attention of King Christian VIII through his father, who was in close contact with the Royal Family in the course of his work at the palace. Christian was so impressed with the talent of the young Oswald, which first manifested itself, according to Walter, in 'an astonishing portrait of himself at the age of sixteen', that he conferred on him a travelling purse to Copenhagen where he became a royal painter. Here it is quite likely that he came to know the whole Royal Family on a personal level, a connection which would have lapsed in 1848 with the death of Christian and the succession of the gluttonous Philistine Frederick VII. In his time at the palace Sickert would have become familiar with all branches of the Royal Family and probably made trips to the Yellow Palace, a summer castle nestling among beech groves at Bernstorff. This was the home of the Heir Apparent, Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg, later King Christian IX, and his wife Louise of Hesse. In 1844 their daughter Alexandra—Alix—was born.

Alix came to England and married Edward, Prince of Wales—Bertie—in 1863, when she was nineteen. Five years later Oswald Sickert arrived in London with his family and made Britain his permanent home, becoming a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy. He continued to paint until his death in 1885, and there is no reason to assume that any friendship that may have existed in Denmark between himself and Alexandra was in any way forgotten when she became Princess of Wales and future Queen. Quite the reverse: Alix, though remarkably popular with the people, was ever an outsider with the British Royal Family, and she never fully overcame her deep nostalgia for her beloved homeland. She went out of her way to be accepted as a member of Victoria's impressive dynasty, but she also clung dearly to her few old friends still within reach. Oswald Sickert and his talented son Walter are likely to have been among that privileged group.

Indeed, there is reason to suspect from the Court gossip of the day that a close bond existed between Walter and the beautiful Alix. One writer describes her fondness for a young painter who perfumed himself and wore his hair in ringlets. Though no names are mentioned, anyone who knew Sickert would realize that the object of her affection could have been none other than he. In the late 1870s he spent four years training for the stage, and eventually joined Henry Irving's company at the Lyceum. He was so proficient at the art of make-up that he successfully defied his own mother to pick him out from a crowd of actors on the stage. His disguise as a gnarled and toothless old man quite deceived her. The influence of the theatre never left Sickert, and even after he had turned his back on acting he would live the life of the artiste rather than the artist. He would change his appearance almost as frequently as his old cronies who still trod the boards in a different role every night at the Lyceum. One day his light brown hair would cascade in floods of curls over his shoulders and he would parade in flamboyant, cavalier clothes. The next day he would have cropped his hair en brosse and would go about for weeks in stern greys and blacks.

In later years Sickert was so firmly ensconced in the Royal circle that his second wife, Christine Drummond-Angus, was given the honour of embroidering a vestment of Sickert's design for use on State occasions. The garment, known as the Blue Tunicle, is kept at Westminster Abbey and has been used at every coronation, royal wedding and funeral since it was donated in 1920.

Ennui, one of Sickert's paintings which he told his son contained a veiled reference to the truth behind the Ripper crimes, was at one time owned by Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother.

Sickert has been charged with spreading many contradictory stories about the identity of the Whitechapel Murderer, and though this accusation is false, it is easy to see how it evolved. Until his story about Eddy and Annie Elizabeth, which he shared with no one but his son, Sickert told only one story about the Ripper. But he told it so regularly and to so many people that at second and third hand it suffered inevitable distortion. Sickert thus became the source of an imbroglio of conflicting tales, despite the fact that he had told only one.

Marjorie Lilly remembers Sickert as 'a strange, compelling and complicated man'.

She said, 'He had a passion for conversation and naturally took centre stage at any gathering without realizing he did so. His fascination with the Ripper case was intense and I thought perhaps he knew the truth.'

The story he repeatedly regaled her with during their twenty-five-year friendship was always the same. And she maintains it was the same version he told everyone else. Sickert himself told his son that he invented this story deliberately. His knowledge about the Ripper burned inside him like a torch, and he could not prevent his conversation drifting on to the subject of the murders. Revealing the truth, he believed, would have put him in danger. His invented 'solution' served two purposes: it satisfied his unending need to chatter on about the Ripper, and over many years it provided him with an entertaining after-dinner yarn that automatically made him the most magnetic person in any group, a position he delighted in occupying.

It is fortunate that Osbert Sitwell was sufficiently stimulated by Sickert's apparent fixation with the Ripper to record the bogus account. He recalled it in his introduction to A Free House!. an anthology of Sickert's writings. Sitwell wrote:

> Some years after the murders he had taken a room in a London suburb. An old couple looked after the house and when he had been there some months the woman, with whom he used often to talk, asked him one day, as she was dusting the room, if he knew who had occupied it before him. When he said "No", she had waited a moment and then replied, "Jack the Ripper?" . . .
> Her story was that his predecessor had been a veterinary student. After he had been a month or two in London, this delicate-looking young man—he was consumptive—took to occasionally staying out all night. His landlord and landlady would hear him come in about six in the morning and then walk about in his room for an hour or two, until the first edition of the morning paper was on sale, when he would creep lightly downstairs and run to the corner to buy one.

> Quietly he would return and go to bed. But an hour later, when the old man called him, he would notice, by the traces in the fireplace, that his lodger had burnt the suit he had been wearing the previous evening. For the rest of the day the millions of people in London would be discussing the terrible new murder, plainly belonging to the same series, that had been committed in the small hours. Only the student seemed never to mention them: but then he knew no one and talked to no one, though he did not seem lonely . . . the old couple did not know what to make of it: daily his health grew worse and it seemed improbable that this gentle, ailing, silent youth should be responsible for such crimes. They could hardly credit their own senses and then, before they could make up their minds whether to warn the police or not, the lodger's health had suddenly grown much worse and his mother, a widow who was devoted to him, had come to fetch him back to Bournemouth where she lived. . . . From that moment the murders stopped. He died three months later.

The story has had a remarkable effect: firstly it inspired Marie Belloc Lowndes to write her best-selling novel The Lodger. By way of Mrs Lowndes, Sickert has inspired two plays, at least five films, including The Man In The Attic and The Phantom Fiend, and a two-act opera by Phyllis Tate also called The Lodger.

It has even been suggested that a serious theory about the Ripper's identity, hailed by many as the closest we are likely to get to the truth, can also be traced back to Sickert. The assertion, which unfortunately is not substantiated by any documentary evidence, is made by Donald McCormick in his book The Identity of Jack the Ripper. It concerns the theory about Montague John Druitt, who has been the prime suspect in the case since the publication in 1965 of Tom Cullen's Autumn of Terror and Daniel Farson's Jack the Ripper in 1972. The starting-point of their investigations was a paragraph in the private notes of Sir Melville Macnaghten, a hurried draft of his official notes in the Scotland Yard file. These were shown to the two authors by Sir Melville's daughter, Lady Christabel Aberconway, who died in August 1974.

The combined researches of Cullen and Farson produced what on the surface looks like a plausible case against Druitt, a failed barrister who drifted into the teaching profession. In fact the case against Druitt is non-existent, as will be shown in Chapter 8.

McCormick says that he traced a London doctor who knew Sickert, and whose father was at Oxford with Druitt. This doctor maintained that Sickert repeated his lodger yarn to Sir Melville Macnaghten one day at the Garrick Club. Sir Melville latched on to the story because, like the veterinary student, Druitt also had a widowed mother living at Bournemouth. The argument runs that the inclusion of Druitt's name on Macnaghten's list of suspects was a direct result of hearing Sickert's tale and coupling the obviously fictitious student with the man whose body was dragged from the Thames on the last day of 1888.

Until McCormick can produce the name of his London doctor, however, his suggestion is no more than an interesting possibility.

Whether or not Sickert was responsible for Druitt's nomination as a Ripper candidate we may never know, but Druitt did play a part in the rambling saga the painter expounded to his son. Sickert said that from the very beginning Druitt had been a scapegoat, though he had no idea how he had been selected or how the shady arrangements had been made.

The answer to that one would have confounded even Sickert.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Murders

A murder story rarely loses anything in the telling. When the tale is as compelling and ghastly as the Whitechapel Murders it cannot fail to be embellished and distorted beyond measure. Jack the Ripper rapidly became absorbed into the folklore of East London, and no one would reproach the working folk whose possession he has become for adding their own spice to the much-told tale. The cockney granddad, sitting by the hearth surrounded by his eager brood, can be forgiven for adding a dash of romance, or somehow writing himself into the story. The same understandable weakness in his forebears transformed Robin Hood from a mean criminal into the noblest of England's folk-heroes.

It is one of the tasks of the historian to pare away the interpolations of later years, to part fact from legend without demolishing either, for both are valuable when properly set in context. It is a sombre reflection that in the case of Jack the Ripper several so-called serious historians have betrayed their responsibility and set down in print their own invented details and baseless speculation as definite fact. Their stories, perpetuated in print, were not the transient bedtime tales of the common folk, the once-heard fairy tale spoken in hushed tones in the flickering firelight and then gone for ever. Their dishonesty has done more to hinder the search for truth than all the hundreds of honestly concocted fables that have spilled from almost every front parlour and public bar in the East End. Even senior policemen of the day, notably Sir Robert Anderson, fabricated details about the Ripper to inject new, if bogus, life into their memoirs. Numerous authors in journals and full-length books have followed their example, to imbue with apparent logic often completely misguided arguments. The most extreme offender, it seems, was a romancer called Leonard Matters. His book The Mystery of Jack the Ripper, published in 1929, is based on unsupported and palpably false statements, developing along a ragged tangent of wild speculation masquerading as fact. Even the smallest act of dishonesty on the part of an author is reprehensible, for while appearing to clarify it obscures the already fading threads of truth.

Is it possible, then, after nearly ninety years of conjecture and deception, to get back to basics? The only documentary records likely to be free of exaggeration and romance are the notes of the policemen directly engaged on investigating the case at the time. In his Jack the Ripper in Fact and Fiction, published in 1965, Robin Odell complained:

> It is a pity . . . that Inspector Abberline, who was in charge of the murder hunt, never took up the pen. Of all the persons who played a part in the search for the murderer, none was more actively in touch with events than the inspector.

But though he never wrote a book, Inspector Frederick George Abberline did take up the pen. Abberline's writings on the Ripper, and those of his fellow-inspectors engaged on the case, were not sensational flannel for otherwise drab autobiographies, but were handwritten Special Reports written on the spot at the time of the killings. They contain no extraneous detail and are direct and to the point, if quaintly punctuated. They are the most accurate and valuable writings on the Whitechapel Murders, and the reason they have never before been published is that since 1888 they have been kept in the secret files of Scotland Yard and the Home Office.

Though the closed files at the Yard were not to have been opened to the public until 1992, I was granted permission to see them, and spent four days in July 1974 copying their contents verbatim. They are stored in a grubby cardboard box and comprise three bulging manila folders, each stamped with a code number and the words Closed Until 1992. They are known for convenience as the Victims, Suspects and Letters files, the latter containing hundreds of letters received from cranks the world over, many of them written in red ink and some in blood, and the majority of them signed 'Jack the Ripper'.

Between 1888 and 1891 all papers and reports concerning murders in the vicinity of Whitechapel were consigned to the Victims file. In 1892 the file was closed, and two years later Sir Melville Macnaghten inserted his own notes in the vain hope of making the rest clear. The Victims folder, neatly tied with pink tape, contains individual case files marked thus:

> EMMA ELIZABETH SMITH, aged 45, murdered on 3rd April 1888.
> MARTHA TABRAM alias TURNER, aged 35 to 40, murdered on 7th August 1888.
> MARY ANN NICHOLLS [sic] murdered on 31st August 1888.
> ANNIE SIFFEY alias CHAPMAN, murdered on 8th September 1888.
> ELIZABETH STRIDE, murdered on 29th September 1888.
> CATHERINE BEDDOWES [sic], murdered 29th September 1888.
> MARIE JEANETTE KELLY, murdered on 9th November 1888.
> ROSE MYLETT alias LIZZIE DAVIS, murdered on 26th December 1888.
> ALICE McKENZIE, murdered on 17th July 1889.
> TRUNK OF A FEMALE, found on 10th September 1889.
> FRANCES COLES, murdered on 13th February 1891.

Only those I have indicated by bold type were victims of the Ripper, as will be shown presently. The reports in the individual files tell much of the story. Mary Ann Nichols, the first victim, was found in Bucks Row—now Durward Street—a dark thoroughfare running parallel with and close to the day and night bustle of Whitechapel Road. Inspector J. Spratling of J Division takes up the story in his Special Report written only a few hours after the murder:

> P.C. 97J Neil reports at 3.45 a.m., 31st inst. [August], he found the dead body of a woman lying on her back with her clothes a little above her knees, with her throat cut from ear to ear on a yard crossing at Bucks Row, Whitechapel. P.C. obtained the assistance of P.C.'s 55H Mizen and 96J Thain. The latter called Dr Llewellyn, No. 152 Whitechapel Road. He arrived quickly and pronounced life to be extinct, apparently but a few minutes. He directed her removal to > the Mortuary, stating he would make a further examination there, which was done on the ambulance.

> Upon my arrival there and taking a description I found that she had been disembowelled, and at once sent to inform the doctor of it. He arrived quickly and on further examination stated that her throat had been cut from left to right, two distinct cuts being on the left side. The windpipe, gullet and spinal cord being cut through, a bruise apparently of a thumb being on the right lower jaw, also one on left cheek. The abdomen had been cut open from centre of bottom of ribs on right side, under pelvis to left of the stomach; there the wound was jagged. The omentum or coating of the stomach was also cut in several places, and two small stabs on private parts appeared done with a strong bladed knife, supposed to have been done by some left handed person, death being almost instantaneous.
> Description: age about 45; length 5 ft 2 or 3; complexion dark; hair dark brown turning grey; eyes brown; bruise on lower right jaw and left cheek, slight laceration of tongue; one tooth deficient front of upper jaw, two on left of lower.
> Dress: brown ulster, 7 large brass buttons (figure of a female riding a horse and man at side thereon), brown linsey frock, grey woollen petticoat, flannel drawers, white chest flannel, brown stays, black ribbed woollen stockings, men's spring-sided boots, cut on uppers, tips on heels, black straw bonnet, trimmed black velvet.
> I made enquiries and was informed by Mrs Emma Green, a widow, New Cottage adjoining, and Mr Walter Purkis, Eagle Wharf, opposite, also of William Louis, night watchman to Messrs Brown & Eagle at wharf near, none of whom heard any screams during the night, or anything to lead them to believe that the murder had been committed there.
>
> The stations and premises of the East London and District Railways, also the wharves and enclosures in the vicinity have been searched but no trace of any weapon could be found there.
> P.C. states he passed through the Row at 3.15 a.m. and P.S. 10 Kirley about the same time, but the woman was not there then and is not known to them.

A more complete account written in the strong, attractive copperplate of Abberline himself once the inquiry had got under way, says:

> About 3.40 a.m. 31st ult. as Charles Cross, carman of 22 Doveton Street, Cambridge Road, Bethnal Green, was passing through Bucks Row, Whitechapel (on his way to work)

he noticed a woman lying on her back on the footway (against some gates leading into a stable yard). He stopped to look at the woman when another carman (also on his way to work) named Robert Paul of 30 Fosters Street, Bethnal Green came up and Cross called his attention to the woman, but being dark they did not notice any blood, and passed on with the intention of informing the first constable they met. On arriving at the corner of Hanbury Street and Old Montague Street they met P.C. 55H Mizen and acquainted him of what they had seen, and on the constable proceeding towards the spot he found that P.C. 97J Neil (who was on the beat) had found the woman, and was calling for assistance.

P.C. Neil had turned on his light and discovered that the woman's throat was severely cut. P.C. 96J Thain was also called and sent at once for Dr Llewellyn of 152 Whitechapel Road who quickly arrived on the scene and pronounced life extinct and ordered the removal of the body to the Mortuary. In the meantime P.C. Mizen had been sent for the ambulance and assistance from Bethnal Green station, and on Inspector Spratling and other officers arriving, the body was removed to the Mortuary. On arriving there the inspector made a further examination and found that the abdomen had also been severely cut in several places, exposing the intestines. The inspector acquainted Dr Llewellyn who afterwards made a more minute examination and found that the wounds in the abdomen were in themselves sufficient to cause instant death, and he expressed an opinion that they were inflicted before the throat was cut.

The body was not then identified. On the clothing being carefully examined by Inspector Helston he found some of the underclothing bore the mark of Lambeth Workhouse which led to the body being identified as that of a former inmate named Mary Ann Nichols, and by that means we were able to trace the relatives and complete the identity. It was found she was the wife of William Nichols of 37 Coburg Street, Old Kent Road, a printer in the employ of Messrs Perkins, Bacon and Co., Whitefriars Street, City, from whom she had been separated about nine years through her drunken and immoral habits, and that for several years past she had from time to time been an inmate of various workhouses. In May of this year she left Lambeth Workhouse and entered the service of Mr Cowdry, Ingleside, Rose Hill Road, Wandsworth. She remained there until the 12th July when she absconded stealing various articles of wearing apparel. A day or two after she became a lodger at 18 Thrawl Street, Spitalfields, a common lodging house, and at another com-

Subject Re Murder in Whitechapel

Reference to Papers 52983

With reference to the subject named in margin.

I beg to report that about 3.40 a.m. 31st Ult. as Charles Cross, "Carman" of 22 Doveton Street Cambridge Road, Bethnal Green was passing through Bucks Row Whitechapel (on his way to work) he noticed a woman lying on her back on the footway (against some gates leading into a stable yard) he stopped to look at the woman when another Carman (also on his way to work) named Robert Paul of 30 Foster St. Bethnal Green came up and Cross called his attention to the woman, but being dark they did not notice any blood, and passed on with the intention of informing the first constable they met, and on arriving at the corner of Hanbury St. and Old Montague St they met P.C. 55 H. Mizen and acquainted

The first page of Inspector Abberline's report mon lodging house at 56 Flower & Dean Street up to the night of the murder.

About 1.40 a.m. that morning she was seen in the kitchen at 18 Thrawl Street when she informed the deputy of the lodging house that she had no money to pay her lodgings. She requested that her bed might be kept for her and left stating that she would soon get the money. At this time she was drunk. She was next seen at 2.30 a.m. at the corner of Osborn Street and Whitechapel Road by Ellen Holland, a lodger in the same house, who seeing she was very drunk requested her to return with her to the lodging house. She however refused, remarking that she would soon be back and walked away down the Whitechapel Road in the direction of the place where the body was found. There can be no doubt with regard to the time because the Whitechapel church clock chimed 2.30 and Holland called the attention of the deceased to the time.

We have been unable to find any person who saw her alive after Holland left her. The distance from Osborn Street to Bucks Row would be about half a mile. Inquiries were made in every conceivable quarter with a view to trace the murderer but not the slightest clue can at present be obtained.

Eight days later the killer struck again. As yet he had not been baptized by the unknown crank who, towards the end of September, would send a letter signed 'Jack the Ripper' to the Central News Office. For the moment he was still known only as the Whitechapel Murderer, faceless, elusive, and somehow, even after only two killings, already more frightening than any villain to have emerged from the deeply villainous East End.

At 6.10 on the morning of 8th September Inspector Joseph Chandler was on duty at Commercial Street Police Station, Spitalfields, when he received information that another woman had been murdered. The crime had taken place in Hanbury Street, a long, narrow thoroughfare running east from Commercial Street. It was named after the local firm of brewers, Truman, Hanbury & Buxton, and today the concrete bulk of Truman's Brewery occupies most of one end of the street—including the site of the Ripper's second murder.

In 1888 the road had no feature to distinguish it from any of the mean streets of dilapidated four-storey brick houses, crumbling and rat-infested, that scarred the landscape in every direction. These buildings—no stretch of the imagination will allow 'homes'—were the scab which concealed a festering sore: humanity at its most degraded and corrupt. Most of the houses in Hanbury Street were built in the second quarter of the eighteenth century, when the inhabitants of Spitalfields were prosperous Huguenot silk-weavers and when, in springtime, countless window-boxes would create a blaze of red and yellow beauty in every street. Never did prosperity tumble on to the helter-skelter of misfortune with such dire results. John Stow's Survey of London, published in 1598, describes the area as it had been before the relentless expansion of the capital swallowed it whole:

> On all sides without the houses of the suburb are the citizens' gardens and orchards, planted with trees both large and sightly and adjoining together. On the north side are the pastures and plain meadows, with brooks running through them, turning water-mills with a pleasant noise. Not far is a great forest, a well-wooded chace, having good covert for harts, bucks, does, boars and wild bulls. The corn-fields are not of a hungry, sandy mould, but as the fruitful fields of Asia, yielding plentyful increase, and filling the barns with corn.

But urbanization in itself had not brought poverty. In the late 1500s, when the area was first seriously developed, it was nothing if not fashionable. The half-starved wretches who haunted Hanbury Street in the 1880s could have no conception that the squalid tenements directly opposite where the new murder had taken place had at one time been a fine orchard, or that at Easter 1559 it had been no condescension but an honour for Queen Elizabeth I to attend with more than a thousand escorts a joyful service at St Mary's Spital, when there had been morris dancers and a festive accompaniment of trumpets, flutes and drums. But since those days, when Piccadilly itself was a ploughed field overlooking a broad sweep of meadows and rooftops to the sailing barges of the Thames, perhaps any transformation was possible. In 1649, the year of King Charles I's execution, property at the western end of Hanbury Street included three houses, a yard, two sheds, a cowhouse and a garden as well as the orchard already mentioned.

The golden days of the Huguenots were brought to an abrupt end with the first stirrings of the Industrial Revolution. Steam-power soon gave birth to the steam loom. The silk-weavers who had operated their hand looms at home were sucked into the factories. The human element vanished, and what had been a well-organized craft took on the sweat and drudge of mass production. The fortunes of the area and its people simply disintegrated. And it was to a decaying, grimy and disease-ridden slum that Inspector Chandler turned his steps that cold September morning.

> I at once proceeded to No. 29 Hanbury Street and in the back yard found a woman lying on her back, dead, left arm resting on left breast, legs drawn up, abducted, small intestines and flap of the abdomen lying on right side above right shoulder, attached by a cord with the rest of the intestines inside the body; two flaps of skin from the lower part of the abdomen lying in a large quantity of blood above the left shoulder; throat cut deeply from left and back in a jagged manner right around the throat.
> I at once sent for Dr Phillips, divisional surgeon, and to the station for the ambulance and assistance. The doctor pronounced life extinct and stated the woman had been dead at least two hours. The body was then removed on the police ambulance to the Whitechapel Mortuary.
>
> On examining the yard I found on the back wall of the house (at the head of the body) and about 18 inches from the ground about six patches of blood varying in size from a sixpenny piece to a point, and on the wooden pailing on left of the body near the head patches and smears of blood about 14 inches from the ground.
> The woman has been identified by Timothy Donovan, deputy of Crossinghams lodging house at 35 Dorset Street, Spitalfields, who states he has known her about 16 months as a prostitute, and for past 4 months she had lodged at above house. At 1.45 a.m. 8th instant she was in the kitchen, the worse for liquor and eating potatoes. He (Donovan) sent to her for the money for her bed, which she said she had not got and asked him to trust her, which he declined to do. She then left stating that she would not be long gone. He saw no man in her company.
> Description: Annie Siffey, age 45; length 5 ft; complexion fair; hair wavy, dark brown; eyes blue; two teeth deficient in lower jaw, large thick nose.
>
> Dress: black figured jacket, brown bodice, black skirt, lace boots, all old and dirty.
> A description of the woman has been circulated by wire to all stations and a special enquiry called for at lodging houses etc., to ascertain if any men of a suspicious character > or having blood on their clothing entered after 2 a.m. 8th inst.

In a detailed fifteen-page report on the first two murders, Abberline recorded that there was 'no doubt that the same person committed both murders'. He went on:

> The identification in this case has also been clearly established. She was the widow of a coachman named Chapman who died at Windsor some 18 months since from whom she had been separated several years previously through her drunken habits, and who up to the time of his death made her an allowance of 10/– per week. For some years past she has been a frequenter of common lodging houses in the neighbourhood of Spitalfields, and for some time previous to her death she had resided at 35 Dorset Street where she was last seen alive at 2 a.m. on the morning of the murder . . . From then until her body was found no reliable information can be obtained as to her movements.

The murderer withdrew into the shadows and left a disorganized police force and dumbfounded Press and public making metaphorical stabs at solving the puzzle, all as useless as his own real ones had been deadly. For three weeks nothing happened. But it was the calm before the storm. On 29th September he reappeared for a veritable orgy of violence, and perpetrated his notorious 'double event', two killings in one night. The first was Elizabeth Stride, forty-five years old, a gangling Swede known as Long Liz. The second was Catherine Eddowes, two years younger, a pathetic little woman who through drink and years as a street-walker looked nearer sixty, as mortuary photographs of her show. From comments about her at her inquest, though, it seems she somehow managed to maintain a chirrupy sauciness.

It is surprising that, after the wealth of written notes in the Yard files relating to Nichols and Chapman, those on the remaining Ripper victims are almost empty. In the case of Eddowes this is understandable. As she was murdered in City Police territory Scotland Yard were not in charge of the investigation into her death, as they were with all the other victims. But the dearth of information in the Stride file is less easy to understand. It contains no direct report of the murder or of police inquiries. And Kelly's file, which any reasonable investigator would expect to find crammed with reports, statements, maps and copious other material, is the sparsest of them all. The fourteen pages of notes relating to Stride do contain some new and important evidence which will be examined in depth in a later chapter. For information about the murder itself, however, we are presented solely with a clipping from the Daily News of 6th October, which is the first document in the file. Even this does not deal so much with the murder as with the inquest. In the Home Office file, however, there is a report on the actual murder by Chief Inspector Donald Swanson. Before examining Swanson's report, another important Ripper document that has never before been published, let The Times of Monday, 1st October, set the scene:

> The scene of the first crime is a narrow court in Berners-street [sic], a quiet thoroughfare running from Commercial-road down to the London, Tilbury and Southend Railway, At the entrance to the court are a pair of large wooden gates, in one of which is a small wicket for use when the gates are closed. At the hour when the murderer accomplished his purpose these gates were open; indeed, according to the testimony of those living near, the entrance to the court is seldom closed. For a distance of 18ft or 20ft from the street there is a dead wall on each side of the court, the effect of which is to enshroud the intervening space in absolute darkness after sunset. Further back some light is thrown into the court from the windows of a workmen's club, which occupies the whole length of the court on the right, and from a number of cottages occupied mainly by tailors and cigarette makers on the left. At the time when the murder was committed, however, the lights in all of the dwelling-houses in question had been extinguished, while such illumination as came from the club, being from the upper story [sic], would fall on the cottages opposite and would only serve to intensify the gloom of the rest of the court.

Swanson's Home Office report, dated 19th October, says:

> I beg to report that the following are the particulars respecting the murder of Elizabeth Stride on the morning of 30th September 1888.—
> 1 a.m. 30th Sept. A body of a woman was found with the throat cut, but not otherwise mutilated, by Louis Diemschutz (secretary to the Socialist Club) inside the gates of Dutfield's Yard in Berner Street, Commercial Road East, who gave information to the police. P.C. 252 Lamb proceeded with him to the spot and sent for Drs Blackwell and Phillips.

> 1.10 a.m. Body examined by the doctors mentioned who pronounced life extinct, the position of the body was as follows:—lying on left side, left arm extended from elbow, cachous lying in hand, right arm over stomach, back of hand and inner surface of wrist dotted with blood, legs drawn up, knees fixed, feet close to wall, body still warm, silk handkerchief round throat, slightly torn corresponding to the angle of right jaw, throat deeply gashed and below the right angle apparent abrasion of skin about an inch and a quarter in diameter.
> Search was made in the yard but no instrument found.

The central section of this report contains a previously unpublished piece of evidence that becomes crucial when viewed in the light of the Sickert version of the murders. The evidence will be fully examined later. The last part of the report says:

> The body was identified as that of Elizabeth Stride, a prostitute, and it may be shortly stated that the enquiry into her history did not disclose the slightest pretext for a motive on behalf of friends or associates or anybody who had known her. The action of police besides being continued in the directions mentioned in the report respecting the murder of Annie Chapman was as follows.
> A. Immediately after the police were on the spot the whole of the members who were in the Socialist Club were searched, their clothes examined and their statements taken.
> B. Extended enquiries were made in Berner Street to ascertain if any person was seen with the woman.
>
> C. Leaflets were printed and distributed in H Division asking the occupiers of homes to give information to police of any suspicious persons lodging in their houses.
>
> D. The numerous statements made to police were enquired into and the persons (of whom there were many) were required to account for their presence at the time of the murders and every care taken as far as possible to verify the statements.
>
> Concurrently with enquiry under head A the yard where the body was found was searched but no instrument was found . . .
> Under head C. 80,000 pamphlets to occupiers were issued and a house to house enquiry made not only involving the result of enquiries from the occupiers but also a search by police and with a few exceptions—but not such as to convey suspicion—covered the area bounded by the City Police boundary on the one hand, Lamb St., Commercial St.,

> Great Eastern Railway and Buxton St., then by Albert St., Dunk St., Chicksand St. and Great Garden St. to Whitechapel Road and then to the City boundary. Under this head also Common Lodging Houses were visited and over 2,000 lodgers were examined.
> Enquiry was also made by Thames Police as to sailors on board ships in Docks or river and extended enquiry as to Asiatics present in London. About 80 persons have been detained at the different police stations in the Metropolis and their statements taken and verified by police and enquiry has been made into the movements of a number of persons estimated at upwards of 300 respecting whom communications were received by police and such enquiries are being continued.
> Seventy-six butchers and slaughterers have been visited and the characters of the men employed enquired into, this embraces all servants who have been employed for the past six months.
>
> Enquiries have also been made as to the alleged presence in London of Greek Gipsies, but it was found that they had not been in London during the times of the various murders.
>
> Three of the persons calling themselves Cowboys who belonged to the American Exhibition were traced and satisfactorily accounted for themselves.
> Up to date although the number of letters daily is considerably lessened, the other enquiries respecting alleged suspicious persons continues as numerous.

As previously explained, the second murder of the night was that of Catherine Eddowes in Mitre Square, Aldgate. Enemy action during the Second World War so badly damaged the stations of the City Police, under whose jurisdiction the murder fell, that few of their extant documents predate the 1940s. The papers relating to the killing of Catherine Eddowes were among those destroyed in the Blitz. As the Scotland Yard file on Eddowes contains only some horrid photographs of her body taken at the mortuary and an irrelevant extract from the Philadelphia Times of Monday, 3rd December 1888, it seemed there was no surviving contemporary report of the murder written by a man actually connected with the case. But in February 1975 when I was granted access to the Home Office files I found a plethora of notes, some actually written by a City policeman engaged on the case. But the eight-page report written by Inspector James McWilliam of the City of London Police Detective Department leaves many questions unanswered. As Henry Matthews, the Home Secretary, scribbled on a sheet of paper attached to McWilliam's report, 'The printed report of the inquest contains much more information than this. They evidently want to tell us nothing.'

A far more complete report of the murder, which is also in the file, was compiled, ironically, by the Metropolitan Police. On 6th November Swanson wrote:

> I beg to report that the facts concerning the murder in Mitre Square which came to the knowledge of the Metropolitan Police are as follows:—
> 1.45 a.m. 30th Sept Police Constable Watkins of the City Police discovered in Mitre Square the body of a woman, with her face mutilated almost beyond identity, portion of the nose being cut off, the lobe of the right ear nearly severed, the face cut, the throat cut, and disembowelled. The P.C. called to his assistance a Mr Morris, a night watchman and pensioner from Metropolitan Police, from premises looking on the Square, and surgical aid was subsequently called in, short details of which will be given further on in this report.
> The City Police having been made acquainted with the facts by P.C. Watkins the following are the results of their enquiries so far as known to Met. Police:—
> 1.30 a.m. the P.C. passed the spot where the body was found at 1.45 a.m. and there was nothing to be seen there at that time.
> 1.35 a.m. Three Jews, one of whom is named Mr Lewin[1] saw a man talking to a woman in Church Passage which leads directly to Mitre Square. The other two took but little notice and state that they could not identify the man or woman, and even Mr Lawende states that he could not identify the man; but as the woman stood with her back to him, with her hand on the man's breast, he could not identify the body mutilated as it was, as that of the woman whose back he had seen, but to the best of his belief the clothing of the deceased, which was black, was similar to that worn by the woman whom he had seen, and that was the full extent of his identity.

leading to No. 108 to 119 Goldstone Street Buildings a piece of a bloodstained apron, and above it written in chalk, the words, "The Juwes are the men who will not be blamed for nothing", which he reported, and the City Police were subsequently acquainted at the earliest moment, when it was found that beyond doubt the piece of apron found corresponded exactly with the part missing from the body of the murdered woman.

The surgeon, Dr Brown, called by the City Police, and Dr Phillips who had been called by the Metropolitan Police in the cases of Hanbury Street and Berner Street, having made a post mortem examination of the body reported that there were missing the left kidney and the uterus, and that the mutilation so far gave no evidence of anatomical knowledge in the sense that it evidenced the hand of a qualified surgeon, so that the police could narrow their enquiries into certain classes of persons. On the other hand as in the Metropolitan Police cases, the medical evidence shewed that the murder could have been committed by a person who had been a hunter, a butcher, a slaughterman, as well as a student in surgery or a properly qualified surgeon.

The result of the City Police enquiries were as follows:—beside the body were found some pawn tickets in a tin box, but upon tracing them, they were found to relate to pledges made by the deceased, who was separated from her husband, and was living in adultery with a man named John Kelly, respecting whom enquiry was at once made by Metropolitan and City Police, the result of which was to shew clearly that he was not the murderer. Further it shewed that the deceased's name was Catherine Eddowes, or Conway who had been locked up for drunkenness at Bishopsgate Street Police Station at 8.45 p.m. 29th and being sober was discharged at 1 a.m. 30th. Enquiry was also made by the City and Metropolitan Police conjointly into her antecedents, and it was found that there did not exist amongst her relations or friends the slightest pretext for a motive to commit the murder.

At the Goldston [sic] Street buildings where the portion of the blood-stained apron was found the City Police made enquiry, but unsuccessfully and their subsequent enquiries into matters affecting persons suspected by correspondence or by statements of individuals at Police Stations, as yet without success, have been carried on with the knowledge of the Metropolitan Police, who on the other hand have daily acquainted the City Police with the subjects and natures of their enquiries.

Upon the discovery of the blurred chalk writing on the wall, written—although mis-spelled in the second word—in an ordinary hand in the midst of a locality principally inhabited by Jews of all nationalities as well as English, and upon the wall of a common stairs leading to a number of tenements occupied almost exclusively by Jews, and the purport of the writing . . . was to throw blame upon the Jews, the Commissioner deemed it advisable to have them rubbed out. Apart from this there was the fact that during police enquiries into the Bucks Row and Hanbury Street murders a certain section of the Press cast a great amount of suspicion upon a Jew named John Pizer, alias "Leather Apron", as having been the murderer, whose movements at the dates and hours of those murders had been satisfactorily enquired into by Met. Police, clearing him of any connection, there was also the fact that on the same morning another murder had been committed in the immediate vicinity of a socialist club in Berner Street frequented by Jews—considerations which, weighed in the balance with the evidence of chalk writing on the wall to bring home guilt to any person, were deemed the weightier of the two. To those police officers who saw the chalk writing, the handwriting of the now notorious letters to a newspaper agency bears no resemblance at all.

Rewards were offered by the City Police and by Mr Montagu [the M.P. for Whitechapel] and a Vigilance Committee formed, presided over by Mr Lusk of Alderney Road, Mile End, and it is to be regretted that the combined result has been that no information leading to the murderer has been forthcoming. On the 18th Oct. Mr Lusk brought a parcel which had been addressed to him to Leman Street. The parcel contained what appeared to be a portion of a kidney. He received it on 15th Oct. and submitted it for examination eventually to Dr Openshaw, curator of London Hospital Museum, who pronounced it to be a human kidney. The kidney was at once handed over to the City Police, and the result of the combined medical opinion they have taken upon it is that it is the kidney of a human adult, not charged with fluid, as it would have been in the case of a body handed over for purposes of dissection to an hospital, but rather as it would be in a case where it was taken from the body not so destined. In other words similar kidneys might and could be obtained from any dead person upon whom a post mortem had been made from any cause, by students or dissecting room porter. The kidney, or rather portion of the kidney, was accompanied by a letter couched as follows:—

> From Hell
> Mr Lusk
> Sir
> I send you half the > Kidne I took from one women > prasarved it for you tother piece I > fried and ate it was very nise. I > may send you the bloody knif that > took it out if you only wate a whil > longer > signed Catch me when > you can
> Mishter Lusk

The postmarks upon the parcel are so indistinct that it cannot be said whether the parcel was posted in the E. or E.C. districts, and there is no envelope to the letter, and the City Police are therefore unable to prosecute any enquiries upon it.

The remaining enquiries of the City Police are merged into those of the Metropolitan Police, each force cordially communicating to the other daily the nature and subject of their enquiries.

The foregoing are the facts so far as known to Metropolitan Police, relating to the murder in Mitre Square.

An exquisite cunning that surpassed even the diabolical success of the early murders was in evidence in the killing of Catherine Eddowes. No scream or sound of a scuffle was heard; if the murder indeed took place in the Square it was committed less than fifteen minutes before the discovery of the body, and the killer's timing was uncannily precise, for P.C. Watkins had passed through on his beat only a quarter of an hour before and seen nothing. In that brief space of time the murderer had apparently not only performed in total silence the elaborate butchery described in Swanson's report, he had also carried out the delicate surgical operation involved in removing one of the woman's kidneys. The kidney is one of the most difficult organs to locate, as it is secreted deep inside the body and concealed in a mass of fatty tissue. Yet the remains of Eddowes were found in the darkest corner of Mitre Square. No theorist has yet been able to explain how the Ripper worked with such silent skill and swiftness, his efficiency unimpaired by the impenetrable gloom.

The mad confidence of the Ripper seemed to have reached a climax, breaking through the limits of his self-control. Since his first frenzied appearance he had left no clues. Now he appeared to lay them deliberately. An irrational sense of invincibility has frequently been the downfall of arrogant murderers. Not so Jack the Ripper. What looked like his act of supreme defiance—the writing on the wall—only created worse confusion among his hunters.

After the double murder, the newspapers disclosed that a letter written in red ink and signed 'Jack the Ripper' had been received by the Central News Office, having been posted in the London E.C. area two days before the murder. A day after the murder, a postcard was received bearing the same signature. The name needed to be published only once. Within hours of the appearance of the first issues of the newspapers containing the texts of the two messages the name Jack the Ripper had seared itself into the minds of East Enders as indelibly as a red-hot brand on cowhide.

Panic descended on the East End. Centenarian William Ifland is one of the few people left who know exactly what it was like living in Whitechapel through the grim autumn of 1888. He was born in Russia in 1873. At the age of thirteen he fled the persecution and poverty of life under the Tsars, and after tramping half-way across Europe with his aged aunt and baby sister he found a ship that was sailing for England—a country where, as far as he knew, a Jew could live free of the fear of pogroms. The ship docked at Tilbury in 1886, and in a matter of days the three penniless immigrants, without a word of English between them, had been mercifully absorbed into the Russian quarter of the East End. They eventually found drab lodgings in Gun Street, Whitechapel. At the end of 1888, shortly after the Ripper committed his final atrocity, William —now nearly sixteen—set off on his own for Canada.

At the age of a hundred and one, in September 1974, he caught his first glimpse of England in eighty-six years. After a lifetime beyond the Atlantic he wanted to see Europe again before he died.

I met the diminutive Ifland in his room at the Kensington Hilton on the last day of his stay in London. He was due that morning to fly to Rome, where he was to begin an exhaustive tour of Europe's capitals. In the previous week he had been reunited with his sister Lena, a toddler when he had last seen her, at her home in Sidney Street, Whitechapel.

'I am one of the few who remember life in the heart of the place where Jack the Ripper was on the loose', he said in English that was still thickly overlaid with Russian inflections.

'A lot of people still living were alive then, but not many were old enough to understand what was happening. But I was fifteen. I understood all right.'

He recalled the nervousness and tension evinced by nearly everyone he knew, and though it had been nearly ninety years before, and precise details had faded from his mind or become buried in generations of later experience, he said he could picture clearly 'the terrible quiet'.

'It was not a loud shouting panic that came upon us people of the East End but a long silence. Everyone was tense and quiet and I remember the agitated whispers, "Jack the Ripper has struck again", "The Ripper's been at work".'

A story in The Times of 12th November 1888 provides a good example of the mutual suspicion and high state of nervousness that Ifland remembers:

> Shortly after 10 o'clock last night as a woman named Humphreys was passing George-Yard, Whitechapel, she met in the darkness and almost on the identical spot where Martha Tabram was murdered, a powerful-looking man wearing large spectacles. Trembling with agitation she asked, "What do you want?" The man made no answer, but laughed and made a hasty retreat. The woman shouted "Murder" several times and soon alarmed the neighbours. Uniformed policemen and detectives ran to the yard from all directions. They entered a house into which the man had retreated, and he was apprehended. A crowd of people quickly collected, who exhibited an almost unanimous inclination to lynch the mysterious person, but the police were fortunately able to protect him. Being taken to Leman Street Police Station, he accounted for his presence in the yard by the fact that he was paying a visit to a friend who is an inhabitant of it. He referred the police to a well-known gentleman at the London Hospital, and in the result he was set at liberty.

So it came to Kelly's turn. ANOTHER WHITECHAPEL HORROR, MORE REVOLTING MUTILATION THAN EVER, screamed the Illustrated Police News, which devoted its entire front page to an artist's impressions of events surrounding the final killing.

No report of Kelly's death appears in either the Scotland

Yard file or the Home Office file. A scribbled note by Commissioner Sir Charles Warren, merely recording that another Whitechapel Murder had been reported and was in the hands of the Assistant Commissioner, is all the Home Office file yields. By this time the East End was in a lather of fury and terror, and the hysteria was reflected in the Press. For a balanced view of the situation the newspapers must at this stage be used sparingly: they simply cannot be relied upon. Despite the barrenness of the three major sources of information, however, an official record of events surrounding Kelly's murder does exist. The Middlesex County Records Office contains a batch of previously unpublished documents, the original statements of witnesses, made to police on the morning of the murder. All but one are in the handwriting of Abberline himself:

> Statement of Thomas Bowyer, 37 Dorset Street, Spitalfields, in the employ of John McCarthy, lodging house keeper, Dorset Street.
> Says that at 10.45 a.m. 9th instant, he was sent by his employer to number 13 room, Millers [sic] Court, Dorset Street for the rent. He knocked at the door, but not getting any answer he threw the blinds back and looked through the window, which was broken, and saw the body of deceased woman whom he knew as Mary Jane. Seeing that there was a quantity of blood on her person and that she had been apparently murdered, he immediately went and informed his employer Mr McCarthy, who also looked into the room and at once despatched Bowyer to the police station, Commercial Street, and informed the Inspector on duty (Insp. Beck) who returned with him and his employer who had also followed to the station. He knew the deceased and also a man named Joe, who had occupied the room for some months past.
> Statement of John McCarthy, Lodging House Keeper, 27 Dorset Street, Spitalfields.
> I sent my man Thomas Bowyer to No. 13 room, Millers Court, Dorset Street owned by me for the rent. Bowyer came back and called me, telling me what he had seen. I went with him back and looked through the broken window, where I saw the mutilated remains of deceased whom I knew as Mary Jane Kelly. I then despatched Bowyer to the Police Station, Commercial Street (following myself) to acquaint the police. The Inspector on duty returned with us to the scene at Millers Court. I let the room about ten months ago to the deceased and a man named Joe, who I believed to be her husband. It was a furnished room at 4/6 per week. I sent for the rent because for some time past they had not kept their payments regularly. I have since heard the man Joe was not her husband and that he had recently left her.

Statement of Joseph Barnett, now residing at 24 and 25 New Street, Bishopsgate (a common lodging house).

I am a porter in Billingsgate Market, but have been out of employment for the past 3 or 4 months. I have been living with Marie Jeanette Kelly who occupied No. 13 room, Millers Court. I have lived with her altogether about 18 months, for the last eight months in Millers Court, until last Tuesday week (30 Ulto) when in consequence of not earning sufficient money to give her and her resorting to prostitution, I resolved on leaving her, but I was friendly with her and called to see her between seven and eight p.m. Thursday (8th) and told her I was very sorry I had no work and that I could not give her any money. I left her about 8 o'clock same evening and that was the last time I saw her alive.

There was a woman in the room when I called. The deceased told me on one occasion that her father, named John Kelly, was a foreman of some iron works and lived at Carmarthen or Carnarvon, that she had a brother named Henry serving in 2nd Battn. Scots Guards, and known amongst his comrades as John too, and I believe the Regiment is now in Ireland. She also told me that she had obtained her livelihood as a prostitute for some considerable time before I took her from the streets, and that she left her home about 4 years ago, and that she was married to a collier, who was killed through some explosion. I think she said her husband's name was Davis or Davies.

Statement of Mary Ann Cox, No. 5 Room, Millers Court, Dorset Street, Spitalfields.

I am a widow and an unfortunate.[1] I have known the female occupying No. 13 room, Millers Court about 8 months. I knew her by the name of Mary Jane. About a quarter to twelve last night I came into Dorset Street from Commercial Street, and I saw walking in front of me Mary Jane with a man. They turned into the court and as I entered the court they went indoors. As they were going into her room, I said good night Mary Jane. She was very drunk and could scarcely answer me, but said good night. The man was > carrying a quart can of beer. I shortly afterwards heard her singing. I went out shortly after twelve and returned about one o'clock and she was still singing in her room. I went out again shortly after one o'clock and returned at 3 o'clock. There was no light in her room then and all was quiet, and I heard no noise all night.

> The man whom I saw was about 36 years old, about 5ft 5 in. high, complexion fresh and I believe he had blotches on his face, small side whiskers and a thick carroty moustache, dressed in shabby dark clothes, dark overcoat and black felt hat.[1]
> Mary Jane was dressed I think, last night when I saw her, in a linsey frock, red knitted cross-over around shoulders, had no hat or bonnet on.

The following statement is the only one of the batch not written out personally by Abberline:

> I went out about 9 p.m. on the 8th and returned about 1 a.m. 9th and stood at the bottom of Millers Court until about 1.30. I was speaking for a short time to a Mr McCarthy who keeps a chandler's shop at the corner of the court. I then went up to bed. About 3.30 or 4 a.m. I was awakened by a kitten walking across my neck, and just then I heard screams of murder about two or three times in a female voice. I did not take much notice of the cries as I frequently hear such cries from the back of the lodging-house where the windows look into Millers Court. From 1 a.m. to 1.30 a.m. no one passed up the court, if they did I should have seen them. I was up again and downstairs in the court at 5.30 a.m. but saw no one except two or three carmen harnessing their horses in Dorset Street. I went to the "Ten Bells" P.H. at the corner of Church Street and had some rum. I then returned and went to bed again without undressing and slept until about 11 a.m.

> Statement of Caroline Maxwell, 14 Dorset Street, Spitalfields, the wife of Henry Maxwell, a lodging house deputy.
> I have known deceased woman during the past 4 months, she was known as Mary Jane and that since Joe Barnett left her she has obtained her living as an unfortunate. I was on speaking terms with her although I had not seen her for 3 weeks until Friday morning 9th instant about half past 8 o'clock. She was then standing at the corner of Millers Court in Dorset Street. I said to her, what brings you up so early. She said, I have the horrors of drink upon me as I have been drinking for some days past. I said why don't you go to Mrs Ringer's (meaning the public house at the corner of Dorset Street called the Britannia) and have ½ pint of beer. She said, I have been there and had it, but I have brought it all up again. At the same time she pointed to some vomit in the roadway. I then passed on, and went to Bishopsgate on an errand, and returned to Dorset Street about 9 a.m. I then noticed deceased standing outside Ringers public house. She was talking to a man, age I think about 30, height about 5ft 5in, stout, dressed as a Market Porter. I was some distance away and am doubtful whether I could identify him. The deceased wore a dark dress, black velvet body, and coloured wrapper round her neck.

Mrs Maxwell's assertion that she saw Kelly at nine o'clock when medical evidence shows she had been dead five or six hours when her body was found at 10.45, is one of the enduring mysteries concerning the Ripper case. Whether Mrs Maxwell was lying, mistaken or drunk has never been explained. The only certainty is that she was wrong.

Statement of Sarah Lewis, No. 24 Great Pearl Street, Spitalfields, a laundress.

Between 2 and 3 o'clock this morning I came to stop with the Keylers at No. 2 Millers Court as I had had a few words with my husband. When I came up the court there was a man standing over against the lodging house on the opposite side in Dorset Street but I cannot describe him. Shortly before 4 o'clock I heard a scream like that of a young woman, and seemed to be not far away. She screamed out murder. I only heard it once. I did not look out of the window. I did not know the deceased.

Sarah Lewis further said that when in company with another female on Wednesday evening last at Bethnal Green, a suspicious man accosted her. He carried a black bag.

Statement of Julia Venturney

I occupy No. 1 room, Millers Court. I am a widow but now living with a man named Harry Owen. I was awake all night and could not sleep. I have known the person occupying No. 13 room opposite mine for about 4 months. I knew the man who I saw down stairs (Joe Barnett) he is called Joe, he lived with her until quite recently. I have heard him say that he did not like her going out on the streets. He frequently gave her money. He was very kind to her. He said he would not live with her while she led that course of life. She used to get tipsey occasionally. She broke the windows a few weeks ago whilst she was drunk. She told me she was very fond of another man named Joe, and he had often illused her because she cohabited with Joe (Barnett). I saw her last yesterday, Thursday about 10 a.m.

Statement of Maria Harvey of 3 New Court, Dorset Street.

I slept two nights with Mary Jane Kelly, Monday and Tuesday last. I then took a room at the above house. I saw her last about five minutes to seven last night in her own room, when Barnett called. I then left. They seemed to be on the best of terms. I left an overcoat, two dirty cotton shirts, a boy's shirt and a girl's white petticoat and black crape bonnet in the room. The overcoat shown me by police is the one I left there.

The statements are accompanied by the following note:

> Inspector Walter Beck, 'H' Division, who was first called, together with the constables on the beat will attend at the Inquest, also myself who will speak of contents of room &c if necessary.
> [signed] F. G. Abberline, Inspector.

Marie Kelly was so horribly mutilated she hardly seemed any longer in human form. With her death Jack the Ripper disappeared from the face of the earth. It was as if the insane, motiveless lone killer for whom everyone was searching had never existed. Sickert, of course, maintained he never had.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Mad Pork Butcher

Between the beginning of September and a week after the death of Kelly, more than a hundred and sixty men were arrested on suspicion of being connected with the Whitechapel Murders. A study of the contemporary Press, both national and local, puts the number somewhere between a hundred and thirty and a hundred and fifty in London alone. Though newspaper references do not always name the men arrested, the number tallies closely with the multitudinous reports of arrests in the Scotland Yard file, so can be relied upon. In January 1889 the Yard sent a directive to all stations in the Metropolitan area, calling for reports on all arrests in connection with the Whitechapel Murders to be sent to headquarters. The Suspects file bulges with weird and wonderful suggestions about the identity of Jack the Ripper.

The papers create a strong impression that the police were playing some sort of game. They certainly had a fixed idea about the killer's class, if not his precise identity. A suspect had only to give some indication that he was not a complete layabout to be released. Merely showing to the arresting officer's satisfaction that he had an address was enough to obtain freedom. On no occasion was an alibi for the nights of the murders given and, what is stranger, none was asked for. A story related in a letter to the Daily Express of 16th March 1931 provides a typical example of the curious policy adopted by the police. Under the heading I Caught Jack the Ripper, former P.C. Robert Spicer of Woodford Green, Essex, claimed that he was on duty in the East End about two hours after the double murder on the night of 29th–30th September. Suddenly he came upon a man sitting with a prostitute on a brick dustbin. The man, well dressed and carrying a black bag, had blood on his cuffs. He evaded Spicer's questions and was promptly arrested. Certain he had caught the Ripper, the twenty-two-year-old constable marched his suspect along to Commercial Street Police Station. There, under cursory questioning from the station officer, the suspect claimed he was a respectable doctor living at Brixton. Immediately he had imparted this uncorroborated piece of information he was released, without being asked to open his bag. The suspect was not even required to explain what a respectable Brixton doctor had been doing talking to a prostitute in an East End alleyway at three o'clock in the morning.

This singular preoccupation with the addresses of suspects is well illustrated in the following reports selected from the Suspects file. The first was written by Inspector D. Fairey of Rochester Row Police Station:

> At about 12.40 p.m., 21st inst. [November] Mrs Fanny Drake (Conservative Club), 15 Clerkenwell Green, came to Rochester Row Station and stated she had put the police on the Whitechapel Murderer and had now called to know the result. She was walking over Westminster Bridge when a man answering the description of the murderer met her, and as he passed, gave such a grin, as she should always remember. She at once retraced her steps and followed him until opposite Westminster Abbey, when meeting a mounted Inspector she told him of her suspicion, pointed out the man, and came to this station, the inspector following and watching the man. About 5 minutes afterwards Inspr Walsh came in and stated that the gentleman referred to had been followed by him to the Army and Navy Stores, Victoria Street, Westminster, and had now come to the station to see the lady. I interviewed him in the charge room, when he at once produced a number of letters and business cards proving himself beyond doubt to be Mr Douglas Cow of Cow & Co., India-Rubber Merchants, 70 Cheapside, and 8 Kempshott Road, Streatham Common. This information I at once imparted to the lady when she at once apologized to Mr Cow for having caused him inconvenience, and both parties then left the station.

This report displays not only the widely held belief that no one 'respectable' could have been the Ripper, but also the panic that held London in its grip—a tension so extreme it compelled a woman to denounce a man as a murderer because of the way he grinned.

The 'correctness' of a man's address is once more seen as an unassailable character reference in another report in the file. Inspector J. Bird of A Division wrote:

> I beg to report that at 9.40 p.m., 22nd November 1888, James Connell of 408 New Cross Road, draper & clothier age 36, height 5ft 9in, complexion fresh, long dark brown moustache, dress: brown check suit, ulster with cape, red socks, Oxford shoes, soft felt hat, an Irishman was brought to this (Hyde Park) Station by P.C. 271A Fountain under the following circumstances. Martha Spencer of 30 Sherborne Street, Blandford Square, married, stated that he spoke to her near the Marble Arch, they walked together in the park and he began to talk about "Jack the Ripper" and Lunatic Asylums and said that no doubt, when he was caught, he would turn out to be a lunatic. In consequence of this conversation she became alarmed and spoke to the P.C. who accompanied them to the station. A telegram was then sent to Greenwich Station for enquiry as to the correctness of his address and his respectability, a satisfactory reply having been received he was then allowed to go, as nothing further suspicious transpired.

Of all the suspects arrested none was thought more likely to have been the Ripper than the Mad Pork Butcher who was arrested in Holloway on 12th September, four days after the second murder. Had the real Ripper retired after killing Chapman, no doubt Joseph Isenschmid would have gone down in history as the Whitechapel Murderer. As it later turned out, the Ripper's worst atrocities were carried out after Isenschmid was safely under lock and key.

Isenschmid's fate was sealed very early on in the Ripper investigation, when a rumour that the murderer was a man known as Leather Apron gained wide belief. Inspector Abberline wrote in his long Special Report on the murder of Nichols:

> In the course of our inquiries amongst numerous women of the same class as the deceased it was ascertained that a feeling of terror existed against a man known as Leather Apron, who it appeared has for a considerable time past been levying blackmail and illusing them if his demands were not > complied with, although there was no evidence to connect him with the murder. It was however thought desirable to find him and interrogate him as to his movements on the night in question, and with that view searching enquiries were made at all common lodging houses in various parts of the metropolis but through the publicity given in the 'Star' and other newspapers the man was made acquainted with the fact that he was being sought for and it was not until the 10th instant [September] that he was discovered when it was found that he had been concealed by his relatives. On his being interrogated he was able however to give such a satisfactory account of his movements as to prove conclusively that the suspicions were groundless.

In an annexed report, Inspector Helston pointed out that Leather Apron was a man called Jack Pizer. Panic over the Leather Apron rumour had created a climate with all the mad fervour of a witch-hunt, and when finally poor Pizer, a boot-finisher whose house rendered up five sharp knives, was arrested and taken to Leman Street Police Station for questioning public feeling ran so high that a huge mob gathered in the street outside, calling for his blood. Even after he was exonerated the police dared not release him, and kept him in a cell for twenty-four hours lest the revenge-hungry crowd should lynch him. Shy and nervous as he was, Pizer was sufficiently enraged at the injustice he had suffered to sue several newspapers for rashly stating on his arrest that he was the killer. He won his case, and was awarded substantial damages.

Even when the story of his innocence had circulated the scandalized East Enders still would not rest. They had sunk their teeth in the Leather Apron rumour and they would not let go. If Pizer was innocent he was not Leather Apron, was the twisted logic of the hunt. This was Isenschmid's downfall. A loquacious publicity-seeker called Mrs Fiddymont, landlady of the Prince Albert pub in Brushfield Street, less than a quarter of a mile from Hanbury Street, took advantage of the packs of hungry newshounds who appeared so promptly from Fleet Street after the murder of Annie Chapman. Mrs Fiddymont spun the yarn to several reporters that she had seen a fearful-looking stranger in her pub at seven o'clock on the morning of the murder. According to Mrs Fiddymont, the interloper wore a stiff brown hat, a dark coat and no waistcoat. There was blood on his right hand and on his face, and his shirt was torn. His eyes, she said, were as wild as a hawk's.

As was so often the case, the police arrived to interview Mrs Fiddymont after the gentlemen of the Press had already bled her dry of information. Nevertheless, her testimony was taken down, and in the strained atmosphere of the murder hunt possibly more attention was paid to it than it might have earned in more rational times. Only three days later, a report from Holloway Police Station was received by officers at Whitechapel. It did not take long for the figment of Mrs Fiddymont's imagination to be connected with the subject of that report. Contained in the ten Special Reports in the Yard file on Chapman, it says:

> METROPOLITAN POLICE
> Y Division
> Holloway, 11th Sept 1888
> I beg to report that at 10 p.m., 11th inst., Dr Cowan, 10 Landseer Road and Dr Crabb of Holloway Road came to station and stated that Joseph Isenschmid, a butcher and a lunatic, a lodger at No. 60 Milford Road, and he having left his lodgings on several occasions at various times, it was thought that he might be connected with the recent murders at Whitechapel. In company of Sub Inspr Rose and Sergt Sealey, C.I.D., I went to the above address and saw George Tyler, occupier, who stated that at 11 p.m., 5th inst. he met Isenschmid in Hornsey Road, who asked him if he would accommodate him with a lodging.
>
> He took him home and he left the house at 1 a.m. 6th, returned at 9 p.m. 6th, left again at 1 a.m. 7th, returned at 9 p.m., left again at 6 a.m. 9th inst., returned at 6 p.m., stayed in house about 30 minutes. He then left to go to Tottenham, returned at 1 a.m. 10th, left again at 2 a.m., returned at 9 p.m. and left again at 1 a.m. 11th and has not yet returned.
> I then proceeded to No. 97 Duncombe Road and saw Mrs Isenschmid, his wife, who stated that she had not seen her husband during past two months, but he visited the above premises during her absence on 9th inst. and took away some clothing. She further stated that he was in the habit of carrying large butcher's knives about with him and did not know how he obtained his livelihood. His movements being suspicious, I directed P.C. 376 Cracknell to keep observation on the house and to bring Isenschmid to station, should he return, for enquiries. I also directed observation to be kept on 97 Duncombe Road, Upper Holloway. I respectfully suggest that further enquiries be made by C.I.Department.

> No description of man could be obtained sufficient to circulate at present.
> Jn Styles, D. Inspr.

Inspector Styles's suggestion was heeded and C.I.D. officers took the case over. In a report dated 13th September, Acting Superintendent J. West of H Division (Whitechapel) wrote:

> . . . no new facts have been brought to the notice of police excepting that a man has been detained at Holloway Station on suspicion, since removed to the Infirmary, Fairfield Road, Bow, having been certified as a dangerous lunatic. Sergeant Thick has examined the man's clothing but failed to find any trace of blood upon any of it. Enquiries are being made as to the man's whereabouts on the night in question.
> This man's name is Joseph Isenschmid, is a butcher by trade but failed in business about 12 months since. His arrest was brought about through information received from Drs Cowan & Crabb of Holloway, their attention having been called to him by a man named Tyler of 60 Milford Road, Holloway, who stated that Isenschmid, who was his lodger, had frequently been absent from home at early morning.

Detective Sergeant William Thick carried out investigations and on 17th September he wrote:

> I beg to report that I called several times at 60 Milford Road, Upper Holloway, with a view of interviewing Mr Tyler re the movements of Joseph Isenschmid, but failed, and I am also unable to ascertain where he is employed. On calling again yesterday I saw a boy named Briggs who informed me that Mr Tyler had removed early that morning, and he did not know where to. The boy was the only person in the house and stated that several gentlemen had called there for Mr Tyler during the last few days. He could say no more. I called on Mrs Geringher, the person referred to in wife's statement, who stated that she did not know the man I referred to and that no person but the regular customers had visited her house, a public house. I have made careful enquiries amongst Germans whom I know in this neighbourhood, but failed to find any trace of "Isenschmid" having been seen in this neighbourhood.
> I called at Fairfield Road, Bow, Infirmary Asylum where "Isenschmid" is still detained. I saw the Medical Superintendent who informed me that "Isenschmid" had told him > that the girls at Holloway had called him "Leather Apron" and that he had said to them in the way of chaff, I am "Leather Apron", and he supposed they had informed the police. He was a "butcher" by trade but had failed in business. He had a few words with his wife and he left her. He was now getting his living by going to the Market early in the morning, buying sheep's heads, kidneys and sheep's feet, taking them home to his lodgings and dressing them, then taking them to Restaurants and Coffee Houses in the West End of the town, and selling them, and that that was the cause of him being up so early in the morning, and that was the only way open to him to get his livelihood.

> The Superintendent would like for police to give instructions what he was to do with Isenschmid. I beg to add that further and careful enquiries are being made with a view of tracing the whereabouts of Mr Tyler to obtain further particulars from him. Also other persons who are likely to give further details of Isenschmid's movements on dates of the recent murders.

The following day, the 18th, Inspector Abberline put pen to paper over the Isenschmid inquiries. He wrote:

> I beg to report that inquiries have been continued relative to the various matters in connection with the murders, including the lunatic who was detained by police at Holloway on 12th Inst., and handed over to the parochial authorities same day.
> He gives the name of Joseph Isenschmid, and his occupation has been that of a butcher. He is now detained at Bow Infirmary asylum, Fairfield Road, Bow, and from his description he is believed to be identical with the man seen in the Prince Albert P.H., Brushfield Street, Spitalfields, with blood on his hands at 7 a.m. on the morning of the murder of Annie Chapman. Dr Mickle, the medical officer of the Institution, has been consulted with a view to Isenschmid being seen by Mrs Fiddymont and the other witnesses. The doctor is of opinion this cannot be done at present with safety to his patient. It has been ascertained that this man has been wandering about and away from his home for several weeks past, and when he left his home he took with him two butchers knives. He has been previously confined in an asylum, and is said to be at times very violent. Although at present we are unable to procure any evidence to connect him with the murders he appears to be the most likely person that has come under our notice to have committed the crimes, and every effort will be made to account for his movements on the dates in question.

In an H Division Special Report dated 19th September Sergeant Thick recorded the statement of Isenschmid's wife, perhaps the most incriminating of all the comments about the lunatic:

> I beg to report that on 12th inst. I called at the Islington Workhouse and found that Joseph Isenschmid had been removed from there to Fairfield Road, Bow, Infirmary Asylum. I then saw Mrs Isenschmid, his wife, at 97 Duncombe Road, Upper Holloway, who stated that they had been married twenty one years.
> He is a "Swiss" and was at that time employed as a journeyman butcher. They then went into business as Pork-butchers at 59 Elthone Road, Upper Holloway, but eventually failed. Her husband then began to get very much depressed and repeatedly stopped away from his home at night and remained away for several days. He has been in Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum for ten weeks and was discharged from there about the middle of last December and came home supposed to be quite well. He then got employment as journeyman butcher at a Mr Marlett's, High Street, Marylebone, and stopped there till Whitsuntide. He then left and has done nothing since to her knowledge. He professed to have had work but did not bring home any money. He has not slept at home for quite two months. About three or four weeks ago he was found in a house in Caledonian Road and was charged. He was taken to Clerkenwell Police Court and remanded for enquiries to be made about him. He was eventually discharged. He then came home again and changed his underclothing and left again. I did not see him again.
> She then added, "I went away into the country to visit my friends last Sunday week (1st Inst.) and returned again on Monday following. I was then informed by my daughters that my husband had been home and took his shirts and collars away. Mr Tyler, 60 Milford Road, Upper Holloway, had called during my absence and left a message for me to call on him. I went there on Tuesday morning. I did not see my husband. When he left he had two bone knives and his butcher's clothes with him. I don't know what has become of them. I do not think my husband would injure anyone but me. I think he would kill me if he had the chance. He is fond of other women. He used to frequent a public house kept by a > ‘German’ named Geringher in Wentworth Street, Whitechapel. He is known as the mad butcher.”

Observation was kept on Isenschmid as he languished in the asylum, Dr Mickle ready at a moment’s notice to contact Inspector Stilson if he learned anything incriminating from the lunatic. Stilson’s visits to the asylum became less and less frequent as each proved more fruitless than the last. And finally Jack the Ripper struck again and the pathetic Mad Pork Butcher of Holloway was left to rot in his cell, drowning in his own insanity.

CHAPTER SIX

The Motive

In a letter to Gladstone, then Prime Minister, from her widowhood retreat at Osborne House on the Isle of Wight, written on 11th February 1886 Queen Victoria said, 'The Queen cannot sufficiently express her indignation at the monstrous riot which took place the other day in London, and which risked people's lives and was a momentary triumph of socialism and disgrace to the capital'.

She was referring to the unexpected outcome of a meeting of the unemployed—who, it has been estimated, formed nearly 10 per cent of the working population that year—in Trafalgar Square on 8th February. It was the first and in some ways the least disturbing of the episodes of violence which were part of the social backcloth of the period in which Walter Sickert set his unlikely story.

It has already been shown that Sickert mixed with the highest and the most humble, and in the words of Osbert Sitwell was a friend of 'prize-fighters, jockeys, painters, music-hall comedians, statesmen, washerwomen and fishwives'. He certainly mixed in the right circles to share in the intimate gossip of the Court. Though there is no available documentary proof that he was a friend of Princess Alexandra, he was certainly a friend of her husband the Prince of Wales. The painter was a leading figure in the raffish cliques in which Bertie throve, and they met constantly at such gatherings as the wild parties thrown by Oscar Wilde. But this does not make the story true. It merely lends the teller a little more credibility.

In any murder investigation the motive is the foundation on which the case is built, unless the crimes in question are those of a lunatic, and hence motiveless. It has been generally concluded that the latter was true of the Jack the Ripper murders. Sickert, however, claimed there was a precise motive for the East End killings, and that those behind the crimes were trying to conceal the wayward behaviour of a highly placed member of the Royal Family. For a mass of reasons England was in turmoil, revolution seemed only a step away and the monarchy was already unpopular. The conspirators believed they were hushing up a scandal that was likely to topple the throne from its crumbling dais.

Whether or not the Heir Presumptive to the throne did father a bastard and marry an illiterate Catholic, the first essential was to discover whether such conduct would even have been considered important. Was there really a threat of revolution? Were the Royal Family unpopular to the extent that many thought the monarchy would end with the death of Victoria? These were the vital questions.

Several diverse political influences were coming to a head in the mid-eighties. Separately, they would undoubtedly have been troublesome. Combined as they were, they formed a positive danger to the established order.

Revolutionary feeling was reaching a new pitch. Discontent was spreading among the poorly paid working-class and the growing numbers of unemployed. Successive Governments were rocked by the Home Rule controversy which had inspired a civil conflict so savage in Ireland that, as George Earle Buckle, editor of The Times, wrote, 'the contagion of lawlessness spread to England'. European and Asian immigrants were flooding into all the major cities, especially the squalid environs of the docklands, where almost without exception a passing Englishman would feel an alien in his own land. The experience was new and dangerous. The proud patriotism engendered during eight hundred years of freedom from foreign invasion was under threat. The jingoistic spirit conjured up by Disraeli in the 1870s had somehow insinuated itself into the make-up of even the lowliest Briton. As men had dominion over the earth, so the English had dominion over men. The jealous possessor of an imaginary Divine Right to conquer and annex, to rule over and lead to enlightenment, the Englishman never more strongly regarded his homeland as his castle. When foreigners began spilling in such profusion into the very heart of his home cities, the resentment was bitter and prolonged. Nor did the hatred end there. Mutual suspicion and mistrust grew up between the various racial types, which through language difficulties and a fear of integration degenerated into the establishment of impenetrable ghettos. Race fights became commonplace. And as each aggressive, insecure community became increasingly insular for fear of murder or rape, the hatred deepened and the violence grew worse.

The tide of another power, socialism, which had been subject to a steady ebb and flow for thirty years, looked set by the mid-eighties to flood England and parts of Europe. Since 1849, when Karl Marx had settled in London, the focus of socialist thinking had shifted to England. Marx continued to live and write in London until his death. And though the father of Communism died in 1883, his influence lived on, expanded and propagated by his daughter Eleanor and his close friend and collaborator Friedrich Engels. In 1885, the year the royal bastard is supposed to have been born, socialism received a potent shot in the arm with the publication of the second volume of Marx's great work, Capital. Robert Cecil, third Marquess of Salisbury, Britain's Prime Minister during the period of the Whitechapel Murders and the man named by Sickert as the chief conspirator, was shrewdly aware of the danger he and his class faced from the disciples of Marx. Writing of events fifteen years later, the historian James Joll said:

> Karl Marx prophesied the impending destruction of the existing social order and the total re-organization of society in favour of the workers. For Marx's followers in 1900, the days of Salisbury and his kind were numbered.

On Black Monday—8th February 1886—angry crowds in Trafalgar Square heard violent speeches from the socialists John Burns and Henry Champion, and from the Marxist founder of the Social Democratic Federation, H. M. Hyndman. After the rally broke up, a militant section inflamed by the vehemence of the speakers marched through Pall Mall, St James's Street and Piccadilly to Mayfair and Hyde Park, breaking the windows of the Conservative Club, other club houses and private homes. Waving red flags and brandishing cudgels and stones, the 2 000-strong crowd swept forward, wrecking and robbing shops and causing damage and loss worth £50 000. Owing to a mistake a reserve force of police went to The Mall instead of Pall Mall. In the right place they might at least have been able to dilute the rioters' venom. Two days later in a thick fog a rumour was circulated that another mob was gathering, and in sheer panic that the 'brutal violence and infamous rapine' was to repeated many West End shopkeepers barricaded themselves in. No major incident occurred but the threat of riot in the capital was so alarming that a special committee was set up to consider the problem. It sat for nine days, with the Home Secretary himself taking the chair, and as a result of its report, which contained references to the 'grave mistakes' committed by the police, Sir Edmund Henderson, the Chief Commissioner, resigned. This did nothing to help matters. His successor, General Charles Warren, used military tactics in the vain hope of quelling the anger of the working classes who clamoured for justice—and who were incited by socialist agitators and the pangs of hunger and cold to resort to the only strength they knew, violence. Warren confronted the poor with his new-style military police force and kept them at bay all through the winter of 1886 to 1887 only with the unuttered but unmistakable threat that any breach of the peace would result in direct and bloody conflict. Consequently the unemployed proceeded to draw attention to themselves with demonstrations outside fashionable churches, which to all outward appearances were peaceful, banner-waving affairs, but which camouflaged a smouldering resentment. Such a situation could not last.

The Press began seriously discussing the possibility of a working-class uprising, and in October 1887 the prospect of further riots looked so close that Salisbury suggested Trafalgar Square be railed off. Warren had already banned public meetings as it had become a forum for agitators. But before the Prime Minister's plan could be implemented a new conflict erupted on 13th November, Bloody Sunday. Nearly a hundred thousand unemployed converged on Trafalgar Square from all sides. Among them were Eleanor Marx and members of the socialist Fabian Society, including George Bernard Shaw, the brilliant speaker Annie Besant and the artist and poet William Morris, who had declared himself a socialist and a revolutionary. The furious crowds, urged on by the socialists and radicals in their midst, and armed to the teeth with knives, sticks, pokers and iron bars, surged forward to the Square, to be met by four thousand policemen. Warren had lined the Square with three hundred Life Guards and the same number of Grenadier Guards, all armed with loaded muskets and bayonets. In the ensuing struggle one person was killed and more than a hundred and fifty injured. All was quiet by midnight, but the clash caused irreparable damage to relations between police and public, feeding the fires not only of socialism but of anarchy. In London, a monumental history of the capital and its people, Felix Barker and Peter Jackson describe the period 1886–9 as 'three violent years':

> It began with the tinkle of glass as stones smashed the windows of clubs in Pall Mall; it ended with a hoarse roar of victory by East End dockers when they were granted a basic rate of 6d. an hour. In the three years that separated these events, London became a violent battleground.

The other great political upheaval of the day was the increasingly bitter struggle over the question of Home Rule for Ireland. On this issue, 'the whole political world was in convulsion', according to one contemporary chronicler. Home Rule had become the burning issue since 1885. In June of that year the Liberals under Gladstone were defeated in the Commons after five years in office because the Irish members voted with the Opposition. The defeat demonstrated for the first time the influence of one Charles Stewart Parnell, leader of the Irish Nationalists. Though he had only 85 members he held the balance of power between the Liberals and the Conservatives. After Gladstone's defeat, Lord Salisbury formed a minority Conservative government, but six months later Gladstone was back with a majority over the Conservatives of 86. By this time the Grand Old Man had undergone a dramatic conversion to the idea of Home Rule, but the subsequent Bill he introduced with the intention of bringing it about was rejected by the Commons. Gladstone immediately dissolved Parliament and fought the new election of mid-1886 purely on the Irish issue. The result was a decisive victory for Salisbury's Conservatives, who gained 316 seats. Their supporters over Home Rule, the Liberal Unionists, gained 78. The Gladstonians won only 191 seats and the Parnellites 85.

The struggle for Irish independence had for years brought terror and violence to dwellers on both sides of the Irish Sea, bombings and shootings finally culminating in 1882 in the cold-blooded murder in Phoenix Park, Dublin, of the new Irish

Chief Secretary, Lord Frederick Cavendish, and his Under-Secretary Thomas Burke. The Fenians, launched specifically for the purpose of promoting revolution and over-throwing the English government in Ireland, continued with dynamite outrages at major buildings and monuments in London and the provinces. At last they made an audacious attempt at blowing up Scotland Yard itself. The Fenian threat had reached such alarming proportions by 1884 that the Special Irish Branch, the forerunner of the Special Branch, was set up to bring the problem under control.

The world is perverse. It forgives heinous crimes in its favourites and castigates the tiniest transgression in those it hates. It is fair to say the process never works in reverse. It is therefore difficult to see how a popular figure could be so viciously lampooned over a trivial error of judgement as was Edward, Prince of Wales, over the patently unimportant Tranby Croft 'scandal' of 1891. The simple answer is, that despite the eulogies of several biographers, he was not popular. Even the prudish, hypocritical values of late Victorian England would hardly have allowed one negligible incident to turn a whole country against a beloved prince. In fact Bertie was the possessor of an odious reputation until shortly before his accession to the throne in 1901. The gloom of dishonour and unpopularity had occasionally lessened in the forty years since he first fell seriously from public favour, but generally he was despised. And despite the rapturous appreciation of the masses at the jubilee of his ageing mother, Queen Victoria, she too suffered definite, if less prolonged, bouts of disfavour.

Tranby Croft brought the Prince into the witness box of a public court of law for the second time in his profligate life, an unprecedented step that would have been unthinkable to previous Princes of Wales. It was arguably the least serious of all his many mistakes, but it had an incalculable effect in plunging his name still deeper into the bog of notoriety. Finally, during a visit to Brussels in 1900, an anarchist fired a pistol through the open window of a train in which the Prince sat. The bullet missed its mark, but the would-be assassination was a realization of what many had pondered with a voodoo-like malice over many years. It was the culmination of public resentment and the natural consequence of several previous displays of antipathy, such as a demonstration against him when he visited Cork with Princess Alexandra in 1885. The crowd hissed and booed the royal couple, and even pelted them with onions. His notoriety spread beyond British shores, and in 1898 he was hissed and mercilessly caricatured during a visit to Paris.

Exactly how unpopular the Prince of Wales was can be gauged by the events of the Tranby Croft affair and its aftermath. In September 1890 the Prince was staying along with other guests at Tranby Croft, the Yorkshire country home of his friend Arthur Wilson, a wealthy shipowner. During a game of baccarat several guests noted that one of the players, Sir William Gordon-Cumming, was cheating. The next evening they watched his play more carefully in order to confirm their suspicions, and later reported their observations to the Prince. Foolishly, he compelled the fraud to sign an undertaking that because he had cheated he would renounce gambling for ever. Gordon-Cumming agreed in exchange for a promise that the incident would never be mentioned again. Unfortunately, the secret was shared by too many, and one of the guests betrayed him to an outsider. Fashionable society grasped the sordid titbit with customary greed. His reputation thus publicly besmirched, Gordon-Cumming sued Mr and Mrs Arthur Wilson—and other guests who had accused him of cheating—for slander. In the subsequent court hearing the Prince of Wales was treated with scant respect, and though Gordon Cumming lost his suit, the Prince was hissed by the crowds that lined his route from court. In her biography of Princess Alexandra, Georgina Battiscombe quotes a coachman who spoke of Bertie after the 'Baccarat Case'. His words, she says, reflected the feeling of many ordinary folk: 'God will never allow such a wicked man to come to the throne'.

It was alleged by the prosecution that the Prince habitually encouraged baccarat, an illegal game, that he had decided Gordon-Cumming was a cheat on the flimsiest of evidence and that he had acted improperly in not immediately reporting the charge to Gordon-Cumming's commanding officer instead of summarily dealing with it himself. Not pleasant allegations, but the most ductile imagination cannot admit they were the acts of a wicked man whom God would never allow to come to the throne. Such a denunciation could never have been uttered if the Prince had been even vaguely popular.

A comment made during the trial by Gordon-Cumming's counsel, Sir Edward Clarke, is interesting support of Sickert's claim that the monarchy was dangerously weak. Alleging the Prince hushed up the initial charges against Gordon-Cumming in order to save his own honour, Clarke said there had been other examples of men ready 'to sacrifice themselves to support a tottering throne or prop a falling dynasty'. (My italics.) The words were plainly intended to mean that the Prince's own dynasty was perilously unsound. An advocate of Clarke's undisputed competence would not have clouded his addresses with the preposterous or irrelevant: there was something rotten in the state of England. Bertie later wrote that because of Tranby Croft he was subjected to a 'torrent of abuse . . . not only by the Press, but by the Low Church and especially the Nonconformists'.

His reputation had first suffered seriously in 1869 when he appeared in court over the Mordaunt divorce case. In Clarence, his biography of Eddy, Michael Harrison wrote:

> It was the indiscreet practice of the Prince of Wales to pay social calls on young married women, and to spend a considerable time with them alone, after the footman had been instructed not to disturb the tête-à-tête. What made the indiscretion even more noticeable was that His Royal Highness neglected to cultivate the acquaintance of the ladies' husbands—or even to express a wish to meet them.

In the Mordaunt case, the Prince was named as one of Lady Mordaunt's lovers after she calmly announced that her newborn child was not her husband's but Lord Cole's. Cole was only one of a pride of well-born rakes the promiscuous Lady Mordaunt entertained. Even though the Prince was treated with great courtesy in court, and denied any improper familiarity with the lady, and despite the fact that on this occasion he was cheered as he left the Divorce Court, still the first serious blow to his reputation had been struck. Soon the popular Press was calling into question his fitness to become King, and public opinion turned against him. Princess Alexandra was always remarkably popular with the people, and in his treatment of her Bertie's reputation suffered further damage. Privacy has no real meaning for most of the silver spoon breed, especially those whose spoons bear the crest of the Lion and the Unicorn. It soon became clear to Bertie that he could not conceal his infidelity. His amorous affairs rapidly became a subject of nation-wide gossip. That he had half expected. But what he could not have foreseen was the vehemence of public reaction.

The covertly sentimental British had taken Alix well and truly into their hearts, and one night when she appeared in the Royal Box at the opera the audience rose to their feet and cheered. When Bertie appeared moments later he was hissed.

Pleasure-seeking and unashamed debauchery, it seemed to the country, were the Prince's sole purposes in life. Lambasting the degenerate Heir Apparent became a favourite pastime for the self-righteous hypocrites of the drawing-room and the denizens of the gutter Press—a practice rendered doubly stimulating by the dual morality and holier-than-thou philosophy that epitomized the Victorians. One publication collected all the basest tales of the Prince's immorality from the underworlds of Paris and London and presented them in the form of a pastiche of Tennyson's Idylls of the King, under the crude punning title, The Coming K—.

Yet another divorce scandal broke in 1876. This time it seems the Prince of Wales played, uncharacteristically, an almost guiltless role, his one misdemeanour amounting to writing some compromising letters to Lady Aylesford, who was being divorced by her husband on the grounds of her adultery with Lord Blandford, elder brother of Lord Randolph Churchill. Churchill obtained a packet of letters written by the Prince to Lady Aylesford which Lord Randolph described as of 'the most compromising character', adding that if they were published they would ensure the Prince 'would never sit upon the Throne of England'. As a result the Prince challenged Churchill to a duel but was curtly refused.

In 1888, the year of the Ripper murders, the name of the Prince of Wales had become so reviled that even his own nephew, the German Kaiser, threatened to cancel a visit to Austria unless the Prince, who was staying in Vienna, departed first.

Despite the blaze of glory into which Queen Victoria emerged at her Golden Jubilee, she too suffered unpopularity during much of her reign. In her early years as Queen she had been hissed on public occasions, notably during one visit to Ascot, and seven separate attempts were made on her life. In one incident she was hit over the head and knocked unconscious by a retired lieutenant of the 10th Hussars.

The obsessional mourning she affected after the death in 1861 of her beloved consort Albert did much to damage her popularity. The country became irritated by her prolonged seclusion, and outraged by her obstinate refusals to take part in public events. A campaign against her social hibernation led eventually to a monarchy crisis. Sir Henry Ponsonby, her private secretary, declared in 1871 that if Victoria had been a man she would have been turned off the throne. Resentment against her seclusion spread quickly, and in a scurrilous pamphlet called What Does She Do With It? she was accused of hoarding £200,000 of her constitutional allowance every year. The accusation succeeded in turning the greater part of the working-classes against her. They could not abide a miserly monarch. Events came to a head when Reynolds' Newspaper announced that she planned to abdicate. The idea was unfounded, but it finally gave public expression to the fact that abdication seemed the only solution to the crisis. On 6th November 1871 she was bitterly attacked by Sir Charles Dilke, a radical M.P. who, referring to her seclusion, accused her of dereliction of duty. He urged his audience to depose Victoria, eliminate the monarchy entirely and set up a Republic. It was just the sort of event momentarily to deflect the Queen from her utter determination to live as she pleased. She jealously guarded her sovereignty, and the fear of revolution haunted her all through life. Since the mid-sixties she had been nervously aware of the possibility of what she termed 'a new French Revolution' in England, brought about by the vast gulf between the lower and upper classes. But still she lived the life of a regal hermit, and in 1872 a sixth attempt was made to kill her. After the seventh and final attempt at regicide in 1882, the Queen's popularity measurably increased. Alone, she might then have been able to take the monarchy forward to a more stable situation. But with the Prince of Wales on the rampage all over England there was no hope of dragging the name of the Royal Family out of the mire. And by the mid-eighties the Royal Family, especially Prince Eddy, had a new enemy—Henry Labouchere, editor of the magazine Truth. He hated the monarchy, and he especially hated Eddy. He rigorously opposed the moves to grant an official allowance to the Prince of Wales's children and ruthlessly pilloried the Royal Family, both as individuals and as an institution, in the controversial pages of his journal.

At the outset, Sickert's evaluation of the importance of Eddy's behaviour had not seemed to bear the gloss of truth. The gloss had been dulled by the murky antics of Eddy's father. If the Prince of Wales was corrupt what would one more regal reprobate matter? In studying the political and social climates, though, one can see that purely because of the fabled immorality of his father, Eddy's conduct was immensely important: he was the bright hope for the future. If he was involved in the sort of affair Sickert attributed to him the camel's back would have well and truly shattered. The inveterate enemies of the Crown, including Dilke and Labouchere, would certainly have conspired—and probably succeeded—to bring about the downfall of Britain's eight-hundred-year-old monarchy.

One aspect of the motive has not yet been examined: the apparent threat of Catholicism and the related danger of a marriage between Prince Eddy and a Catholic. The constitutional perils contained in the alleged alliance between Eddy and Annie Elizabeth Crook can be measured precisely. For in 1890 the question of Eddy's official marriage arose and a crisis developed when he chose as his bride Princess Hélène d'Orléans, daughter of the Comte de Paris, who, much to everyone's horror, was a Roman Catholic.

A fierce and irrational hatred of Catholics still existed in the hearts of many English Protestants, even into the early part of the twentieth century, and the cry of 'No Popery!' could still be heard in the eighties and nineties. As recently as 1850 anti-Catholic demonstrations took place in London, an effigy of Cardinal Wiseman was burnt in the streets of Bethnal Green and crowds heaping loud abuse on the Pope broke the windows of Catholic churches and attacked priests. The Church of England dominated the country, and any deviation from Protestantism was regarded with the deepest suspicion. Some years after the Bethnal Green episode an Anglican vicar in East London was pelted with bread pudding for taking even such a minute step in the direction of Rome as placing candles on his altar and decking his choirboys in surplices. Even as late as 1910 Edward VII was strongly criticized in the Press for attending a service at St James's Roman Catholic Church at Spanish Place in West London.

As far as the Establishment was concerned, Eddy becoming involved with a Catholic was one of the worst things that could have happened in the mid-eighties. Over the question of his proposed marriage to Hélène in 1890, Queen Victoria wrote a strong letter warning him off her. His marriage to a Catholic, she predicted, would have 'the very worst effect possible'. At a time of such unrest, when the throne was already in danger, those extreme words of warning could mean only one thing: Victoria foresaw an uprising that would end the monarchy.

Lord Salisbury was also frightened of that possibility. According to Sir Philip Magnus in his King Edward the Seventh, Salisbury's pronouncement on the subject was in unmistakable terms. When the Prince of Wales asked him if it was possible for Eddy to marry Hélène and she remain a Catholic, Salisbury warned him that 'the anger of the middle and lower classes might endanger the throne if it became known that he had advanced or even contemplated it'.

It has been suggested that one of the greatest flaws in Sickert's story was that the Royal Marriages Act and the Act of Settlement were still on the statute book at the time Eddy is alleged to have married Annie Elizabeth Crook. Donald Rumbelow points out in his Complete Jack the Ripper that, under the Royal Marriages Act, Eddy's marriage to Annie Elizabeth could have been set aside as illegal because he was under twenty-five at the time of the marriage and he had married without the Queen's consent. The Act of Settlement excluded anyone married to a Roman Catholic from inheriting the Crown. All this is true, but whether or not Eddy's marriage to Annie Elizabeth would have been valid in law would not affect the reaction of the populace at the news of such an alliance. Salisbury and Lord Halsbury, the Lord Chancellor, were obviously aware of the two Acts when, according to Magnus, they composed elaborate memoranda on the political and legal aspects of Eddy's betrothal to Hélène—yet Salisbury still envisaged revolution as a result of the proposed marriage.

In her letter to Eddy, Victoria told him a marriage to a Catholic would mean he would lose all his rights. A. J. Balfour, Salisbury's nephew and a Conservative M.P., though he could see the romance of the affair, wrote, 'We shall have a great deal of trouble over it all'.

When the Prince of Wales wanted to visit the Pope in 1903 he was told by the Cabinet that such a course could cause great unrest among Protestants, who still regarded Rome as a threat.

'This is absurd', wrote Balfour. 'But the people we have to deal with are absurd also!'

Balfour's opinion sums up the impotence of Rumbelow's argument: the law may have appeared a safeguard against Eddy's irresponsibility, but the law could not control the illogical emotions of the middle and lower classes.

If Eddy had indeed not only married a Catholic but also fathered her child—a child conceived out of wedlock—it is easy to see that Salisbury and the Royal Family would have regarded the affair as crucial. To Victoria, wrote Elizabeth Longford, 'in her state of nervous tension all unwelcome news assumed immense proportions'.

If Eddy's conduct was not sufficient to cause chaos, Salisbury could hardly be blamed for thinking it was. If Sickert's story of the clandestine wedding and birth turned out to be true, it would be perfectly credible that Salisbury would have tried to cover up the affair by institutionalizing Annie Elizabeth Crook. But removing her would only have compounded the difficulty, for Sickert said Marie Kelly escaped to tell the tale. If that was the case, Salisbury not only had to cover up the initial scandal but also the brutal treatment he had meted out to Eddy's paramour.

The circumstances were right and the stage was set for Sickert's drama. It remained only to see if the curtain ever rose.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Cleveland Street

Cleveland Street, W.1., is a long, narrow road running approximately north-west to south-east between Euston Road and Goodge Street. One entire block has been demolished since the days of Jack the Ripper, and the site is now occupied by a much enlarged Middlesex Hospital, whose nineteenth-century predecessor in Cleveland Street was important but considerably smaller. Apart from this one change the street is pretty much as it was then, and is dominated by sombre three-storey houses, some of whose ground floors serve as shops or offices.

When Cleveland Street and the events Sickert alleged went on there were investigated the painter began to earn some real credibility. Much of what he said became provable fact. Nothing, it seems, can be proved false. And there were several peripheral factors which suggested he could not have been lying.

Of all the questions jockeying for first consideration, one was of overriding importance: did the main characters in Sickert's story even exist? It had been Sickert who had drawn up the dramatis personae, and if his story had been false it was more than likely the less illustrious characters of the tale would have been fictitious too. Clearly Prince Eddy, the Prime Minister and Sir William Gull were real people, but John Netley, Annie Elizabeth Crook and her daughter Alice Margaret were another matter. Chapter 12 describes the search for John Netley, so little need be said of him here. Of paramount importance at this stage in the investigation were the two lowly females whose behaviour and, in the case of the child, whose very existence is supposed to have set off such an appalling chain-reaction.

The electoral register for Cleveland Street in the 1880s produced no names that were helpful. This was not surprising, as Annie Crook, being a woman, would not have had the vote and the only other relevant resident, Sickert himself, had so many rooms around London that he never bothered with such trivia as registering his occupation. Robert Emmons pointed out in his Life and Opinions of Walter Richard Sickert that the painter concerned himself little with money matters and behaved with quite reckless generosity. According to Marjorie Lilly, he rarely thought about money until it was no longer there. This had two effects: considering money a mere formality, he behaved even more contemptuously towards the worldly demands of bureaucracy, such as filling in forms. Secondly, he rarely had much cash to spare, and when it ran out altogether (which it often did in those early days), remaining unregistered and elusive helped if he had to bolt one night without paying the rent.

The Post Office Directory of London between 1885 and 1888 was no more useful in checking hard facts. What it did confirm, however, was that the 'community' picture of the area painted in Sickert's story was accurate. There were shopkeepers in plenty—Henry Fletcher, greengrocer; Henry Mowbray, hairdresser; Isaac Lyons, linen-draper; George Endersby, bookseller; Mrs Sarah Winslow, Chandler's Shop—and so on in a seemingly endless stream, all traders in that one narrow thoroughfare. In a day when skilled crafts were a living part of the social system, there was still room for Thomas Walter Cadwallader, Locksmith, and William Leader, Umbrella Maker. In addition there were chair-makers, boot-makers, cabinet-makers, coach-body makers, woodcarvers, saddlers, hatters, bookbinders, engravers, silver-chasers, French polishers and craftsmen of every kind. One can see at a glance that the area would have been ideally suited to the young artist. Within sight of his rooms at No. 15 there were gathered a picture-liner, an artist's colourman and further along Henry Landsbert, a dealer in works of art. There was no more likely place in London for Sickert to have had a studio. It had for many years been the favourite centre for young artists at the beginning of their careers. As William Gaunt recorded in The Pre-Raphaelite Tragedy, Holman Hunt had his studios in Cleveland Street and it was the birthplace and nursery of the renowned Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood, associates of which included Millais, the Rossettis, Ford Madox Brown and Hunt himself.

Cleveland Street was liberally sprinkled with Coffee Rooms, such as those of Henry Lindner or Mrs Ann Storey, where the men of the 'village' could forsake their womenfolk and the cares or creations of the day and in time-honoured manner, perpetuated now by the male population of France—gather for a long and often intense midday discussion. In the evening similar relaxation could be had in finer style over a glass of ale in the George and Dragon, the City of Hereford or The Crown.

But of Annie Elizabeth Crook, tobacconist's shop assistant of No. 6, basement, there seemed no trace until BBC researcher Karen de Groot made a search of the Rate Books for the two boroughs into which Cleveland Street cut, Marylebone and St Pancras. The 1888 Rate Book for the street records:

Number 6 Elizabeth Cook (Basement).

It was close. Sickert said the basement of No. 6 was inhabited by Annie Elizabeth Crook. The Rate Book showed the name Elizabeth Cook. This was consistent with Sickert's story that Annie's surname was often rendered as Cook. Her existence was finally proved when another document was checked. This was the birth certificate of her daughter. The certificate was obtained from Somerset House in order to check Sickert's basic claims, which were:

(1) Annie Elizabeth Crook was a tobacconist's assistant in Cleveland Street in the eighties.
(2) In April 1885 she gave birth to an illegitimate child.
(3) The birth took place at Marylebone Workhouse.
(4) The father of the child was Prince Eddy.
(5) The child's name was Alice Margaret Crook.

The birth certificate confirms four of these five points. It is dated 18th April 1885 and records:

SEX:	Girl
NAME:	Alice Margaret Crook
PLACE OF BIRTH:	Marylebone Workhouse
NAME OF MOTHER:	Annie Elizabeth Crook, confectionery assistant from Cleveland Street
NAME OF FATHER:	Blank
OCCUPATION OF FATHER:	Blank

The birth certificate is marked with a cross by which is written, 'The mark of Annie Elizabeth Crook, Mother, 6 Cleveland Street, Fitzroy Square'. The address shows that the Elizabeth Cook of the Rate Book and Annie Elizabeth Crook were one and the same. And the cross confirms another part of Sickert's story, that Annie was illiterate.

Three years after the birth of Alice Margaret, in April 1888, a police raid took place in Cleveland Street and both Eddy and Annie Elizabeth were taken away, Sickert claimed. Annie, he said, was certified insane and spent a hundred and fifty-six days at Guy's Hospital. During this time he believed she underwent some sort of operation that was contrived to destroy her memory of events in Cleveland Street, for on the one or two occasions he saw her after that she was a different person and no longer recognized him. Sir William Gull himself, Sickert thought, had performed the operation, which not only affected her memory but made her epileptic. After Guy's she spent months confined in various workhouses, and eventually, when it was realized she no longer possessed any dangerous knowledge, she was released—a harmless wreck, broken in body and spirit, abandoned in the streets from which she had so recently

After drifting in and out of workhouses for months in a vague search for shelter, she was eventually apprehended once more and confined for the rest of her life in prisons, hospitals and workhouses. She died in 1920 at 367 Fulham Road. By then she was hopelessly insane.

Guy's Hospital do have records of patients in the nineteenth century but they are incomplete. The register of patients for 1888 is missing, so it is not possible to check if Annie Elizabeth was confined there as Sickert said. There are, however, independent facts which at least make the story credible. Sir William Gull maintained close connections with Guy's all his life and, significantly, was at one time in charge of an asylum for twenty insane women at the hospital. According to Michael Harrison, Gull's very presence in the Royal Household is in need of explanation, for rather than being an expert in disease generally, he specialized in paraplegia, diseases of the spinal cord and abscess of the brain. This specialization and his association with the asylum for women at Guy's are not only consistent with the story of Annie Elizabeth's incarceration—they also support Sickert's assertion that he had many times been of invaluable service in removing the troublesome by certifying them insane. He not only had the ability to perform the sort of operation that Sickert thought Annie Elizabeth had undergone, he also had the place to do it.

As to her movements after Guy's, Mr Alan Neate, keeper of the Greater London Record Office, was extremely helpful. Wading through the hundreds of registers in his custody, he found scattered but useful records of her movements between 1885 and her death. The earliest mention of her name was in the papers of St Marylebone Workhouse, which showed she entered the institution on 18th April 1885 (the day her child was born) and left on 5th May.

No further record of Annie Elizabeth can be found until 22nd January 1889, when she spent one day at St Giles Workhouse in Endell Street, High Holborn. There is then no mention of her name until 1903, when she became an inmate of institutions under the care of the St Pancras Board of Guardians. Mr Neate carefully compiled exact details of her movements between February 1903 and March 1913, with only a few months here and there untraceable. She was almost solidly in workhouses and hospitals during this decade, as is borne out in the GLC records:

Apr 18th 1885–May 6th 1885	St Marylebone Workhouse
Jan 22nd 1889 (one day)	St Giles Workhouse, Endell Street
Feb 7th 1903–Feb 23rd 1903	St Pancras Workhouse
Mar 12th 1903–Mar 27th 1903	St Pancras Workhouse
Oct 28th 1903–Nov 13th 1903	St Pancras Hospital
Nov 13th 1903–May 13th 1904	St Pancras Workhouse
May 13th 1904–Nov 11th 1904	Highgate Hospital
Nov 11th 1904–Nov 14th 1904	St Pancras Workhouse

On 14th November 1904 she was transferred from St Pancras Workhouse to Poland Street Workhouse, and from that point on was chargeable to St James's Parish of the Westminster Board of Guardians:

Nov 14th 1904–Aug 7th 1906	Poland Street Workhouse
Nov 11th 1906–Apr 3rd 1907	Poland Street Workhouse
Apr 3rd 1907–Jun 11th 1907	Cleveland Street Infirmary
Jun 11th 1907–Oct 31st 1907	Hendon Infirmary, Colindale

Oct 31st 1907–Mar 12th 1913	Cleveland Street Infirmary
Mar 12th 1913– ?	Hendon Infirmary
Feb 19th 1920– Feb 23rd 1920	Fulham Road Workhouse

After that coincidental return to Cleveland Street and spending five and a half years in the infirmary there—her longest recorded stay anywhere—she was admitted to Hendon Infirmary in March 1913, and there is no record of her ever having been released. Her name next appears in the registers of Fulham Road Workhouse in 1920, four days before her death. She died in the hospital next door to the workhouse. Its address, as Sickert said, was 367 Fulham Road.

At last some positive information was forthcoming, but was it necessarily proving Sickert's story true? Admittedly he was right about her being an inmate of various institutions almost solidly until her death, and was correct about the address where she died. But it was hard to imagine that a person confined as a lunatic would have been kept in workhouses. My knowledge of these institutions was vague. I knew that under the old poor laws of England there was a workhouse in each parish where indigent, vagrant and idle people were set to work and supplied with food and clothing, or what was termed indoor relief. What I did not know was that some workhouses were used as places of confinement for rogues and vagabonds. Bishop Atterbury (1662–1732) wrote:

> Hast thou suffered at any time by vagabonds and pilferers? Esteem and promote those useful charities which remove such pests into prisons and workhouses.

Before the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834 the workhouses gained a reputation as nurseries of idleness, ignorance and vice. But the Act united parishes to improve the management of workhouses. This gave rise to the Poor Law Unions which had control of workhouses containing from a hundred to five hundred inmates. Circulars published by the Lunacy Commission between 1890 and 1912, now at the Public Record Office in London, show that not only was it common practice for lunatics to be detained in workhouses, but that no records were required to be kept of them. It was consequently quite possible for a perfectly normal person to have been confined as insane in a workhouse. If this is what happened to Annie Elizabeth Crook there would have been no hope of appeal or protection because no one would have known of her incarceration. Many workhouses even had padded rooms, and not until 1910 were local boards of guardians required to keep records of inmates confined in them.

Suddenly it became clear. The workhouses would have been the ideal place to have confined Annie Elizabeth. Had she been put in an asylum, proper records would have to have been kept, and she would have received regular visits and checks from Lunacy Commission inspectors. Whereas in a padded cell at a workhouse she could be confined without even the approval of a doctor, and no questions would have been asked once she was committed.

Despite Mr Neate's exhaustive research, however, there were still gaps in the list of Annie Elizabeth's movements. There is no trace of any records explaining her whereabouts between her removal from Guy's, about September or October 1888, and 22nd January 1889 when she was at St Giles Workhouse for one day. Then there is another gap until 1903. The only other record discovered shows that on 29th April 1894 the child Alice Margaret was admitted to St Giles Workhouse. It was stated on her admission papers that her mother was in prison, which tallies with Sickert's account of Annie Elizabeth's fate.

The record of medical treatment Annie Elizabeth received at 367 Fulham Road in the few days prior to her death confirms Sickert's testimony that she died insane. The doctor attending the Lunacy Observation Ward where she was confined wrote:

> 20.2.20 Confused—sometimes noisy and hilarious, at other times almost stuporous—has delusions that she is being tortured—takes no interest in her surroundings.
> 23.2.20 Sudden attack of cardiac failure which ended in death at 12.40 a.m.

Records of her admission to several workhouses and hospitals state she was epileptic, which again confirmed Sickert's story. All at once, everything the painter said about the fate of Annie Elizabeth was turning out to be true. Her delusions of being tortured would seem hardly surprising if the whole of his story was accurate.

It is hard to explain how or why Annie Elizabeth was moved from the custody of one Board of Guardians to another, and from workhouse to workhouse, with such apparent ease. Rules were extremely rigid and paupers were interrogated closely about their movements in previous years before they were allowed into any workhouse. Before a pauper could receive indoor relief in an area he or she had to establish what was called a 'settlement' there by three years' continuous residence or by birth. If a pauper turned up at a parish where he had no settlement he would be returned to his own parish forthwith. There was provision for the removal of paupers from one area to another, by orders made by magistrates. But the process was long and complicated and rigorously discouraged. No such procedure was invoked with Annie Elizabeth Crook. She moved from area to area, and no questions were asked. This was extraordinary. She was treated unlike all the other workhouse inmates of her time, and all rules went by the board when she came to be dealt with.

In response to a request for further information on this unusual treatment, Mr Neate wrote saying that it was surprising but not necessarily irregular. 'Cases often occurred', he said, 'of a transfer made amicably between all concerned to avoid the legal formalities.' (My italics.)

This raises several questions: why was Annie Elizabeth Crook considered important enough to have rigid rules waived so that she could be moved from place to place more expeditiously? What made her different from all the other workhouse inmates? Why did no one want to draw attention to her by going through the regular procedure? And who arranged the short cuts?

Sickert's account of her marriage to Eddy and the events which followed answers all questions but the last. And as for that, I did not learn until later the remarkable importance of a gentleman by the name of the Rev. Henry Luke Paget.

And so the facts build up, stripping Sickert's story of its fantastic garb and showing, detail by detail, that at least the basis of his narrative is true. There is documentary proof that Annie Elizabeth Crook did exist; she did live in Cleveland Street; she did work in a tobacconist's shop there; she did give birth to a daughter when and where Sickert claimed; she did disappear from Cleveland Street and her steady job in the shop for no apparent reason (the birth of her child cannot explain her fall from being well enough off to be a ratepayer in her own home to the poverty of life in a workhouse); she did become an inmate of institutions that contained padded cells almost solidly until her death (and during that time, an age of strict convention, was treated in a puzzlingly unconventional manner); she did become an epileptic; she did die at 367 Fulham Road in 1920; and she was insane at the time.

But none of this connects her with Prince Albert Victor or even suggests Eddy knew Cleveland Street. Interestingly, Eddy's name was linked with Cleveland Street in Their Good Names by H. Montgomery Hyde, published in 1970. Hyde noted that Eddy had been a rumoured frequenter of a male brothel in Cleveland Street. Two years later when Michael Harrison published Clarence, his biography of the Prince, he went even further. Though he had never heard of Sickert's story, Harrison claimed that Eddy was very much tied up with goings-on at Cleveland Street. He said that in 1889, the year after the Ripper murders, Eddy was not only a frequenter but the central participant in a scandal which erupted at the male brothel. The brothel was at No. 19 Cleveland Street, immediately opposite the shop where Annie Elizabeth Crook worked until 1888, and only two doors away from Sickert's studio.

Eddy was bisexual, as Harrison showed. His amorphous sexuality conspired with an utter disregard for decorum—or rather, perhaps, a total inability to act as he ought—to thrust him in and out of love with entirely unsuitable women, men and boys. He could be in love with several people at once, as he later showed when, apparently deeply committed to Princess Hélène d'Orléans, he was simultaneously writing love-letters to the pretty Lady Sybil St Clair Erskine.

It is no surprise, then, that Eddy should have allowed himself to be drawn into the brothel, not because he was desperately homosexual but because he allowed himself to fall in love with his closest friends, be they male or female. There was no ungovernable lust in Eddy; at least there is no evidence to show there was; but he was weak, enormously soft-hearted and sufficiently unsophisticated to allow one smile or tender word to intoxicate him emotionally and lead him into desperate affairs he was powerless to control. Such had been the nature of his romance with Annie Elizabeth Crook. His presence in the Cleveland Street brothel scandal makes much greater sense in the light of his affair with Annie Elizabeth. He had been to Cleveland Street before, made many friends of all kinds, and yearned to return. In so doing he was led into the vices of No. 19.

There is totally independent evidence that Eddy was associated with Annie Elizabeth. Aleister Crowley—magician, poet, painter, chess-master and lecher, the man who called himself 'The Great Beast'—claimed in his book The World's Tragedy, published in Paris in 1910, that he had some compromising letters from Eddy to a boy called Morgan who lived in Cleveland Street. At first glance this claim appears only to strengthen the evidence that Eddy was associated with the street itself. But the real value of Crowley's alleged letters becomes apparent when one discovers that the boy Morgan was the son of Mrs Morgan who ran the very shop at No. 22 Cleveland Street in which Annie Elizabeth worked. This brings Eddy even closer to Annie Elizabeth. Harrison showed he went as far as No. 19, opposite Annie's shop. Crowley connected him with the actual shop, a place he must surely have visited regularly if he struck up a close enough relationship with Morgan to write him letters.

And that word 'compromising', what exactly did it mean? Knowing Eddy's bisexual nature, they could have been love letters to the boy. Or equally likely, they may have been letters mentioning some compromising detail of his affair with Annie Elizabeth, the sort of imprecise but scandalous detail that later led a Cleveland Street wag to pen these words:

Jack and Jill went out to kill
For things they couldn't alter
Jack fell down and lost his crown
And left a baby daughter.

Despite all this there is no concrete proof of a marriage between Annie Elizabeth and the Prince—Chapter 8 describes the elaborate cover-up which was set in motion to destroy such evidence. Sickert claimed the wedding took place at a St Saviour's Infirmary Chapel. For some time it looked as if this were the first point in his story in which he must have been wrong: no St Saviour's Infirmary could be found, let alone one that contained a chapel. But finally Ian Sharp of the BBC found records of just such an institution in Osnaburgh Street, which just happened to be within a stone's throw of Cleveland Street. The infirmary, now St Saviour's Hospital, has long since removed to Hythe in Kent, and it was some job tracing it. The Reverend Mother in charge admits the wedding could have taken place at the chapel of the old infirmary, but no records of the institution have survived. A search of the indexes at St Catherine's House in London, the new home of the births, marriages and deaths records, for every quarter between January 1884 and December 1889 proved fruitless. The names Coburg, Cook, Cooke, Crook, Crooke, Saxe, Saxe-Coburg (the surname of the Royal Family) and Sickert were all checked and double-checked, but to no avail. Royal weddings are not normally registered with the public marriages, but there was always the chance that Eddy had married under an assumed name, most likely of all his pseudonym Albert Sickert. But all trace of such a marriage, if it ever reached the registry, has long since been obliterated. The one real hope had been the Infirmary itself, and its records were gone for ever.

Still no baby. The most hopeless part of the quest, it seemed, was the bastard story. The existence of Annie Elizabeth Crook of Cleveland Street and her bastard child was established. It seems undeniable that Eddy frequented the very shop where Annie Elizabeth worked. But connecting Annie Elizabeth's child with Eddy proved another matter.

Before Joseph Sickert revealed his father's story in 1973 no one had suggested Eddy fathered a child, and Buckingham Palace still deny all knowledge of any offspring of the prince. Despite this, after months of fruitless research, I received a copy of a letter containing a statement, written in all innocence, about a child of the Duke of Clarence! It will be remembered that Eddy was created Duke of Clarence and Avondale in 1890. The letter had been written by a Mr Frederick Bratton of Harlesden to Lady Dowding, from whom I received the copy by a circuitous route. It was an ordinary conversational letter, but I was particularly struck by one paragraph which said:

> I was especially interested in particulars of the Duke of Clarence. My grandmother was 'commanded' to court to foster feed a child of the Duke's. She was selected from a number of 'possibles' after countless tests and interviews. At the last moment her uncle, Dr J. Bratton (Mayor of Shrewsbury etc) put his heavy foot down and sent regrets on her behalf. He told the family that Court life was 'frivolous' and that she might get into trouble, whatever that might mean.

I wrote to Mr Bratton, who replied with a charming letter but was unfortunately not able to help with documentary evidence. He emphasized that the whole affair had been 'very hush-hush', which was certainly consistent with Sickert's tale.

He was quite positive that the child his grandmother was to have weaned was the issue of Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence—Eddy. The story appeared in a published history of the Bratton family. This was against everything anybody else had said, except Walter Sickert.

To sum up: Annie Elizabeth Crook did exist. She did live where and when Sickert said. She gave birth to an illegitimate child exactly when Sickert said. There are completely independent claims that Eddy fathered a child, and that he was not only a frequenter of Cleveland Street but of the very shop where Annie Elizabeth worked.

One further point: in his article in The Criminologist, suggesting by implication that Eddy was Jack the Ripper, Dr Thomas Stowell referred to him as 'S'. There has not been a satisfactory explanation as to why he did this. It seems beyond coincidence that more than thirty years ago Walter Sickert claimed Eddy used to pose as his younger brother and pass himself off as 'Albert Sickert' or 'S'. So, in a roundabout way, another aspect of Sickert's story is confirmed.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Cover-up

A great deal is at stake if the Establishment considers it necessary to operate a full-scale cover-up. For the truth of the Jack the Ripper affair to have been painstakingly concealed can mean nothing less than that State security was at risk, or that someone high in the Government or the Royal Family was involved. Walter Sickert said it happened for both reasons, and it has already been shown that the political situation of the day was explosive, that Eddy did frequent Cleveland Street and that he almost certainly fathered Annie Elizabeth Crook's child. But has there been a cover-up? At first glance the idea may sound too bizarre or melodramatic to be given much thought. But there can be no doubt that tracks were covered at an alarming rate, which in itself proves there was something of the magnitude of the events in Sickert's story that needed hiding. That a cover-up has occurred is certain. The bulk of the evidence to show this appears in this chapter, but the ramifications of the cover-up spread throughout the rest of the book.

A vital side-issue of the cover-up is that it destroys every theory as to the identity of the murderer yet forwarded, except one which is so tenuous and fraught with inconsistency that it cannot be taken seriously—the notion that Prince Eddy himself was the killer. If Donald McCormick had been right in saying the Whitechapel Murders were committed by a mad Russian doctor called Pedachenko, sponsored by the Russian police to bring disgrace upon anarchists in Britain, the English authorities would hardly have gone to great lengths to hush up the truth of the case. On the contrary, they would have blazoned the truth to the world in order to remove the disgrace they had earned in failing to lay the Ripper by the heels. This applies equally to every other theory except Sickert's story. There would be no need to hide the fact that Jack the Ripper was a vengeful midwife, as William Stewart proclaimed; a Jewish slaughterman, as averred by Robin Odell; that he was the poisoner Thomas Neill Cream; the wife-murderer George Chapman; a mad social reformer; a deranged surgeon revenging the death of his son, who had contracted syphilis from a whore; or even that he was James Kenneth Stephen, the tutor of Prince Eddy, as suggested by Michael Harrison. There would certainly have been no cause for a cover-up if the Ripper had been the failed barrister Montague John Druitt, accused by both Daniel Farson and Tom Cullen in their books on the murders. Druitt, however, is a special case, and is very much involved in the cover-up, as will be seen. The final part of this chapter is devoted to proving Druitt's innocence and describing his true part in the case. Thus, though all previous theories fall down through individual weaknesses, they are all destroyed by the one fact that a cover-up has taken place.

Perhaps until the blowing open of the gigantic Watergate conspiracy, many would have dismissed any suggestion of a Government cover-up as preposterous. Now no one can deny that the concept of concealment is an integral part of government today. We have long been used to concealment for the honest purpose of protecting official secrets. With the downfall of President Nixon and his crooked regime we have come to realize that the most powerful and trusted leaders will lie, cheat, break the law and see innocent colleagues imprisoned to save their own skins.

The Ripper cover-up has been divided into several distinct parts, one of which has already been noticed but not properly recognized:

(1) Vital evidence was suppressed at the Ripper inquests.

(2) When Eddy returned to Cleveland Street in 1889 and became involved in the male brothel scandal there, an elaborate cover-up was mounted by the most powerful men in England. This was to hide not his bisexual nature (which was well known by then anyway), but his connection with that particular street. The course of justice was deliberately perverted to continue the cover-up that had begun with the removal of Eddy's Catholic wife and snowballed into the Whitechapel Murders. Despite the enormous amount of time and effort put into concealing the Cleveland Street brothel case, however, one man threatened to reveal everything. The ruthlessness of the conspirators was once more displayed when this man was tried on trumped-up charges and jailed for a year to keep him silent.

(3) A plausible scapegoat was set up in case it became necessary to announce that the Ripper had been caught, and to satisfy anyone who happened to investigate the case in later years.

(4) Documents that contained the truth about the Ripper were destroyed.

Facts were hidden from the beginning, even in open court. The first part of the cover-up started at the inquest of Annie Chapman.

The Chapman inquest was opened by Coroner Wynne E. Baxter at the Working Lads' Institute in Whitechapel Road on Monday, 10th September 1888. Baxter already had the unfinished inquest of 'Polly' Nichols on his hands when Chapman was murdered.

On Thursday the 13th the medical evidence was given. After the most superficial description of Chapman's injuries, divisional police surgeon George Bagster Phillips said, 'I think I had better not go into further detail of these mutilations which can only be painful to the feelings of the jury and the public'.

The coroner allowed Phillips to withhold his evidence for that day, but at the resumed hearing Baxter demanded the full truth. Even though the coroner was only ensuring that normal procedure be adhered to, Phillips behaved in an odd and suspicious manner, trying until the last moment to break the law and suppress vital evidence. The dialogue proceeded thus:

CORONER Dr Phillips, whatever may be your opinion and objections, it appears to me necessary that all the evidence that you ascertained from the post-mortem examination should be on the records of the court for various reasons which I need not enumerate. However painful it may be, it is necessary in the interests of justice.

PHILLIPS I have not had notice of that. I should have been glad if notice had been given me because I should have been better prepared to give the evidence; however, I will do my best.

CORONER Would you like to postpone it?

PHILLIPS Oh no. I will do my best.

CORONER Can you give any indication of how long it would take to perform the incisions found on the body?

PHILLIPS I think I can guide you by saying that I myself could not have performed all the injuries I saw on that woman, and effect them, even without a struggle, under a quarter of an hour. I still think it is a very great pity to make this evidence public. These details are fit only for yourself, sir, and the jury.

CORONER We are here in the interests of justice and must have all the evidence before us. I see, however, that there are several ladies and boys in the room, and I think that they might retire.

Even after the women and children had left, Dr Phillips persisted in his reluctance to give evidence, so his motive for suppressing information was not to save the feelings of the public present, as he had implied. After the court had cleared he said:

PHILLIPS I still feel that in giving these details to the public you are thwarting the ends of justice.

CORONER We are bound to take all the evidence in the case and whether it is made public or not is a matter for the responsibility of the Press.

FOREMAN We are of the opinion that the evidence the doctor on the last occasion wished to keep back should be heard.

CORONER I have carefully considered the matter and have never before heard of any evidence requested being kept back.

PHILLIPS I have not kept it back. I have only suggested whether it should be given or not.

CORONER We have delayed taking this evidence as long as possible, because you said the interests of justice might be served by keeping it back; but it is now a fortnight since this occurred and I do not see why it should be kept back from the jury any longer.

PHILLIPS I am of the opinion that what I am about to describe took place after death, so that it could not affect the cause of death, which you are inquiring into.

CORONER That is only your opinion and might be repudiated by other medical opinion.

PHILLIPS Very well. I will give you the results of my post-mortem examination.

For all his squirming and defiance Dr Phillips could not deflect Baxter from following the course of justice. What is to be deduced from this irregular behaviour? Phillips knew the law as well as the coroner. He was well used to testifying at inquests, he knew that the doctor giving evidence of a post-mortem examination was required to furnish the court with all his facts, and there is ample evidence in the contemporary East London press and in reports of other inquests that he was not averse to describing gruesome injuries in public. It was the first time, certainly in the Whitechapel district, that a doctor had made a request that he be allowed to suppress evidence, as Wynne Baxter was quick to inform him. In the case of the Whitechapel Murders, Dr Phillips had stumbled across something it was necessary for him to hide. He claimed that his reticence was in the interests of justice, but even two weeks after the murder, when further delay on such a pretext was patently useless, he still wished to remain silent. Plainly he wanted the inquest to be brought to a close without his evidence being heard, in which case it would have remained secret for all time. Even today the description of the injuries he was finally compelled to make has a peculiar and sinister significance to a particular group of people. This significance will be examined in detail in Chapter 10.

The first part of the cover-up reached full swing at the inquest on the final victim, Marie Kelly. First, the inquest was illegally wrested from the hands of Coroner Baxter and then carried out in an illegal fashion by another coroner who deliberately withheld vital information. The murder had taken place in Baxter's territory, the Whitechapel district, but the inquest was finally held at Shoreditch Town Hall. This was an unprecedented deviation, and inspired one juror to take the new coroner to task.

'I do not see why we should have the inquest thrown on our shoulders when the murder did not happen in our district, but in Whitechapel', he said.

Mr Hammond, the Coroner's Officer, replied, 'It did not happen in Whitechapel'.

The coroner broke in severely, 'Do you think that we do not know what we are doing here? The jury are summoned in the ordinary way, and they have no business to object. If they persist in their objection I shall know how to deal with them. Does any juror persist in objecting?'

The dissident would not be quietened by threats. 'We are summoned for the Shoreditch district', he said. 'This affair happened in Spitalfields.'

'It happened within my district,' lied the exasperated coroner.

But another juryman came to the rescue of the first and declared, 'This is not my district. I come from Whitechapel, and Mr Baxter is my coroner.'

The coroner managed to get the last word on the subject by saying, 'I am not going to discuss the subject with the jurymen at all. If any juryman says he distinctly objects, let him say so.'

Pausing more to observe the effect of his threatening tone than for any retort, he went on, 'I may tell the jurymen that jurisdiction lies where the body lies, not where it was found', which appeared to contradict his previous statement about the murder having happened in his district. At all costs he was determined to preside over this particular inquest. Why?

It might have been possible to sympathize with Coroner Roderick MacDonald had he then proceeded to conduct the inquest in a proper manner. But he was out to conceal evidence. This undisputed fact, combined with the irregular method by which he gained jurisdiction over the hearing in the first place, shows that MacDonald was a major character in the cover-up operation. Wynne Baxter would certainly have sifted every ounce of evidence from this hearing, as he had shown by his determination in the previous Ripper inquests. He would have brooked no opposition from characters like Dr Bagster Phillips who wanted to conceal vital testimony. And this is why Coroner Baxter was not given the chance of running the Kelly inquest. Too much had to be hidden, as is borne out by the fact that this was the most sensational murder of the nineteenth century, yet the Scotland Yard file on it is considerably smaller than that of any of the other Ripper cases—and positively insignificant when compared to several other unsolved murder files of the same year.

MacDonald abruptly terminated the inquest after less than a day and recorded the jury's verdict of 'wilful murder against some person or persons unknown'. He had not asked the police surgeon—once again Dr Phillips—if any portions of the body were missing. He had not tried to establish the nature of the murder weapon. He had not established the time of death, which was a vital omission because two witnesses claimed to have seen Kelly in the street after daylight on the morning her body was found.

As Tom Cullen pointed out in his Autumn of Terror, British common law since Edward I has required that 'all the injuries of the body, also all the wounds, ought to be viewed; and the length; breadth and deepness, with what weapon, and in what part of the body the wound or hurt is . . . all which things must be enrolled in the roll of the coroner'. As a police surgeon well used to testifying at inquests himself, MacDonald knew this. 'Yet he chose deliberately to suppress this evidence', wrote Cullen.

> "There is other evidence which I do not propose to call," he announced rather grandly at the close of the inquest, "for if we at once make public every fact brought forward in connection with this terrible murder the ends of justice might be retarded." What did he mean by this extraordinary statement? Was he being guided by Scotland Yard, which had been so anxious to get the inquest out of Coroner Wynne Baxter's hands? What were the police trying to hide?

Even Cullen, who was trying to prove Montague Druitt was the murderer, was struck by the obvious cover-up which was in progress.

Coroner MacDonald not only broke the law in suppressing evidence, but was under instructions to do so, for no Government action was taken to correct the situation, despite indignant leaders in the national newspapers, like that of the Daily Telegraph which said:

> Much surprise is expressed that the inquest should have been closed before an opportunity was given to the relatives of the deceased to identify the body. As they are believed to reside in Ireland there was some delay to be expected in finding them.
> It is in the power of the Attorney General to apply to the High Court of Justice to hold a new inquest, if he is satisfied that there has been rejection of evidence, irregularity of proceedings, or insufficiency of inquiry. This course is improbable as it is stated that Dr Phillips, the divisional surgeon of police, with whom the coroner consulted in private, had had a commission from the Home Office for some time and he does not consider himself a 'free agent'; but it is pointed out that by hurriedly closing the inquest the opportunity has been lost of putting on record statements made on oath and when the memory of witnesses is fresh. It > is not improbable that a long interval may elapse before a prisoner is charged at the police court.

Once more the strange Dr Phillips expedites the cover-up by providing a reason for serious irregularities being tolerated. Firstly he succeeded at the Kelly inquest in his determination to withhold evidence and consulted with the coroner only in private (which Baxter had rightly refused to allow). Secondly he alone was the reason for the inquest not being reopened, as it most certainly should have been. At least, he allowed himself to be used as the excuse for the Kelly hearing not being revived. That he had a Home Office commission would hardly have stopped him testifying at so important a hearing. On the contrary, in normal circumstances the Home Office would have been eager for justice to be done. But with Jack the Ripper they were not. The authorities clearly wanted the murder of Marie Kelly swept under the carpet as efficiently as they were later to conceal once again Eddy's connection with Cleveland Street. It was part of the same dubious operation.

The indecent haste with which the inquest was handled meant also that a crucial statement made by a man named Hutchinson was not heard. Hutchinson gave a remarkably detailed description of a man he claimed to have seen with Kelly shortly before her murder. Afterwards there were dogged attempts by the police to undermine Hutchinson's certainty about the man. But he would not be tripped up on details, nor would he have his evidence altered. He even put himself in danger of being implicated by insisting he was one of the last people to see Kelly alive, probably the last apart from her murderer. It is possible that had Hutchinson been properly examined in a court of law, his testimony could have proved flawed or false. He may not have seen the Ripper, but an innocent 'client' of Kelly's who disappeared before the killer arrived. But there is nothing in police records, public or secret, which suggest Hutchinson was unreliable. Quite the reverse: in the Scotland Yard file, Inspector Abberline described Hutchinson's statement as 'important', and expressed the opinion that it was true. It was therefore essential that his evidence be given in open court. He was the only man to give a good description of the person most likely to have been Jack the Ripper. Yet he was not even called to give evidence.

Hutchinson's statement is written in thick black copperplate on blue Special Report sheets headed Commercial Street:

12th November 1888

At 6 p.m. 12th George Hutchinson of the Victoria Home, Commercial Street came to this station and made the following statement.

"About 2 a.m. 9th I was coming by Thrawl Street, Commercial Street, and just before I got to Flower and Dean Street, I met the murdered woman Kelly and she said to me, Hutchinson will you lend me sixpence. I said I can't I have spent all my money going down to Romford, she said good morning I must go and find some money. She went away toward Thrawl Street. A man coming in the opposite direction to Kelly tapped her on the shoulder and said something to her, they both burst out laughing. I heard her say alright to him and the man said you will be alright for what I have told you. He then placed his right hand around her shoulders. He also had a kind of a small parcel in his left hand with a kind of strap round it. I stood against the lamp of the Queens Head Public House and watched him. They both then came past me and the man hung down his head with his hat over his eyes. I stooped down and looked him in the face. He looked at me stern. They both went into Dorset Street I followed them. They both stood at the corner of the court for about 3 minutes. He said something to her. She said alright my dear come along you will be comfortable. He then placed his arm on her shoulder and [she] gave him a kiss. She said she had lost her handkerchief. He then pulled his handkerchief a red one out and gave it to her. They both then went up the Court together. I then went to the court to see if I could see them but could not. I stood there for about three quarters of an hour to see if they came out. They did not so I went away.

Beneath the statement has been written:

Circulated to A.S. [All Stations].

Description, age about 34 or 35, height 5 ft 6, complexion pale. Dark eyes and eye lashes. Slight moustache curled up each end and hair dark. Very surley looking. Part of Hutchinson's statement
This bore his signature at the foot of each page of the statement.

In his book Clarence, Michael Harrison claimed there was an elaborate cover-up mounted to keep Eddy's name well away from anything to do with Cleveland Street. This was not, as Harrison imagined, purely to hide Eddy's involvement in activities at the male brothel. It was to remove any possibility of his previous, and more dangerous, escapades in Cleveland Street coming to light. In the brothel affair, wrote Harrison:

> Eddy was the central participant. It is hardly surprising, therefore that the Establishment conspired elaborately to conceal the truth, and that, until now, this process has not been fully recognized. On account of the publicity that the official enquiries had attracted, it was necessary to mount the whole pantomime performance of a criminal trial, with contracted judge, counsels, witnesses, and plaintiff.

This was informed guesswork on Harrison's part, and he produced no evidence to back up the opinion. But the official papers relating to the Cleveland Street case, which have been deposited with the Director of Public Prosecutions since 1889, were opened to the public in 1975, and it is now possible to say with certainty that Harrison was correct.

The papers show that the scandal began in July 1889 when a delivery boy called Swinscow was questioned by police because he appeared to have more spending money than his meagre wages would have allowed. He revealed that another boy, a Post Office clerk called Newlove, had asked him along to No. 19 Cleveland Street to take part in homosexual activities. Under questioning Newlove broke down and later told police about a pseudo-clergyman called Veck, in reality another Post Office worker, who was a prime mover in the 'crimes'. A trap was set, and on 9th July a police constable overheard Veck offer Newlove money to defend himself against any court action over the offences.

Already the cover-up was taking shape, for it rapidly became obvious to the senior police officers in charge of the investigation that Eddy was a regular caller at the brothel. Papers in the D.P.P. file name Eddy ('P.A.V.'—Prince Albert Victor) as an alleged patron of the house. Inspector Abberline, the man in charge of the Ripper inquiries in East London, suddenly turned up in the West End to head the Cleveland Street scandal case.

Evidence was secured against Veck, as already stated, on 9th

July. But it was not until six weeks later, on 20th August, that he was arrested. This long delay was entirely the responsibility of Abberline, so far the one definite link between the Ripper murders and Cleveland Street. The purpose of the delay was to allow the chief offenders to escape, and so dilute the danger of any publicity arising from a trial. Abberline's men kept watch on the house after the evidence was secured against Veck, and on 9th July P.C. Sladden saw a number of men entering and leaving the house. The following day the furniture belonging to the proprietor of the brothel, Charles Hammond, was taken out, but nothing was done to arrest either Veck or anyone else connected with the brothel. It later transpired that Hammond had escaped to France and had taken his furniture with him—and all this had happened while Abberline's men were keeping watch.

As Foreign Secretary as well as Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury played an active part in the cover-up, as the D.P.P. file shows. A regular customer at No. 19 was Lord Arthur Somerset, Extra Equerry and Superintendent of the Stables to the Prince of Wales. In a letter contained in the file, the Prince of Wales expressed his satisfaction that Salisbury had allowed Somerset to leave the country before he could be arrested. If Somerset had been brought to trial Eddy's name would certainly have become linked publicly with Cleveland Street.

Salisbury was also responsible for making sure Hammond was not brought back to England. He would have been the chief prosecution witness, and could have named every person, including Eddy, who had patronized his house. In July, when the Home Secretary wrote asking Salisbury if Hammond should be extradited from France, Salisbury made quite certain the villain remained at large. On 24th July he informed the Home Secretary that he did not 'consider this to be a case in which any official application could justifiably be made to the French government for assistance in surrendering the fugitive to this country'. The only reason the French Government would not have been approached to assist in the extradition of an offender would have been if the offence were a petty one. But if that were true, why is the D.P.P. file crammed with hundreds of letters and memoranda from all the most eminent men in the land—the Prince of Wales, the Prime Minister, the Lord Chancellor, the Home Secretary, the Attorney-General, the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police and the Director of Public Prosecutions? This was no unimportant case: there is at least four times as much documentation connected with the Cleveland Street affair as there is in the combined records of the Home Office and Scotland Yard on all the Whitechapel Murders. Most of this mass of correspondence deals with ways of hushing up the scandal, as is shown by the following memorandum from the Director of Public Prosecutions, dated 24th August 1889. It refers to the chief prosecution witness, a boy called Algernon Alleys, who claimed to have compromising letters from a Mr Brown, clearly established in the file as the pseudonym of Lord Arthur Somerset:

> It is proposed to call on Tuesday if possible only witnesses whose evidence implicates Newlove and Veck—and Hammond who is not yet in custody—and to avoid if possible putting any witness into the box who refers to "Mr Brown".

Eventually Veck and Newlove were tried for having committed unnatural offences with male persons and with having induced others to do the same. They pleaded guilty. It was a period when convicted homosexuals were dealt harsh punishments, life imprisonment not unknown. But Veck was jailed for four months and Newlove for nine months. This was an appalling travesty of justice. Veck, the worst offender in the case and the man who had corrupted the young boys, received less than half the punishment of one of his victims.

The job of co-ordinating the cover-up was in the hands of the Treasury. With the help of a solicitor called Arthur Newton they made attempts to bribe Alleys, the only important witness still in England, to leave the country. They were even prepared to pay for his keep if he sailed for America, as well as all his travelling expenses. The Government was desperate to hush up the events in Cleveland Street. The vastness of the D.P.P. file on the case and the involvement of so many eminent men in trying to cover-up the scandal makes it certain that it was not Lord Arthur Somerset's name they were protecting, but Eddy's.

The Queen herself was involved. Though the Court Circular for 7th October 1889 recorded that the Lord Chancellor, Lord Halsbury, was received by Her Majesty for a social gathering at Balmoral, it is clear that he visited the Queen that day mainly to discuss the scandal with her. For the D.P.P. file contains a long, deeply thought out legal opinion by Halsbury on whether the charges against certain people connected with the brothel should be proceeded with. It is written on Balmoral paper, so it was an urgent matter. Had it been anything but of paramount importance he would surely have waited until he returned to London the next day to put pen to paper.

The file provides sound evidence that the Government was desperate to hush up Eddy's alleged part in the scandal. This would not have been the case if it had been only a matter of homosexuality, though that was serious enough. Only a scandal that would have threatened the Throne would have necessitated the involvement in the cover-up of so many notable men. But by 1889 it was common knowledge that if Eddy was not completely homosexual, he was certainly bisexual. Yet this knowledge did not bring about an empire-rocking scandal. It was not homosexuality that was being covered up, but Eddy's involvement with Cleveland Street, and the truth about Jack the Ripper.

The cover-up did not end with the perversion of justice carried out by the highest in the land in allowing Somerset and Hammond to go free. The ruthlessness and corruption with which the Victorian Establishment was prepared to pursue a course of self-preservation was carried even further in dealing with the one man who threatened to reveal everything. This man was Ernest Parke, twenty-nine-year-old editor of the North London Press, who pinpointed in his newspaper the deliberate mishandling on the brothel investigation and trial. He attacked the police not only for allowing Hammond to escape to the Continent, but also for giving him so much time in which to do so that he managed to take his furniture with him. He attacked the court for passing a sentence of four months on Veck, who had been one of the worst offenders in an unsavoury case. Parke courageously pointed out, 'A clergyman facing a similar charge only last year, was sentenced for what were less serious offences to no less than life imprisonment'.

Parke's leading articles commented on men of title as well as Hammond being allowed to leave the country and defeat the ends of justice, because 'their prosecution would inculpate more highly placed and distinguished personages'.

This was a direct reference to Eddy, and Ernest Parke was getting too close to the truth. He had to be silenced. He had made one statement which laid him open to attack. He had named Lord Euston as a frequenter of the brothel. At first Parke's position looked unassailable. He had no less than six witnesses who claimed to have seen Euston entering or leaving the house on different occasions, one of whom said he had taken part in homosexual practices with him. The D.P.P. documents confirm that Parke was correct in his allegations about Euston. John Saul, a male prostitute, made a statement which is in the file, in which he said:

> The young Duke of Grafton—I mean the brother to the present Duke was a constant visitor at Hammond's. He is a tall fine looking man with a fair moustache [This clearly means Euston] . . . I saw him myself last night. I know him well. He went to Hammond's with me on one occasion. He is not an actual sodomite. He likes to play with you and then "spend" on your belly.

Saul had no axe to grind, and everything to lose, by claiming to have seen Euston at 19 Cleveland Street. And his words do not have the ring of those of a man wanting to blacken Euston's name maliciously. If that were true he would have denounced him as 'a proper sodomite', or in his favourite words, 'a regular Mary Ann'. It is important that Saul made this statement on 10th August and Parke did not become aware of the scandal until September—so suggestions that Saul was perjuring himself on Parke's behalf are unfounded. Saul had spoken the truth, and the Government knew it. This is shown by several hitherto secret documents in the D.P.P. file—letters from high-ranking members of the Government who were involved in the cover-up, including the Attorney-General and the Lord Chancellor. It was agreed that Saul should not be charged with perjury, as he most certainly would have been had they believed for one moment that he had lied. Despite this, Euston, at the instigation of a solicitor named Edward Henslow Bedford, brought Parke to trial on trumped-up libel charges. And Saul was dismissed by the judge as unreliable because he was a homosexual! The 'contracted judge, counsels, witnesses and plaintiff' described by Harrison fulfilled their function and Parke was found guilty of criminal libel. He was sentenced to a year's imprisonment. Silenced.

King Edward VII, Eddy's father, stipulated in his will that after his death all his private papers were to be destroyed. His instructions were carried out and the papers were burned by Lord Knollys and Lord Esher. The reason for Bertie wanting his archive destroyed was that he had lived such a profligate life he had no wish for his darker secrets to become public knowledge. This was understandable. But Queen Alexandra made a similar request and all her papers were incinerated when she died. This has never been explained. Alix, as numerous biographers have said, was the nonpareil of virtue. It is inconceivable that she could have had anything to hide, unless Sickert's story was true. The destruction of her papers only begins to make sense in the light of Sickert's story about Cleveland Street, Jack the Ripper and the cover-up.

A myth has now to be exploded.

The Scotland Yard file contains hundreds of names, but none of them was considered a serious suspect, as is indicated by the fact that as soon as men arrested showed proof of identity they were released. The only three plausible suspects were named by Macnaghten, who did not put pen to paper until six years after the murders. Then he mentioned two unknown Russians and Montague John Druitt, none of whom had been mentioned in the case before. The Russians have been untraceable, and only Druitt can be shown to have existed at all. But where, in 1894, did Macnaghten suddenly come across his name, for Druitt died at the end of 1888? Nowhere else in the file is Druitt mentioned, so he was not a suspect at the time of the murders. Conveniently he was dead and could not answer the charge that he was the Whitechapel Murderer. Walter Sickert described Montague Druitt as a scapegoat and accused Sir Melville Macnaghten, an instrument of the Freemasons, of concocting a case against him. He did not explain how Druitt came to be enmeshed in the web; he did not know. The complicated network that involved Druitt in the case and enabled him to be set up as the scapegoat, ready to be denounced as the Ripper the moment any serious investigation took place, is fully described later in this chapter.

As early as 1889 the police were spreading the rumour that Jack the Ripper had died by drowning at the end of 1888. Mr Albert Backert, a leading member of the Whitechapel Vigilance Committee, was allegedly told this in March 1889 when he questioned the police about their inquiries. Senior officials of the police and Government helped to give the rumour wide acceptance when they mentioned it in their memoirs. Sir Melville Macnaghten claimed in Days of My Years that the Ripper committed suicide in the Thames. Sir John Moylan, Assistant Under-Secretary at the Home Office, wrote, 'It is almost certain that he escaped by committing suicide at the end of 1888'.

Sir Basil Thomson, an Assistant Commissioner of the C.I.D., thought the Ripper was 'an insane Russian doctor'. He wrote, '. . . the man escaped arrest by committing suicide in the Thames at the end of 1888'.

Two authors who have recently made detailed examinations of the case against Druitt are Tom Cullen in Autumn of Terror and Daniel Farson in Jack the Ripper. Both books are based upon private notes apparently written by Sir Melville Macnaghten, copied by his daughter, the Dowager Lady Aberconway, and recopied by the authors. Unfortunately in the various versions the original intention of Macnaghten seem to have been lost, for the notes used by Farson and Cullen vary in major points from Macnaghten's official notes, which are in the Scotland Yard file. Neither Farson nor Cullen was able to gain access to the Yard file, so only now is it possible to show that the whole basis of their case against Druitt is mistaken. Before examining the fatal errors in their theory, it is important to know the full content of Macnaghten's official notes. They are marked Confidential and are written in Sir Melville's own handwriting on white paper bearing only the small oval seal of the Metropolitan Police:

> The case referred to in the sensational story told in 'The Sun' in its issue of 13th inst, & following dates, is that of Thomas Cutbush who was arraigned at the London County Sessions in April 1891, on a charge of maliciously wounding Florence Grace Johnson, and attempting to wound Isabelle Frazer Anderson in Kennington. He was found to be insane and sentenced to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure.
> This Cutbush, who lived with his mother and aunt at 14 Albert St. Kennington, escaped from the Lambeth Infirmary, (after he had been detained there only a few hours, as a lunatic) at noon on 5th March 1891. He was rearrested on 9th idem. A few weeks before this, several cases of stabbing, or jabbing from behind had occurred in the vicinity, and a man named Colicutt was arrested, but subsequently discharged owing to faulty identification. The cuts in the girls dresses made by Colicutt were quite different to the cut made by Cutbush (when he wounded Miss Johnson) who was no doubt influenced by a wild desire of morbid imitation. Cutbush's antecedents were enquired into by Ch. Inspr. (now Supt.) [unreadable], by Inspr. Race, and by P.S. McCarthy

C.I.D. (The last named officer had been specially employed in Whitechapel at the time of the murders there) and it was ascertained that he was born, and had lived in Kennington all his life. His father died when he was quite young, and he was always a 'spoilt' child. He had been employed as a clerk and traveller in the Tea trade at the Minories, & subsequently canvassed for a Directory in the East End, during which time he bore a good character. He apparently contracted syphilis about 1888, and,—since that time,—led an idle and useless life. His brain seems to have become affected, and he believed that people were trying to poison him. He wrote to Lord Grimthorpe, and others, and also to the Treasury, complaining of Dr Brooks, of Westminster Bridge Rd, whom he threatened to shoot for having supplied him with bad medicines. He is said to have studied medical books by day, and to have rambled about at night, returning frequently with his clothes covered with blood, but little reliance could be placed on the statements made by his mother or his aunt, who both appear to have been of a very excitable disposition. It was found impossible to ascertain his movements on the nights of the Whitechapel murders. The knife found on him was bought in Houndsditch about a week before he was detained in the Infirmary. Cutbush was a nephew of the late Supt. Executive.

Now the Whitechapel Murderer had 5 victims and 5 victims only,—his murders were
(ii) 8th Sept '88 Annie Chapman—Hanbury Street: throat cut—stomach & private parts badly mutilated & some of the entrails placed round the neck.
(iii) 30th Sept '88. Elizabeth Stride—Berner's Street: throat cut, but nothing in shape of mutilation attempted, & on same date Catherine Eddowes—Mitre Square, throat cut, & very bad mutilation, both of face & stomach.
(iv) 9th November. Mary Jane Kelly—Miller's Court, throat cut, and the whole of the body mutilated in the most ghastly manner.

The last murder is the only one that took place in a room, and the murderer must have been at least 2 hours engaged. A photo was taken of the woman, as she was found lying on the bed, without seeing which it is impossible to imagine the awful mutilation.

With regard to the double murder which took place on 30th Sept. there is no doubt but that the man was disturbed by some Jews who drove up to a Club (close to which the body of Elizabeth Stride was found) and that he then, 'mordum satiatus', went in search of a further victim whom he found at Mitre Square.

It will be noticed that the fury of the mutilations increased in each case, and, seemingly, the appetite only became sharpened by indulgence. It seems, then, highly improbable that the murderer would have suddenly stopped in November '88, and been content to recommence operations by merely prodding a girl behind some 2 years and 4 months afterwards. A much more rational theory is that the murderer's brain gave way altogether after his awful glut in Millers Court, and that he immediately committed suicide, or, as a possible alternative, was found to be so hopelessly mad by his relations, that he was by them confined in some asylum.

No one ever saw the Whitechapel Murderer, many homicidal maniacs were suspected, but no shadow of proof could be thrown on any one. I may mention the cases of 3 men, any one of whom would have been more likely than Cutbush to have committed this series of murders:—

(1) A Mr M. J. Druitt, said to be a doctor and of good family, who disappeared at the time of the Millers Court murder, and whose body (which was said to have been upwards of a month in the water) was found in the Thames on 31st Dec.—or about 7 weeks after that murder. He was sexually insane and from private info I have little doubt but that his own family believed him to have been the murderer.

(2) Kosminski a Polish Jew and resident in Whitechapel. This man became insane owing to many years indulgence in solitary vices. He had a great hatred of women, especially of the prostitute class, and had strong homicidal tendencies: he was removed to a lunatic asylum about March 1889. There were many crimes connected with this man which made him a strong 'suspect'.

(3) Michael Ostrog, a Russian doctor, and a convict, who was frequently detained in a lunatic asylum as a homicidal maniac. This man's antecedents were of the worst possible type, and his whereabouts at the time of the murders could never be ascertained.

And now with regard to a few of the inaccuracies and misleading statements made by the 'Sun'. In its issue of 14th Feb., it is stated that the writer has in his possession a facsimile of the knife with which the murders were committed. This knife (which for some unexplained reason has, for the last 3 years, been kept by Insp. Race, instead of being sent to Prisoners' Property Store) was traced and it was found to have been purchased in Houndsditch in Feb. '91 or 2 years and 3 months after the Whitechapel murders ceased!

The vital page of Macnaghten's notes

The statement, too, that Cutbush 'spent a portion of the day in making rough drawings of the bodies of women, and of their mutilations' is based solely on the fact that 2 scribble drawings of women in indecent postures were found torn up in Cutbush's room. The head and body of one of these had been cut from some fashion plate, and legs were added to show a woman's naked thighs and pink stockings.

In the issue of 15th Inst. it is said that a *light over*coat was among the things found in Cutbush's house, and that a man in a light overcoat was seen talking to a woman in Backchurch Lane whose body with arms attached was found in Pinchin St. This is hopelessly incorrect! On 10th Sept. '89 the naked body, with arms, of a woman was found in some sacking under a railway arch in Pinchin St: the head and legs were never found nor was the woman ever identified. She had been killed at least 24 hours before the remains (which had seemingly been brought from a distance) were discovered. The stomach was split up by a cut, and the head and legs had been severed in a manner identical with that of the woman whose remains were discovered in the Thames, in Battersea Park, and on the Chelsea Embankment on 4th June of the same year; and these murders had no connection whatever with the Whitechapel horrors. The Rainham mystery in 1887, and the Whitehall mystery (when portions of a woman's body were found under what is now Scotland Yard) in 1888 were of a similar type to the Thames and Pinchin St. crimes.

It is perfectly untrue to say that Cutbush stabbed 6 girls behind—this is confounding his case with that of Colicutt.

The theory that the Whitechapel murderer was left-handed, or, at any rate, 'ambidextrous', had its origin in the remark made by a doctor who examined the corpse of one of the earliest victims; other doctors did not agree with him.

With regard to the 4 additional murders ascribed by the writer in the Sun to the Whitechapel fiend:—

(1) The body of Martha Tabram, a prostitute was found on a common stair case in George Yard buildings on 7th August 1888; the body had been repeatedly pierced, probably with a bayonet. This woman had, with a fellow prostitute, been in company of 2 soldiers in the early part of the evening. These men were arrested, but the second prostitute failed, or refused, to identify, and the soldiers were accordingly discharged.

(2) Alice McKenzie was found with her throat cut (or rather stabbed) in Castle Alley on 17th July 1889; no evidence was forthcoming and no arrests were made in connection with > this case. The stab in the throat was of the same nature as in the case of number 3.

> (3) Frances Coles in Swallow Gardens, on 13th February 1891—for which Thomas Sadler, a fireman, was arrested, and, after several remands, discharged. It was ascertained at the time that Sadler had sailed for the Baltic on 19th July '89 and was in Whitechapel on the night of 17th idem. He was a man of ungovernable temper and entirely addicted to drink and the company of the lowest prostitutes.
> (4) The case of the unidentified woman whose trunk was found in Pinchin St on 10th Sept. 1889—which has already been dealt with.

> M. L. Macnaghten
> 23rd Feb. 1894

Investigating Farson's submission that Druitt was the murderer, it is illuminating to examine several statements he claims were made by Macnaghten:

> No one ever saw the Whitechapel murderer (unless possibly it was the City P.C. who was on a beat near Mitre Square) and no proof could in any way ever be brought against anyone, although very many homicidal maniacs were at one time or another suspected. I enumerate the cases of three men against whom the police held very reasonable suspicion. Personally, and after much careful and deliberate consideration, I am inclined to exonerate two of them.

The sentence which I have put in italics is vital to Farson's theory that the third suspect, Druitt, was in Macnaghten's mind the real killer. But in his official notes at the Yard, which must be considered more reliable than Farson's copy of a copy, Macnaghten wrote:

> No one ever saw the Whitechapel murderer, many homicidal maniacs were suspected, but no shadow of proof could be thrown on any one. I may mention the cases of 3 men, any one of whom would have been more likely than Cutbush to have committed this series of murders. [My italics.]

Here we see no inclination to exonerate two of them, just the names of three men, any one of whom might have been Jack the Ripper.

Farson and Cullen claim that an even more impressive indictment of Druitt appeared in Lady Aberconway's copy of her father's notes. Once again, nothing like it appears in the real notes. According to the two authors, Macnaghten wrote:

> . . . I have always held strong opinions regarding No. 1 [Druitt] and the more I think the matter over, the stronger do these opinions become. The truth, however, will never be known, and did, indeed at one time lie at the bottom of the Thames, if my conjectures be correct.

These words do not appear in the original notes. In the real notes Macnaghten made no claim to have any strong suspicions regarding Druitt. He was merely one of three possibles. There was no mention, either, of the truth having lain at the bottom of the Thames.

Now look at the actual reference to No. 1, in which both authors differ seriously from the real notes. Cullen and Farson's version is reproduced on the left and the real Macnaghten's notes on the right:

> No. 1 Mr M. J. Druitt, a doctor of about forty-one years of age and of fairly good family, who disappeared at the time of the Miller's Court murder, and whose body was found floating in the Thames on 3rd December, i.e. seven weeks after the said murder. The body was said to have been in the water for a month, or more—on it was found a season ticket between Blackheath and London. From private information I have little doubt but that his own family suspected this man of being the Whitechapel murderer; it was alleged that he was sexually insane.

> (1) A Mr M. J. Druitt, said to be a doctor and of good family, who disappeared at the time of the Millers Court murder, and whose body (which was said to have been upwards of a month in the water) was found in the Thames on 31st Dec.—or about 7 weeks after that murder. He was sexually insane and from private info I have little doubt but that his own family believed him to have been the murderer.

The discrepancies are at once apparent: In the genuine notes there is no mention of Druitt's age; they say Druitt was found in the Thames on 31st December (which is correct). Cullen and Farson's version says 3rd December, which by no stretch of the imagination was seven weeks after Kelly's murder on 9th November—it was a mere three weeks and three days. A further mistake is made in the revised edition of Farson's book, when the date of the finding of Druitt's body is changed yet again—to 13th December! The real notes make no mention of a season ticket, and the wording of the two pieces is quite different. Thus the notes used by Messrs Farson and Cullen as the basis of their indictment of Druitt appear to be rough and inaccurate copies. Whether the mistakes occurred in Lady Aberconway's first transcription, or in the subsequent copies, it is impossible to say. Over so many years and in so many versions it is hardly surprising that statements have emerged which have little bearing on the originals.

Armed with the idea that Macnaghten suspected Druitt and exonerated the other two suspects named, Farson and Cullen set out to find evidence.

The evidence produced by Farson is seriously flawed. Patiently, and with the help of two full-time researchers, he traced a Dr Lionel Druitt who was listed in the Medical Directory until 1887, after which date his address was given as Australia. Lionel turned out to be Montague's cousin. Farson also found the death certificate of his suspect at Somerset House and discovered that Druitt was a barrister, not a doctor as Macnaghten had stated.

He found that Druitt was born at Wimborne in Dorset in August 1857. In January 1870 he went to Winchester College, where he proved a successful all-rounder. He made rapid progress academically, was an active member of the Debating Society and excelled at cricket. In 1876 he was awarded a scholarship to New College, Oxford, where he did moderately well. He left in 1880, having achieved a B.A. Druitt turned to law, and in May 1882 was admitted to the Inner Temple. He was called to the Bar, before the benchers of the Inns of Court, in 1885. He took chambers at No. 9 King's Bench Walk, which he maintained until his death, but he appears to have had little success as a barrister, and eventually became a full-time master at a school in Blackheath, where he had been teaching at least since 1883.

Farson's next piece of 'evidence' seems insubstantial, but it appears to be the foundation of his argument. He states that he received a letter from a Mr Knowles who said he had once seen a document in Australia called The East End Murderer—I knew him. It was apparently written by a Lionel Drewett, Druitt or Drewery. Unfortunately, Farson cannot produce the letter because, he says, it disappeared along with other papers relevant to Jack the Ripper in a dossier someone borrowed but never returned. Farson does not remember Knowles's address, so the latter cannot be traced and questioned about the document he may or may not have seen. What is more frustrating is that Farson did not immediately contact Knowles to ask vital questions, like: 'When and where did you see the document?'; 'Do you have a copy?'; and most important of all, 'Did it name the murderer?' In fact, no questions at all were asked of the man who, Farson himself says, provided him with crucial evidence.

'The value of this [Knowles's] letter in identifying Jack the Ripper can hardly be exaggerated', he writes, although he does not have even the address of the man who wrote it. The letter was placed in a file which was later stolen. Farson had noted from the purloined letter, however, that The East End Murderer —I knew him had been published privately by a Mr Fell of Dandenong, a mountain settlement some twenty miles east of Melbourne, in 1890. He goes on to say that if it could be proved the document was written by M. J. Druitt's cousin Lionel, then it would be beyond coincidence—and Druitt must have been the Ripper. This seems a prodigious leap from mere possibility to accepted fact. Farson no longer regards the existence of the document as merely possible, but suddenly, without any corroboration, that possibility has been transformed in his mind to fact, and he is already talking about, 'If it can be proved it was written by Montague's cousin . . .'

Another important piece of investigation glossed over is that Knowles is supposed to have claimed The East End Murderer—I knew him could have been written by someone called Drewett or Drewery. No investigation into this possibility appears to have been conducted; it is tacitly assumed that the document did exist, that it was written by Lionel Druitt, and that all Farson has to show is that Lionel the author was also Lionel the doctor, Montague's cousin. Farson then reminds us that the Medical Directory showed Dr Lionel Druitt moved to Australia in 1887.

In Farson's revised edition he quotes a correspondent who states that in column seven of the death certificate of Druitt's mother, who spent her last years in a lunatic asylum, there is written: 'Emily Knowles, present at death, Manor House, Chiswick'.

With no stronger evidence than this coincidence of common surnames, Emily Knowles is coupled with the present-day Mr

Knowles who wrote the missing letter, a mountainous piece of conjecture with no hint of supporting evidence; Farson knows nothing more about either Knowles than the name. The suggestion is that Emily Knowles was a woman looking after Mrs Druitt at the asylum, and that she held vital information after Montague's last visit to his mother: 'This was conveyed by a member of her family to Lionel, enabling him to write the document'. (!)

By this stage Farson seems convinced that Druitt was the killer. But:

(1) He has not proven that the document to which he refers even existed.

(2) He has not shown, if it did, that Lionel Druitt wrote it.

(3) He has not examined the argument that if Montague were the murderer, his cousin would hardly have wanted to publicize the fact. And in the unlikely event that Lionel was seeking notoriety through a connection with the Ripper, firstly he would not have had to arrange for the piece to be published privately—newspapers and publishers would have snapped it up immediately; and secondly, if he was seeking notoriety he would hardly have had his work published in a place so small and remote as Dandenong, where so few would have read it. Dandenong has little more than six thousand inhabitants now. In the 1890s it was a cluster of huts, and certainly no printer would have found a livelihood there.

(4) He has not discussed the likelihood that whoever wrote the piece, it may have named someone completely different from Montague Druitt. Farson does not even mention this as a possibility.

(5) He does not mention that literally thousands of statements have been made by people claiming to know the identity of the Ripper, and that The East End Murderer—I knew him, even if it existed, may have had no significance at all.

Despite what several Druittists have claimed, Farson produces no concrete evidence that the document existed. What he does produce appears to be fourth-hand hearsay which would not be admissible in any court of law, claiming that an amateur criminologist called Maurice Gould claimed he had been in Australia from 1925 to 1932, and that there he met two people who claimed they knew the identity of the Ripper. Their information, it is said, came from papers belonging to a Mr W. G. Fell.

Farson continues:

> Today, Gould admits that details are blurred at such a distance, but he remembers that one of the two men was a freelance journalist called Edward MacNamara who 'knew this Mr Fell of Dandenong who died in 1935' and said that Fell housed a man called Druitt who left him papers proving the Ripper's identity: 'These he would not part with unless he received a considerable sum, £500 I think, which I had not got in those days and so what I wrote was from memory from the scant examination I had of them'. [my italics]

Not only is the information Farson proffers as corroboration fourth-hand, but it is apparently based on something written from memory after a scant examination. It is not explained how the two men Gould met in Australia had knowledge as early as 1932 of Mr Fell's death in 1935. Nor is it explained that the Australian registries of births and deaths have no record of the death of a W. G. Fell any time between 1933 and 1937, which rules out Mr Gould's testimony.

However, armed with what he calls a 'double confirmation of names', from the blurred memory of Gould and from the untraceable Knowles, Farson flew to Australia. He drove to the Dandenong Ranges, and at a place called Lang-Lang he heard of a shopkeeper called Fell. Unfortunately, he was no relation to the elusive printer.

If Farson produced no evidence the document existed, the BBC with all their efforts and resources, concluded it did not, and in so doing seem to have destroyed Farson's whole case against Druitt. In a Telex message to Humphrey Fisher, Head of Documentaries at the Australian Broadcasting Commission in Sydney, Paul Bonner asked for information on the alleged document. On 9th April 1973 he received this reply from researcher Leone Buchanan:

> Humphrey Fisher passed on your request to me concerning Dr Lionel Druitt and the publication of The East End Murderer—I knew him. So far no luck. Have checked Sydney libraries and spent three days in Melbourne checking every available source including libraries, historical societies, criminologists, archivists, private collectors, publishers and newspapers. Druitt's publication is not listed in Australian bibliographies and a search of directories around 1890 reveals no such person as W. G. Fell. Traced daughter and grand> daughter of Druitt who have no knowledge of Dr Druitt being in Dandenong or of his writing the article. Apparently he was in Tasmania during that time.

This seems to destroy Farson's theory once and for all. If Dr Lionel Druitt was in Tasmania when Farson claimed he was at Dandenong then he could not have written the document—which seems not to have existed anyway, because if it had some trace of it would surely have been uncovered by Buchanan's exhaustive research. And finally it would seem that W. G. Fell did not exist either!

Lionel Druitt's only published work in Australia was in fact a four-page article dealing with urine infection, which appeared in a medical magazine.

As if he has established not only that the document existed, but also that Lionel Druitt was its author, Farson goes on to ask:

> What personal knowledge could Lionel have had which made him accuse his cousin? Here I am able to produce another piece of crucial evidence. I discovered from the Medical Directory that Dr Lionel Druitt had a surgery at the Minories in 1879. This is the first link between Druitt and the East End of London, the absence of which has been so baffling until now. Montague was about to leave Oxford at that date, but again I find the association beyond coincidence.

However, Dr Lionel Druitt did not have a surgery in the Minories in 1879, and there is no mention of him in the Medical Directory for that year. The reference which is confusing Farson appears in fact in the Medical Register, a different publication entirely. This reference does indeed list Druitt at Minories, E. in 1879. But at the most this means he was assisting the doctor who regularly practised at that address, and he was not there for more than a few months. This is shown by the fact that the Medical Directory and the Medical Register for the years either side of 1879 give Druitt's address as 8 Strathmore Gardens, which was clearly his permanent address. Unfortunately, this misunderstanding about Lionel Druitt's connection with the Minories has become the basis of the next major part of Farson's theory. He suggests that Lionel, four years older than Montague, 'might well have felt it his duty to look after the boy when they were both in London'. But he gives no evidence to show Montague was ever in the East End of London, or even that he knew his cousin Lionel.

'It is reasonable to assume', says Farson, 'that Montague might have visited Lionel there. . . . It is conceivable that he even lived there himself after Lionel had left, and that at some time Lionel had grounds for suspicion.'

So, instead of producing evidence to link Montague with the East End, Farson tries to convince us of his suspect's guilt by stating 'it is reasonable to assume' he stayed at the Minories for nine years after Lionel left, even though all this time Montague had rooms at No. 9 King's Bench Walk. A quick check of both the Medical Register and the Medical Directory for every year between 1879 and 1889 shows that at no time could Montague have stayed at No. 140. It was occupied permanently by doctors. Firstly Doctors J. O. Taylor and Thomas Thyne practised at the address, to be succeeded by Dr John Sell Edmund Cotman. Despite Farson's assertion, it is *un*reasonable to assume any connection between Druitt and the Minories, unless there is supporting evidence.

Farson then returns to his amateur criminologist Maurice Gould, who claims to have spoken to a former librarian from Poplar on the Isle of Dogs, which borders on Ripper territory. Gould is quoted as saying, 'From some recess in the library he [the librarian] produced an old, either Voters' List or a Directory, which listed an M. J. Druitt as living in the Minories'.

Farson says he later tried to trace the reference but without success, and 'further enquiries indicate that the ex-librarian is dead'.

Once again Farson's evidence can be traced back via hearsay to a dead man. The first half of his case is based on a letter he cannot produce from a man who cannot be traced. The second half is based on the unsubstantiated testimony of a dead man. Old librarians die, but Voters' Lists and Directories live on. I have examined every directory covering the Minories in the seventies, eighties and nineties, and in none of them is the name M. J. Druitt mentioned.

The case to show a connection between Druitt and the Minories has the strength of gossamer, yet Farson proceeds to detail what he sees as the importance of that thoroughfare. It is not simply their position in the East End, he says:

> They have a particular significance in the story of the Ripper. On September 29th, 1888, the Ripper wrote from Liverpool: 'Beware, I shall be at work on the 1st and 2nd inst., in > Minories at twelve midnight, and I give the authorities a good chance, but there is never a policeman near when I am at work'.

Then he quotes part of a further letter from Liverpool received after the double murder of 30th September:

> What fools the police are. I even give them the name of the street where I am living.

As far as Farson is concerned these letters can have been written by only one person, Montague the Ripper. But yet again one single idea turns out to be fraught with fatal weaknesses. There is no evidence whatsoever to show the real murderer wrote the two letters from Liverpool. There is nothing to indicate Druitt ever went to Liverpool or had any connections with the city. If Farson had seen the Scotland Yard file he would know it contains hundreds of letters from cranks all over the world. They are written in many languages; many an East End street and numerous nights between September 1888 and the end of the year are mentioned. With that wealth of material one could prove anything—providing of course one accepts the Ripper wrote every letter received by the police and Press, and that in between murders he travelled as far off as Barcelona and Philadelphia to post his crazy messages.

But the most misleading point about the two Liverpool letters is Farson's juxtaposition of the last two sentences of one with the reference to the Minories in the other. 'What fools the police are. I even give them the name of the street where I am living', is used to create the impression that the writer of the letter lived in the Minories. What Farson does not mention is that 'the street where I am living' plainly refers to the address at the top of the letter—Prince William Street, Liverpool!

This analysis of Farson's book reveals no evidence at all to incriminate Druitt. He has not shown Druitt was anywhere near the scenes of the murders nor that he ever went to the East End. And he has no evidence to show Druitt had a motive for killing whores.

Montague John Druitt was not Jack the Ripper. The truth of this is to be found in the barrister's cricketing career. The first murder, that of Nichols, took place at Whitechapel in the early hours of Friday, 31st August. The very next day Druitt was in the West Country playing cricket. The second murder, Annie Chapman's, took place about 4.20 on the morning of Saturday, 8th September. Six hours later Druitt was playing cricket at the Rectory Field at Blackheath for the Blackheath Cricket Club.

'Of course this does not disprove the case against Druitt in any way', Farson writes, and then suggests feebly, 'It might confirm that his nerve was strong'. He continues:

> Certainly it was practical, for the journey to Blackheath from Spitalfields was a short and easy one. There is no reason why a man should not commit murder and go on to play a good game of cricket a few hours later. Despite the excessive slowness of the game he might even regard it as a release.

By the time he gets to discussing the killer's state of mind, Farson has obviously forgotten the picture he painted of the strong-nerved Druitt elaborately mutilating Chapman, then going on to play cricket. He first quotes Dr Magnus Hirschfeld, author of Sexual Anomalies and Perversions, who makes the point that:

> The sexual murderer does not know the sinister, bestial desire to kill that lies dormant within him, to come to life at the first unfortunate opportunity.

Farson goes on to say that Hirschfeld suggests the sexual murderer is hardly aware of what he is doing, and that he murders in a state of sexual intoxication. He then quotes Colin Wilson, who says that after the murder he thinks the killer would suffer:

> intense depression, the 'morning after' feeling, revulsion from the bloodstained clothes, the feeling 'Did I do that?' . . . I suspect that Jack the Ripper was a slave to this craving for killing, like a drug addict, but still ashamed of it.

Farson comments:
